WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

It seems that a change has come over the spirit of the Lords of the Salt Lake City since the receipt of the intelligence received a fortnight ago. More recent letters state that Brigham Young had issued an order forbidding the Mormons to deal with "Gentiles," and the stores of those merchants who do not belong to the brotherhood are deserted. The Mormons are determined to make a stand, and to obstruct the Pacific railroad in every possible way. Salt Lake City is fast filling up with strangers, and trouble is anticipated. Elder George Q. Cannon lately made a speech at the Mormon Conference, in which he declared he would die rather than permit a "Gentile" newspaper to be published in Salt Lake City. His threats were received with cheers. In allusion to the Pacific railroad he said:

"We are told—openly and without disguise, that when the railroad is completed there will be such a flood of so-called 'civilisation' brought in here that every vestige of us, our church and institutions, shall be completely obliterated. When we are told thus plainly and undisguisedly, would it not be folly, may insanity, for us to sit still, fold our arms supinely, and await the crash without making a single effort to ward it off? A people who would be thus besotted would be unworthy the blessings which God has bestowed upon us."

As the number of United States troops on the spot is comparatively small, and an outbreak is said to be certain whenever the railroad approaches the Mormon capital, things begin to wear a serious aspect for the "Gentiles."

A question was recently put to the authorities among the Russian clergy which reads somewhat strangely to us. It was whether the foundation of Sunday schools was in conformity with the doctrines of the orthodox, that is, the Greek Church. The committee of the synod to which the question was referred has decided that not only such schools are not contrary to the laws of the Russian Church, but that attendance should take place on fête days as well as on Sunday.

The successor of St. Peter has been giving what seems, to an heretical view, a somewhat singular commentary on the command of his Master to the apostle, "Put up thy sword into its place, for all they that take the sword shall perish by the sword." A few days since, the Vicar of Christ—the representative of the Prince of Peace—examined with interest and blessed the war material, presented by the Vendee-Breton Committee, consisting of a complete battery of rifled canon, four mountain howitzers, and ambulances for an entire division.

Arrangements have been made for holding the next Church Congress in Liverpool, with the Earl of Derby as president.

The following instance of Western superstition ought to come, if we had such a heading, not under "What the Churches are Doing," but "What they are not Doing:"

"The child of a Devonshire labourer died from scalds caused by its turning over of a saucepan. At the inquest the following strange evidence was given by Ann Manley, a witness:—"I am the wife of James Manley, labourer. I met Sarah Sheppard about nine o'clock on Thursday coming on the road with the child in her arms, wrapped in the tail of her frock. She said her child was scalded; then I charmed it as I charmed it before, when a stone hopped out of the fire last Hoxton fair and scalded its eye. I charmed it in the road. I charmed it by saying to myself, 'There was two angels come from the north, one of them bring fire and the other frost; in frost, out fire,' &c.; I repeated this three times; this is good for a scald. I can't say it's good for anything else. Old John Sparway told me this charm many years ago. A man may tell a woman the charm, or a woman may tell a man, but if a woman tells a woman, or a man a man, I consider it won't do any good at all."

Dr. Vaughan, the vicar of Doncaster, was nominated as proctor to represent the clergy of the archdeaconry of York in the new Convocation, but has been withdrawn by those who put him forward because his views are not those of the clergy generally on the subject of the Irish Church. Dr. Vaughan (in a correspondence which has been published between him and Canon Hey), says he is very happy to be released from his candidature, and desires that on no subsequent occasion he may be proposed. "Nothing," he says, "but a strong and (as I was assured) general wish on the part of the clergy of the archdeaconry overcame my reluctance to be put in nomination on a former occasion. I felt then, and I feel now, that it is not probable that any clergyman who desires to think for himself will long find himself the representative of any opinions but his own."

At the luncheon which followed the commemoration services at St. Andrew's, Wells-street, London, on Monday, the Rev. B. Webb, the vicar, said he was compelled to say that he had lost faith in what was called the "free and open Church" movement. The services of his church had proved so attractive that it was impossible for the churchwardens to make adequate arrangements for the congregations. With the assistance of the Rev. Canon Cook, he had gone thoroughly into the matter, and he did not find that it was the practice of the primitive Church to throw open churches indiscriminately to all comers, and in future the seats of St. Andrew's would be, to a great extent, assigned to the parishioners and communicants.

The Pall Mall is of opinion that those who think with Mr. Gladstone that the justification of the Church of England is, not its general usefulness and convenience, but its preaching "the truth," may find matter for suggestive meditation in the difficulty which has been found at Oxford in choosing Select Preachers for next year. The Proctors proposed the Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Tait), the Dean of Westminster (Dr. Stanley), and the Dean of Christchurch (Dr. Liddell), all of whom were rejected by the remaining members of the nominating board for fear of the consequences of their preaching on the undergraduate mind.

The Weekly Register mentions as remarkable that the pupil of one Anglican prelate and the tutor of another should be now a Catholic priest. Canon Oakeley was educated, as a youth, by the Bishop of Winchester, and when afterwards a Fellow of Balliol College was tutor to the new Archbishop of Canterbury. The canon has, the Register believes, always maintained the most amicable relations with his distinguished pupil and tutor.

A special service, held at St. Clement's, Cambridge, on 3rd of Nov., at which "high mass" was celebrated for "the repose of the soul" of the late Primate, having been brought under the notice of the Bishop of Ely, he expresses his disapproval of such proceedings, but adds,

"You are probably aware that a decision of the Court of Arches has been given, to the effect that prayers for the dead have not been forbidden by the Church of England, and you will, therefore, see that there may be legal difficulty in dealing with the question which you have brought to my notice."

It has been remarked as a singular coincidence that, ninety-four years ago, the two Liberal candidates for the representation of Bedford were Samuel Whitbread, and John Howard, the philanthropist. The former was elected, but John Howard, a man whose name will endure as long as the English language is spoken, was rejected, principally on account of his Nonconformity. At the recent election for the same borough, the two Liberal candidates were again a Whitbread and a Howard. This time, however, both were successful, and Mr. Howard, a Wesleyan, was at the head of the poll, a fact which may be taken to indicate the growth of public opinion on the question of Nonconformity.

The only Roman Catholic in the new House of Commons elected by an English constituency, is Sir John Simeon, a man of culture and intelligence, who represents the Isle of Wight.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS

In answer to the questions of the Rev. W. H. Ridley, respecting the "Natal Scandal," which we printed last week, Mr. F. J. Aldrich-Blake says:

"So far is the Bishop of Natal from shirking a proper trial that he has repeatedly expressed to the Bishop of Capetown his readiness to submit to such before a duly constituted ecclesiastical court, and has absolutely offered to head a subscription himself to bring before such court the question, whether in his publications he has or has not transgressed the limits of teaching allowed by the latest decisions of the Court of Arches to the clergy of the Church of England. He has all along declared his willingness to submit to trial before the Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury, but has refused, as I suppose every man with a grain of sense would refuse, to submit to the decision of any archbishop sitting merely in foro domestico. What he claims is to be tried by the laws of his country, and he is ready to abide by the result. I am at a loss, therefore, to understand, how any Englishman, who values the protection of the law as being that by which not only his property but his liberty of thought and action is secured to him, can wish to see this claim trampled under foot, as it must be and is when attempts are made to deprive a bishop of all his rights by persons who, abhorring the lay element which exists in our ultimate Court of Appeal, rather than seek a decision which might possibly be adverse to them, choose to consider their own sacerdotal opinions as of higher authority than the laws of their country."

In a letter to the Rock with reference to some remarks it had made on a speech of his, Dr. Temple says:

"I should like to say that I am a thorough Protestant. I look on Popery as a most mischievous delusion. I may not, perhaps, think that Protestants are always wise in their mode of attack, but no one goes beyond me in hearty desire for the advancement of the cause of true Protestantism. But I am sure that if there is one thing which beyond all others will advance that Church in Ireland, it is to disestablish the Irish Church. The Irish Church established has made no impression on Popery for three hundred years. Disestablish it, and I shall be much surprised if in thirty years the Roman Catholic priests will not wish that it had been left alone."

In some remarks on the Archbishop of Armagh's damaging defence of the Irish Establishment, a correspondent of the Pall Mall observes:

"The Archbishop's fears involve a lower view of the zeal and devotion of the Irish Church than I should myself be disposed to take. It has been said again and again that the Established Church commands all the wealth and intelligence of the Irish people. If mere numbers are with the Roman Catholic Church, all that can make numbers formidable is with her Protestant rival. And yet, what the poor multitude do without a murmur or a boast seems to be altogether too much to expect of the rich few. 'The voluntary system,' says the Archbishop, 'is incapable of adequately supplying with the means of grace' the scattered Protestants of Ireland. No wonder the Irish Establishment has failed as a 'missionary Church.' If she cannot make the sacrifices necessary to retain her own members, she is not likely to do much in the way of conversion. The flame of proselytising zeal is sure to languish when it is not fed by the charity that begins at home."

But, even granting that the Archbishop's expectations will be fulfilled, we can surely yet

"Deny that our conduct ought to be governed in the smallest degree by any consideration of the kind. If we wish to see no diminution in the ranks of the Protestants of Ireland, we have a perfect right to employ our money and our influence in preventing such a result. But we have no business whatever to use for this purpose the money or the influence of people who are either indifferent or favourable to the change. Yet this is in effect what the Archbishop asks us to do. He lays down that one end of the State Church in Ireland is to keep certain persons Protestants who would otherwise become Roman Catholics. But he forgets that the country which maintains this State Church is, by an immense majority, Roman Catholic, and consequently that this particular appropriation of national property is necessarily an object of national dislike. Englishmen would hardly consider it a valid reason for establishing Roman Catholicism in England that, without such a measure, many Roman Catholics are in danger of lapsing into Protestantism; and, with all deference to the Archbishop of Armagh, I do not see why the converse argument should have any greater weight in Ireland. Of course a majority of the people of the United Kingdom have the power, if they think fit to exercise it, of applying Irish funds to any purpose they choose. But, unless this power justifies its possessors in dismissing all considerations of right and wrong, they are bound not to apply those funds to a purpose which is repugnant to the great body of the Irish people. If the Archbishop of Armagh were trustee for a Roman Catholic family, I should have no doubt as to his recognition of this truth. It is a pity that when the cestui que trust is a nation, he should be so much less to be depended on."

Dean Stanley preached at Westminster Abbey, on Sunday afternoon, from the words, "Let both grow together until the harvest." Having explained the reasons why the word "Catholic" was added to the creed, he deprecated the use of party names either in politics or religion, for every one knew that all those names had lost the meaning which was originally attached to them. He did not deny the necessity there was for party, nor, indeed, some of the advantages which arose out of it; a State without party, or a Church without dissensions and differences, would not be a living thing. Such dead Churches and States there were, but neither the State of England nor the Church of England was one of them. The great duty of the people was to see that these differences were not pushed to extremes or excess, remembering that, after all, their divisions were artificial and superficial rather than deep or permanent. Let them look to the names by which any of these parties are designated, either political or religious—he could not attempt to enumerate the long catalogue—but how trivial they were in their origin—how shifting in their meaning—how difficult to get into the actual facts of the case. Party watchwords, like party colours, changed from generation to generation, until at length they were used without any intelligible appreciation of their meaning, the widest differences being found amongst those who knew the least and talked the loudest. The result of all this, however, should not be to lessen any man's interest in Church or State, should make him not the less eager to defend what he considered good, or to reform what he believed to be evil. None should be unduly anxious for fear of the things that were coming upon the earth, but rather hopeful, knowing that the night was far spent and that day was at hand.

In noticing a collection of Hymns and Sacred Songs entitled "Lyra Anglicana," the Pall Mall singles out a poem by the Rev. R. Winterbotham, in which he thus apostrophizes a communion-table:

"O altar, low beneath thy shade
I still would lie, nor be afraid
To watch beside thee through the night,
Or trace thee by the moon's pale light."

On which our contemporary's remark is:

"This is an example of the sort of religious sentiment which is often supposed to indicate a great advance on the point of view of the eighteenth century. Dr. Watts's creed was not wide, nor was it tender; but, at least, it was not inconsistent with a manly temper. It is in no respect an advance on his mental attitude towards divine things to be haunted by fears of 'the dark,' and only supported by the presence of a wooden structure covered with velvet or baize."

With regard to his singling out certain men as the saints of the nineteenth century, Mr. Llewelyn Davies writes to the Guardian:

"There is something which must seem a little odd in the selection which the John Bull reports me to have made of four persons—Arnold, Robertson, Hedley Vicars, and Lincoln—to represent the saints of this century. The way in which I came to mention these persons, with others, was this. I was speaking of the influence of the biographies of good men in encouraging others to follow them, and named as examples certain lives which had proved interesting to the present generation of English Christians. The first was that of William Wilberforce, in speaking of whom I incidentally mentioned President Lincoln. I then referred to the lives of Havelock and Hedley Vickers, to those of Arnold and Robertson, and lastly, to that of Baron Bunsen. But I expressly guarded my hearers against concluding that the persons of whom we have interesting biographies were necessarily the best of their age."

The Times reports the Flying Dutchman of English politics in view. It is just the sort of weather for the apparition. While everything is driving along with bare poles, "Convocation" suddenly appears, a quaint ship, of ancient build, with every stitch of canvas set, flying jib, sky-scrappers, and all, labouring not the least, and hardly bending to the blast that would send the masts of any other known ship in an instant over the side. Men of flesh and blood are careful how they deal with so questionable a form. The Convocation of Canterbury, which haunts the Jerusalem Chamber, Dean's-yard, and the cloisters, is the fata morgana cast on the monastic buildings from the opposite Parliament Houses. That is but a shade, and the Convocation of York is a still fainter, and, if possible, still less substantial, shadow of it. It has no other entity than that it has a name. It stands for nothing. It does not represent a Church. It does not represent a single layman. It does not represent even the clergy. The first condition of the representation is that nobody shall be returned with the least particle of independence, or prudence, or other qualification for giving an opinion. Dr. Vaughan, of Doncaster, is preeminently a moderate, independent, and conscientious man. But Heaven has endowed him with reason and moral qualities;—he is manifestly unfit for Convocation. What right has he there? He has mistaken his place, and is accordingly requested to retire. These Convocations observe the pious form of invoking the Divine aid and the presence of the Holy Spirit in their deliberations, but the invocation and its possible results are anticipated by the choice of men compelled to vote just as they have been bid, not allowed an opinion of their own, and forbidden to listen to reason should it haply be offered to them. These impetuous and impatient gentlemen overlook the fact that the great question upon which they wish to pronounce a solemn negative is already decided, first by the House of Commons last spring, and then by the reformed constituency just now.

The Madrid correspondent of the Morning Post says:

"The Spanish bishops show no gratitude to the Government for their dangerous resistance to the popular demand for the separation of the Church from the State. They appear to be of opinion that the religious tolerance proclaimed by the ministry is a crime without extenuating circumstances. They are availing themselves to the utmost of the liberty of the press denounced in the syllabus, and anathematised by them in their palmy times of two months ago. They have kept up a running fire of pastorals, petitions, and published sermons, and have hewed away, like doctors in theology, as they are, in pamphlets and flying sheets, but all to no purpose. If there be anything in which the mass of the nation, in the great cities at least, is unanimous, it is in their persistent aversion to Isabel De Bourbon, and their hostility to the episcopal influence she protected. They have lived to see public Protestant worship installed in the great centres of population. Here, in Madrid, it has been organised by a committee of foreigners, consisting of French, English, Swiss, and German Protestants; the latter are very numerous."

At the "inauguration" of a font, given by Lord Dudley to St. Thomas's Church, Dudley, the Rev. D. Melville, who preached on the occasion, said, "Baptism was taking off the old Adam, and putting on the new; in fact, it was regeneration." A mighty effect, it must be admitted, to be produced by the sprinkling of a few drops of water from the hand of a "priest."

The Watchman furnishes a pretty good set of reasons for the attitude of hostility to the Church, which some of the Wesleyan Methodists have assumed in the late elections. It says:

"Some of the clergy have to thank themselves for it. They have denounced us as schismatics, they have ignored our Church status, they have treated our ministers as laymen, they have rebaptised our children, they have refused to bury our dead, they have driven our children from the national schools because their parents wished them to attend their own Sabbath-school, they have prevented us obtaining sites for schools and chapels, they have dismissed Methodist servants and ejected Methodist tenants, and they have threatened to prosecute our missionary collectors under the Vagrancy Act!"

ADDINGTON CHURCHYARD, NOVEMBER 3, 1868.
They laid him in his village grave;
No scutcheon'd car, no plumes were there!
But all that he desired to have,—
Child, Friend, and Priest—Love, Faith, and Prayer.
Rare summer blossoms graced his pall,
From Regal store and gardens rich,
While Autumn, in her pride of "fall,"
Lent skies that soothe, and winds that sigh.
For, as we tracked, in air, his bier,
Upborne to church, through glade and dell,
From oak and beech what seemed a tear
(He loved his trees!) leaf sheltered, fell.
And well the woodland emblems suit,—
Seed, bloom, nut, acorn, all were gone;
So he had yielded up his fruit,
And then "went home," his "duty done;"
Bequeathing to its kindred earth
The husk that had contained the grain;
Still waiting for that other birth,
Where Life rules Time, and Death lies slain.

THE SCHLEIERMACHER FESTIVAL.

THE following abridgment of a letter from Berlin to the Manchester Guardian will be interesting, we think, to not a few of our readers.

On Saturday, Nov. 21st, the centenary of the great theologian's birthday, a large assembly of the literary and the learned met in the hall of the University, to hear an oration by Professor Twesten, in honour of Schleiermacher's memory. Besides Dr. Von Muhler, the minister of public instruction, and Count Schwerin, Schleiermacher's son-in-law, representatives of all the sciences, as well as of every party in the Church, were present. It was curious to see men of the strictest orthodoxy, such as the General Superintendent Buchsel and the Court Chaplain Hoffmann, sitting peacefully with others of the most liberal tendencies, such as the clergymen Sydow and Lisco, to testify to their respect for the same great thinker; and perhaps the choice of Psalm 133, with which the ceremony was opened by the students' choir, was a slightly humorous allusion to this phenomenon—"Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.") At all events, clerical brethren met on that occasion who do not often meet elsewhere. Professor Twesten had sat at Schleiermacher's feet in his student days, and could speak of him with feelings of personal reverence. As was most natural, however, at such a place and under such circumstances, he addressed himself more particularly to Schleiermacher's work as a philosopher and theologian, of which he gave a learned analysis.

At the Church of St. Nicholas, the use of which had at first been refused, but was afterwards granted on condition that no regular liturgy should be used on the occasion, the Rev. Mr. Thomas delivered an oration, in which he took for his theme Schleiermacher's life as a citizen and a man. The subject was almost too comprehensive for a single lecture, but the speaker accomplished his task very successfully, and completely rivetted the attention of a large audience, concluding with the observation that "a higher wisdom had refused their commemoration the character of a religious ceremony, but he hoped that their silent prayer in memory of the dear departed would remind them of the words, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

Schleiermacher is little more than a name for the great majority of Englishmen, and perhaps some of your readers may be inclined to ask who this man was, that the Germans should make so much fuss about him. Anything like an adequate answer to that question would require a book rather than a paragraph, but I will just allude to a few of the most prominent passages in his life. Friedrich Schleiermacher, the son of a Protestant clergyman, was educated at the Herrnhut establishment at Barby, in all the rigorously orthodox tenets and ascetic habits of that sect. Possessing a very active and inquiring intellect, he could not remain satisfied with the cramping spirit of the place, or accept all its instruction on mere authority, and, after a severe mental struggle, involving a conflict with his father, he left Barby, and studied at the University of Halle. He took holy orders, spent three years as private tutor in the family of Count Donha Schlobitten, became curate of Landsberg, and two years later, in 1796, chaplain to the principal hospital in Berlin, where he remained six years. During this period he formed an intimate friendship with Schlegel, Fichte, the two Humboldts, and other leading men. He also published his first great work entitled "Discourses on Religion" (1799), and the "Monologues" (1801), the former of which is considered as forming quite an epoch in the religious life of Germany. The salient feature in this, as in all his writings, is his impatience of all externally imposed control in matters of faith. Religion for him consists in a profound feeling of man's relations to God, rather than in the acceptance of certain dogmas. In 1802 he accepted the living of Stolpe, a little town in Pomerania, and in 1806 he was appointed to a professorship, as also to the university chaplaincy, at Halle. In 1808 he came into unpleasant contact with the French who plundered Halle, and quartered soldiers in Schleiermacher's house. The sufferings of his country under foreign oppression roused all Schleiermacher's passionate indignation, and from that time he hardly distinguished himself less as patriot than as a profound thinker and eloquent preacher. In 1808 he returned to Berlin, as he could not consent to remain in Halle after that city had passed under French sway, as part of King Jerome's kingdom of Westphalia. He was immediately appointed preacher at Trinity Church, and two years later professor of theology at the then just established University of Berlin. He retained both these offices till his death, in 1834. These twenty-six years were a time of never-flagging industry as a theological and philosophical writer, of unwearied activity in the cause of his country until she came off triumphant in 1815, and of many a painful struggle in the defence of religious liberty after that date. Each of these phases of Schleiermacher's life would constitute a great subject in itself. With regard to the first of them, I will only name his translation of Plato's dialogues, with introductions; his Essays on the First Epistle to Timothy, as also on Luke; his Thoughts on German Universities; his great work on the Christian Faith; and many others far too numerous to mention. Considered as a patriot, he not only did good work in the pulpit, by keeping up the spirits of his countrymen, then labouring under the pressure of a foreign yoke, and by inspiring them with faith in the justice of God who one day would bring their deliverance, but he also set them a practical example, stepped into the ranks as a militia-man, and shouldered his musket like the rest. On one occasion he undertook an extremely dangerous and secret mission to the Prussian King, then living at Königsberg. At a later period that same King looked on Schleiermacher with very different eyes. And here I come to the third side of Schleiermacher's many-sided life. His strong condemnation of the connection between Church and State, which he regarded as fatal to the spirituality of the former; his new views on many points of doctrine, and the freedom with which he maintained them; as also his very Liberal politics, had made him obnoxious to the orthodox and bureaucratic spirit prevailing in high places. Among other bold acts, he openly contested the King's right to impose on the Church a liturgy of His Majesty's own composition, and joined eleven other clergymen of Berlin in a solemn protest against it. In short, he became a persona ingrata, and was regarded with such suspicion at court, that at one time he lived in almost daily fear of arrest. One thing probably had a considerable effect in protecting him from extreme measures, and that was the intense love and admiration with which he inspired his large congregation, including many of the first names in rank and intellect.

Though Schleiermacher and Hegel were colleagues as professors at the University of Berlin, they were not friends, and I believe met only on one occasion. Some mutual acquaintance purposely brought them together at an evening party, in the hope of witnessing an intellectual tournament between the somewhat massive, brusque, and imperious Conservative philosopher and the more refined, Platonic, and very Liberal theologian. Of the details of the wordy duel that ensued I know nothing more than that Schleiermacher answered a long speech of Hegel's with the observation, "Ah, I see you are a Philister," an offence which Hegel never forgave. Your space would not allow of my touching on Schleiermacher's philosophical opinions; but the above jottings may suffice to show that it was not only the philosopher, but quite as much the man, for whose memory Protestant Germany entertains such an enthusiastic affection.

AMERICAN NOTES.

A large meeting was held a few weeks since in New York, to promote the free-seat system in all Episcopal Churches. The Bishop of Tennessee urged in a forcible manner that, although the mandate of the Saviour was to preach the Gospel to all, under the pew-renting system the poor were as effectually excluded from the privileges of the Gospel as though the Church doors were deliberately and wilfully barred against them. What could be more contradictory than to see Christians consecrate to God, or give away to His service, a house of worship, and the next moment sell out to the highest bidder the Lord's property?—The Bishop of Wisconsin referred to an ancient Syrian temple, which for century on century, whether used by idolaters, Mahomedans, or more modern Christians, had ever preserved absolute freedom to its worshippers, and, let it pass to whom it might, it would never lose its character until it should fall into the hands of the Episcopal Church. The time is coming when the Church will no longer submit to be ruled by wealth, and if in its upward march Dives is found in the way, so much the worse for Dives.—The Bishop of Maine stated that this movement of free churches was at the very foundation of our religious organisation. The time was coming when Christian men would rise up and declare that God's house shall be free, and that no man would contribute a dollar to build other than free churches. Are there not Christian men who will stand up for this principle? If the clergy will come in close relations with the people, no question of support can ever arise. One thousand of the poorest people that can be got together will always be sufficient to sustain a church. He believed his dream of a large church, open to all, was soon to be fulfilled, and both in words and works would he always be found devoted to the perfecting of these grand and noble results, the greatest the American people have yet seen.

The Rev. John Anketell, who dates from "St.

Paul's Rectory, Havana, N.Y.," in a letter to the Guardian, asks a question, which those who are acquainted with Church History know can only be answered in the affirmative. He thus writes:—

"I notice that a recent correspondent of your valuable paper has well said that 'the Roman Church committed a most unwarrantable act when she tacked on to the Nicene Creed that of Pope Pius IV. But permit me to ask whether the words 'and the Son' (Filioque) have not been interpolated without any warrant from an undisputed General Council, and against the constant protest of the Orthodox Eastern Church? I venture to ask this, because six of our dioceses (Alabama, Indiana, Maine, Missouri, Western New York, and Wisconsin) voted last summer Synodically (and all but one unanimously) for a restoration of the true text of the Nicene Creed; and I doubt not that we shall ultimately carry the measure."

The Liberal Christian informs us that the Rev. T. K. Beecher is considerably exercised because of the growing disposition to draw the denominational lines, particularly between Presbyterians and Congregationalists. "Presby-tweedledum—Congreg-tweedledee, and yet there are churches about to go asunder, and there are loving brethren becoming estranged, because of this poor dum and dee."

It appears that Bishop Clark, of Rhode Island, has recently ventured to violate the canon under which the Rev. Mr. Hubbard, a short time ago was tried, by inviting a Moravian Bishop to sit with him in the chancel and take part in conducting the service, at Elizabeth town, New Jersey. After all, Bishops, we suppose, are but men, and liable to human sympathies.

In an address given by the Rev. C. H. Dall, the American Unitarian missionary to India, he mentioned that Unitarianism was first introduced into that country in 1813, by a native who became convinced of the truths of that doctrine while in England. He was baptised under the name of William Roberts, and his son [who was educated in England] by the same name is now engaged in carrying forward the work which his father began in Madras. Besides this chapel there are three other places of Unitarian worship and ten schools in India. Mr. Dall comes daily in personal contact with about two hundred young men in these schools.

The Rev. James Martineau, having been invited by the Alumni of the Cambridge Divinity School to preach the annual sermon before them next summer, has declined the invitation in the following letter:

"In these days of rapid mental change it is so rare a privilege for a veteran to retain any hold of the confidence of a younger generation, that he may well hesitate before he declines the opportunity which they generously offer him, of speaking to them, and conversing with them, on the Divine lessons of the time. But though nowhere in the world could I find myself in more congenial society than among the Alumni of the Harvard Theological School, on whose roll are many of the names I love and honour most, yet I plainly see that my duty is to stay at home. Were I only a minister, temporary leave of absence might be attainable at any required time. But having besides professional duties which can be neither suspended nor deputed, I am bound to the academic terms and examination; and as these are concurrent in Harvard and in London, I cannot be at liberty for engagement at both. I am, moreover, but a bad traveller. I am accustomed at home to retreat from the summer heats to the Scottish Highlands. And I fear I should hardly have physical energy to make effective use in the United States of the two hottest months of the year, from the middle of July to the middle of September, the only time at my disposal. I am constrained, therefore, to forego the idea of visiting New England; and must be content with expressing my heartfelt thanks for the honourable trust reposed in me. I can attribute the selection only to this: that while not untouched myself with the Conservative spirit of the older generation, I have never been afraid of the newer movements of thought and faith, but have owned their function as the indispensable centrifugal forces of the world, which the Spirit of God still holds to a common centre, and will reduce to some symmetrical place at last."

WESLEY'S VIEWS ON THE PRIESTHOOD.

Much misconception with regard to Wesley's views on ministerial orders and prerogatives exists even among his followers, and several High Churchmen have recently been trying to take advantage of what they supposed to be his opinions, and use them in support of their own system. The English Churchman, for instance, not only makes him out to have been an upholder of the doctrine of "Apostolical Succession," but also to have vouched for the "threefold order" of ministers, and for an "outward priest-hood," ordained and authorised to offer "an outward sacrifice;" and in support of this misrepresentation, for such it is, it gives a quotation from the "Church and State Handy Book," which seems clear enough. But Dr. Rigg, in a letter to the Guardian, by a very plain tale puts the matter to rights. He says:

"It is equally certain that the passage quoted in the English Churchman was really written by Wesley, and yet that it is in complete antagonism to his deliberate and matured conclusions on all the points involved, as consistently held by him for more than five-and-forty years, and until his death.

"The passage quoted may be found in a letter written by John Wesley to his brother-in-law, Hall, under date December 27, 1745. It so happens that this is precisely the last utterance on the part of Wesley of those exalted High Church principles which he had imbibed at Oxford, which he carried with him to Georgia, and which he began to unlearn from the time of his embracing the doctrine of justification by faith, under the instruction of the Moravian, Peter Böhler, after his return from Georgia. With these principles he parted reluctantly, one after the other. And within a month after the date of the letter from which the quotation is taken, he found himself compelled to give up even those ideas of ecclesiastical order and prerogative, which cling to many clergymen with a kind of immortal tenacity, which at the present day are held by not a few ecclesiastics who, in all other respects, belong to the Evangelical Low Church school.

"I say this is precisely John Wesley's last utterance of ecclesiastical High Church principle, as strictly and truly defined. On the next page following the letter from which the quotation is taken, under the date 'Jan. 20th, 1746'—that is, within a month after the date of the letter—may be read the following entry:

"Monday, 20th, I set out for Bristol. On the road I read over Lord King's account of the primitive Church. In spite of the vehement prejudice of my education, I was ready to believe that this was a fair and impartial draught. But if so, it would follow that Bishops and Presbyters are (essentially) of one order; and that originally every Christian congregation was a Church independent of all others."

"Wesley learnt his lesson once for all. 'The vehement prejudice of his education' having once been overcome, he never afterwards faltered in his views. From this time to his death in 1791, he was, as I have elsewhere said and shown, 'a very Low Churchman, holding what were virtually Presbyterian views, only that they were held with a freer and larger liberality than is common among Presbyterians.' He always dated his final change of ecclesiastical principles from his reading the tract of Lord King (who became Chancellor before he died)—that is, from the 20th of January, 1746. Writing to Dr. Coke in 1784, Wesley says, 'Lord King's Account of the Primitive Church convinced me many years ago that Bishops and Presbyters are the same order.' Writing to his brother Charles in 1785, he declares 'As to the 'uninterrupted succession,' I know it to be a fable which no man ever did or can prove."

"In a letter to the London Chronicle, which he sent under date February 19th, 1761, and in his 'Roman Catechism and Reply Thereto,' he distinctly denies and he refutes (at least to his own satisfaction and to mine) all the points which, in the passage cited in the Church and State Handy-Book, in the English Churchman, and by Mr. Fraser, he upholds.

"To quote such a passage, therefore, as evidence of Wesley's views, is altogether unfair and misleading. Such were his views as an Oxford High Churchman; in truth, he held, from 1735 to 1740, views as ritualistically exalted as those of any Romanising Ritualist of the present day. But from the day that Wesley embraced the doctrine of justification by faith, these views began to die out of him. And before the summer of 1746 he had fundamentally and finally renounced them all."

LITERARIA.

We are glad to see that the Rev. G. W. Conder, of Manchester, in compliance with numerous requests, is printing in a very cheap form for circulation, the spirited address which he delivered to working men at the Leeds meeting of the Congregational Union. It seems to us well adapted to recommend a greater attention to religious duties than is commonly found among the class for whom it is intended.

The well-known series of Tauchnitz editions of English authors has nearly reached its thousandth volume, and the publisher proposes to make that volume an edition of the Authorised English version of the New Testament, beautifully printed in so-called old-faced type, enriched with foot-notes by Dr. Tischendorf, giving in English the translatable readings of the Sinaitic, the Vatican, and the Alexandrine MSS.

The first volume of a new and complete edition of the Poetical Works of John and Charles Wesley, collected and arranged by G. Osborn, D.D., is now ready for delivery to subscribers. The work is to be in two volumes, and will contain poems of Charles Wesley which have not before been published.

Mr. Clarke, public orator at Cambridge, who has recently visited Ireland, and mixed with persons of all classes and opinions there, has published a thoughtful pamphlet entitled "A Few Words on Irish Questions" (Macmillan), which affords a good idea of the prevailing tone of sentiment and feeling in the sister country. We do not always agree with him in his opinions, but they are presented in a way which renders them well deserving of consideration. He is in favour of endowing Roman Catholicism in Ireland, but seeing that there is no likelihood of this mode of settling the Church question being adopted, he goes in heartily for Mr. Gladstone's plan, and shows that the effect of disestablishment will be, not to weaken, but strengthen Protestant Episcopalians where it has so long been in a languishing condition. Of the general results he says:

"The passing of this measure will be everywhere received as a convincing proof of goodwill on the part of the English towards the Irish people; the great pretext on which agitators have founded their complaints of English tyranny will be removed, and Irish discontent will languish and die away when no longer fostered by foreign sympathy."

The Pall Mall says:

"The Rev. Orby Shipley is to be congratulated on the achievement of an ingenious theological double entendre. He advertises, as published by one of the most eminent religious booksellers, a volume which he describes as 'Preparation for Death,' translated from the Italian of Alfonso, Bishop of St. Agatha.' Who in the world, the simple-minded reader will ask, is 'Alfonso, Bishop of St. Agatha?' And being wholly unaware who is the said 'Alfonso,' he may very possibly be induced to purchase the said 'Preparation,' especially if he is attracted by the additional announcement that the book forms 'the Advent volume of the Ascetic Library.' But what would the same simple-minded reader have done if, instead of 'Alfonso, Bishop of St. Agatha,' the writer of the treatise in question had been described by the name by which he is universally known among Catholics and Protestants alike—namely, Alfonso Liguori, the writer of sundry well-known casuistical treatises, which are held to be most objectionable by all the old school of Roman Catholic theologians, and of sundry devotional works of the most mawkish and extravagantly Mariolatrous kind? Undoubtedly, any editor or translator has a right to advertise his publications under any title, not absolutely false, which may serve to help their sale. But, at the same time, Mr. Shipley can hardly complain if his ruse is detected and exposed. The order of 'Redemptorists,' too, or 'Liguorians,' as they are sometimes called, which was founded by this same Bishop of St. Agatha, happens to be precisely that one of the modern Roman religious bodies which has developed the peculiarities of modern Roman pietism to the most extreme extent. Its system is a species of emasculated Jesuitism; and the canonization of its founder, though it has silenced the tongues of the more healthy and learned Roman theologians and spiritual writers, has proved a painful fact for those who dislike to see a fanaticism something like that of the earlier days of English Methodism authoritatively sanctioned by Rome itself. Whether the English translator has Bowdlerized the original Italian or not, according to Anglican notions of theological strong language, we cannot say. The mere publication of the effeminacies of Liguori in an English shape, whether 'adapted' to the babes and sucklings of the High Church, or presented in their full flavour to the maturer palates of advanced Ritualism, is in itself a sufficiently suggestive sign of the times."

DRUMMERS ECCLESIASTIC.

NEVER in our time, we believe, was the "drum ecclesiastic" beaten so violently and so discreditably by the State clergy as it has been during the late election. It was not unnatural that, with their belief of what the consequences of disestablishment would be to their brethren of the Irish Church, and hereafter perhaps to themselves, they should feel strongly on the subject; but this was no reason why they should disgrace themselves and dishonour their profession, as many have done, by their unscrupulous partizanship, and utter want of charity and discretion. Numbers of them, and those too belonging to the school which professes to be most strict in its morals and evangelical in its piety, have, to say the least, winked at the employment of the basest means of corruption, watched, without a word of reproof voters come staggering up to the poll, helped to put into circulation what they must have known to be thoroughly groundless slanders, and worked upon the fears of the ignorant and timid by statements so mendacious that we scarcely like to characterise them by such terms as we feel they deserve.

Of the manner in which some have exerted their influence, or tried to exert it, we have an example, though not one of the worst, in Archdeacon Pollock, vicar of Bowdon, Cheshire. Our readers may, perhaps, remember that at the last York Convocation he achieved unenviable notoriety by casting foul aspersions on the religious character of his fellow-Christians belonging to the Wesleyan body. This same archdeacon again made himself conspicuous during the time of the election. "A Strong Churchman," who evidently knows that whereof he affirms, complained, through the columns of the Manchester Guardian, that Mr. Pollock, from the pulpit, "denounced in violent terms all supporters of Mr. Gladstone, applying the epithets of unbelievers, atheists, &c., and threatening them with the vengeance of the Great Judge;" and the writer asked "by what right does the Archdeacon vilify me and other members of the congregation he presides over?" The Archdeacon's reply is simple and instructive. He takes exception to the "Strong Churchman's" statement, though it is abundantly confirmed by others, and gives this account of the part of his sermon referred to:

"I said that in a few days many of my hearers would have a solemn duty to perform. It would be well for them to consider anxiously the course they were about to take. Would they range themselves 'against the truth,' or 'for the truth?' in the cause of right against might, or of might against right? for the maintenance of the faith of Christ, or the propagation of the devil's falsehoods? The vote, I said, which they gave at the hustings would meet them at the judgment seat. And let them consider well whether that could be the side of truth, on which every professed atheist, every avowed unbeliever, and every abettor of the Romish superstition was notoriously enlisted."

This is no bad illustration of the sort of presumption to which Evangelical orthodoxy leads. With the Archdeacon conscientious convictions evidently go for very little, if they chance to go against his. It seems not to enter his head that he may possibly be in the wrong. Those who are not ranged with him must needs be "against the truth," and "against right," and engaged in "the propagation of the devil's falsehoods."

It is of no use, we imagine, to reason with a man who knows so little of the subject, or else is so blinded by passion, as to think that Mr. GLADSTONE's measure calls upon us "to violate a solemn national compact, to confiscate the Church's patrimony, to bid our Queen forswear herself, to give new impetus and opportunity to a false and tyrannical superstition, and to cast away, for the first time in our history, our national covenant with God!" and we will only remind him, therefore, in his own words, that such "idle" representations will "meet him at the judgment seat."

Zealous Nonconformists as we are, we yet cannot but sincerely deplore the infatuation which the clergy generally have shown, in again so completely identifying themselves with that party in the State which, in regard to all the great questions of national policy, has been proved to have been invariably wrong, and has ever set itself in opposition to a granting of the people's rights and an extension of its privileges. If they had not allowed themselves to be entirely governed by their passions and their prejudices, they might have seen that the sole result of their late frantic efforts would be to excite the alarm and stir up the religious animosity of the weak and foolish, and so enable them here and there to win a temporary triumph over their opponents, and that the very utmost which they could hope for would be that they might obstruct a measure which it was out of their power to defeat; while at the same time, by lending themselves to a system of malignant slander and uncharitable denunciation, they were taking a sure way to damage their influence with a better and more thoughtful class, who were not to be frightened out of their reason by the "No Popery" cry, and groundless appeals to their fears, like those of the vicar of Bowdon. If, however, they will persist in going against the sense of the nation, as in the present case they are clearly shown to have done, they must expect that the sense of the nation will go against them; and when matters more nearly affecting themselves than the disestablishment of the Irish Church come up for discussion, as assuredly they will do before long, they can hardly hope that the passionate and unreasoning resistance which they have now offered to a great act of justice will be remembered to their advantage.

A DAMAGING PLEA FOR THE IRISH CHURCH.

ON many occasions lately the Irish Establishment, looking at the pleas offered on its behalf, might with good reason have exclaimed, "Call you this backing of your friends? A plague on such backing!" Notably is this the case with the defence put forth by the Archbishop of Armagh, who argued that "the overthrow of the Established Church in Ireland would lead to a very extensive emigration on the part of those of its members who have the means of removing their families, and to the forsaking of the faith of their fathers on the part of many who remained." The Pall Mall says this statement establishes the following conclusions, and cannot be interpreted in any other way:

"The Protestants of the Church of Ireland (for the most part) care so little for their religion that if placed under circumstances in which its ministry is carried on with difficulty they abandon it directly, and select—not this or that other persuasion—but the prevalent one in the neighbourhood; that which it will give them least trouble to join. (These Protestants, of whom this is alleged, are at the same time presumably the most religious and intelligent class in the country.) And so utter is this carelessness that, in point of fact, they are constantly in the habit (much to be regretted) of emigrating to America, where, there being no Established Church, their apostasy is all but certain. In America, however, they only pick up their new religion by chance. In Ireland, if the State ceases to pay their ministers, they will become Papist to a certainty, as the Popish chapel is the only place they can go to. Therefore do not disestablish the Church of Ireland, and drive these poor weak creatures into the worst kind of apostasy. It follows, of course, as a corollary that the fewer the Anglicans in any given district or parish, the greater the necessity for the State paying their clergy therein. In towns and districts thickly populated with Protestants' you might, possibly, dispense with such payment, as the flocks might provide their own pastors without any very distressing self-sacrifice. But the smaller the flock, the stronger reason for relieving it from any exertion on its own account."

Now let Protestants in general mark, we will not say the absurdity of these conclusions—that speaks for itself—but the disgrace which is thereby thrown on their name and religion. In comparison with Irish Protestants the Romanists of that country are on the whole miserably poor. For them, however, the State does nothing, and they decline State assistance, in perfect reliance on voluntary exertion. They emigrate in vast numbers into the States and the British colonies, swarming into parts where they cannot expect to meet with any ready supply of the ordinances of their religion. The priesthood very naturally entertain no little jealousy of the religious results of this vast exodus: nevertheless, they submit to it as one of the inevitable conditions of society in this century. And the result justifies their submission. They probably lose in the first instance a good many of the more careless members of their persuasion. But, in the long run, Romanism follows its adherents, and extends itself by ceaseless efforts and great self-sacrifice over the newly-inhabited portions of the earth. Look on this picture, and compare it with that drawn by the Archbishop of Armagh of Protestant constancy.

And let us remember this also. To the Romanist the frequent ministrations of the priest are almost essential. To the Protestant—and whatever their other qualities may be, Irish Churchmen are Protestants to the backbone—these ministrations are aids to devotion and comfort in spiritual distress, but they are nothing more. The Protestant, with his Bible to support him, is priest in his own household, and may dispense, as far as the substantial interests of his soul are concerned, with that mere outward aid of which he regrets the absence as only a secondary privation. We speak, of course, not of those who are imbued with the effeminate semi-Popery of fashionable life in the present day, but of Protestants in earnest; such as Ireland possesses in abundance; the worthy descendants of those who went out into the American wilderness two hundred years ago (and many Church of England men in the number, as well as Nonconformists), carrying with them their own faith and their own resources to support it, only too glad to be permitted to worship in their own way unmolested, and certainly reckoning very low indeed, in their list of inevitable evils, that of not having their clergy paid for them by the public. Those times are past, but we would fain hope the men themselves have left successors, and that we have better things to look forward to in "Greater Britain" than a rickety ecclesiastical edifice leaning on a Colonial Episcopate Fund, and, in Ireland, than one resting on mere establishment.

It is scarcely necessary to add that we repudiate altogether the caricature drawn by the Archbishop of his co-religionists. Nevertheless, as in most caricatures drawn by men pretty well acquainted with their subjects, there is a certain amount of likeness. There can be little doubt that the convenience of an Establishment for the benefit of a small minority does draw into it, and keep in it, a certain number of half-hearted and very worthless adherents. But there can be as little doubt that numbers of prouder spirits who, under other circumstances, might weigh the spiritual claims of the Church so established with impartial attention, are kept at a contemptuous distance from her by the consciousness that she is a makeshift only—a mere creature of the State—to join which and leave the communion of the true but unendowed Church of the people could not be achieved without a strong sense of degradation.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

HEIMWEH.

ELIZABETH D. CROSS.

How beautiful she lies, and fair
As any lily—braided hair

Dark brown on the white brow,
As cold as marble now!

To the great city she had come,
Where fades the faultless red

Of lip and cheek; last night she said,
"I wish I could go home."

How still she lies—she, who to-day
Thought to have travelled miles away!

Round is the smooth young cheek, but ah, how white!

And white the deep-fringed lids that hide the bright

And tender eyes, too true to roam;
Where is their love-light fled?

Only last night she said,
"I wish I could go home."

The words she spake were sweet
Last night—"Where shall I meet,

Far off, in the strange lands,
Hearts as true and hands

As kind as those at home?"

To-day they found her dead;

Then they remembered the sweet words she said,
And knew she had gone home.

A DONKEY TEACHING PHILOSOPHY.

"Who'd be a donkey?" said a smart-looking horse that was grazing in a meadow, under the hedge of which a heavy-laden donkey was picking up a thistle.

"Who'd be a donkey?" said a cow in the opposite meadow, looking at him through the gate.

"Who'd be a donkey?" said an elderly gentleman, dressed in black, walking, in a reflecting manner, up the road, his arms crossed behind his back, and his stick under his arm.

"Friends," said the donkey, with a very long piece of bramble hanging from his mouth, "you'll excuse my speaking while I'm eating, which is in no way polite; but in order to set your benevolent hearts at rest, I beg to assure you that I'd be a donkey."

"Well, said the horse, 'there's no accounting for tastes. I wouldn't. Do you mean to say you prefer your ragged pasture out there to my delicious fare in here?'

"I never tasted yours," said the donkey, "mine is very pleasant."

"Do you mean to say, friend," asked the cow, "that you prefer carrying that heavy load to living at ease, as I do?"

"I never lived at ease; I am used to my burden," said the donkey.

"I should think, my poor friend," replied the gentleman, "you would be glad to change places even with your master, vagabond that he is. You would certainly escape beating and starvation. I see the marks on your poor head where the blows have been, and your ribs plainly tell what your ordinary fare is."

"Sir," said the donkey, "I am greatly obliged to you for your pity, but I assure you it is misplaced; my master is more of a brute than I am, both when he gets intoxicated and when he beats me. I don't like beating, especially about the head; but it is a part of my lot to bear it, and when the pain is past I forget it. As to starving, there are degrees in starvation; I am many points from the bottom of the scale, as you may see from the delicate piece of bramble I was finishing when you spoke. I believe my master, who cannot dine on a hedge, more frequently suffers from hunger than I do."

"Well, my friend," said the gentleman, "your philosophy is great; but that burden must be too much for you; it is twice too heavy for your size."

"It is heavy, sir; but who is without a burden? You, sir, for instance—pardon me, not for worlds of thistles would I bring you on a par with a poor donkey—you are, as I should judge, the clergyman of this parish?"

"Yes," said the gentleman.

"And you have a family?"

"Yes; six children."

"And servants, of course."

"Yes; three."

"Dear me," said the donkey. "Sir, excuse me again; but what is my burden to yours? A parish, six children, and three servants!"

"Oh! but my cares are such that I am constituted to bear them."

"Just so, sir," said the donkey, "and my burden fits my back. The truth is, sir, I believe—and I would recommend you (once more excuse me) to put it in your next sermon—that half of our wants are created; half, and more than half, of our miseries are imaginary; half, and more than half, of our blessings are lost, for want of seeing them. I learned this from my mother, who was a very sensible donkey, and my experience in life has shown me its truth. With neither of my friends over the hedge would I change places, scornful as they look, while I say it. As for you, sir, let me tell you that a thunderstorm, which will not touch my old grey coat, will spoil your new one; and I advise you to run for it, while I finish my dinner."

AN UNFORTUNATE SCRIBE.

THERE are some punishments in Abyssinia, not recognised by the law, that are sometimes inflicted by the arbitrary will of the chiefs, as flaying alive, splitting down with an axe, cutting up by bits (as a finger or a toe each day), burying to the neck alive in the earth, binding the victim naked on a black anthill anointed with honey or butter (this I only heard of once)—also sewing him up in a fresh cow-hide and throwing him over a precipice. There was a certain defiarta (scribe) I knew, who considered himself the wisest of physicians, would repeat the Book of Job every morning standing on one leg, and passed much time in culling herbs and simples. He had a burning-glass, which he believed to possess infinite and mysterious virtues. Confident in this, he on one occasion offered to Birro Aligas, who was then besieged in a mountain-fort, to set fire to the camp of his enemy on the plain, at the distance of a mile or two, with a sixpenny lens. This being acceded to, with promise of large rewards, the attempt was solemnly made with much prayer, and the result being of course nothing, Birro Aligas, in a fit of disappointment, ordered the poor doctor to be executed in the manner I have last described, which was done instantly.—Plowden's "Travels in Abyssinia."

THE REST-DAY.

O DAY of rest! How beautiful, how fair,
How welcome to the weary and the old!
Day of the Lord! and truce to earthly cares!
Day of the Lord, as all our days should be!
Ah, why will man by his austerities
Shut out the blessed sunshine and the light,
And make of thee a dungeon of despair!

TENTERDEN DISTRICT MEETING.

THE annual meeting of this district of the Kent and Sussex Unitarian Christian Association was held at Tenterden on Tuesday, Nov. 24. The Rev. ROBERT SPEARS preached on The Signs of the Times, from the words, Matt. xvi. 3.

After the religious services, upwards of one hundred persons had tea in the Court Hall, the Rev. E. TALBOT in the chair. The meeting was not so large as it would otherwise have been, in consequence of our Sussex friends being detained by the election going forward for the eastern division of that county.

Mr. EDGAR WINNER, the secretary of the association, stated that though there was not much to report, that little was favourable; two chapels in the district were undergoing extensive alterations—Tenterden and Battle; that the number present from Rolvenden that evening was evidence that the labours expended there had not been in vain; while as to the Tenterden congregation, the attendance had certainly increased during the year.

Nearly twenty were present from Rolvenden, and the anthems which were given during the intervals of the speeches were performed by the Rolvenden choir.

After an opening address from the CHAIRMAN, who gave the sentiment, "Gladstone and Justice to Ireland," the thanks of the meeting were then given to the preacher for his earnest and timely discourse.

Mr. SPEARS, in returning thanks, said that his great object in preaching it was to remove fear, which some might entertain, at the great changes that were going on around us. Such fears had been felt in other ages, when vigorous intellects had proposed more enlightened views, or fearless reformers had sought to remove corruptions. But men became wiser, better, and more religious in consequence of the changes that had taken place, and the foundations of men's faith and trust in God and Christ were made more stable; and as it had been, so it would be.

In proposing the health of Jos. Munn, Esq., the Mayor of Tenterden, the CHAIRMAN, said: Many years ago Mr. Munn, who was candidate for the town clerkship of Tenterden, was unable to take the office because it was objected to him that he had not qualified himself by taking the communion, according to the rules of the Church of England. When the law was altered he was chosen to the office, and honourably fulfilled it many years, and on his retirement was chosen mayor. We had here an instance that if a man will stand by his principles his principles will stand by him—that he will win the respect of men of all parties and creeds who have the opportunity of knowing them.—"Our Sunday School" was responded to by Mr. WALTER THOMPSON—"May freedom, intelligence, and faithfulness to conscientious convictions lead in every land to the removal of unjust distinctions between citizen and citizen, and to the establishment of full religious equality," was proposed by the Rev. R. E. B. MACLELLAN, who reviewed the history of this country for the last generation, and showed what hopes the past gave that the time was approaching when class legislation and the religious ascendancy of favoured sects would cease to weaken the strength of nations, and to be productive of jealousy and division. Step by step the just rights of all, whatever their creed or class, had been advancing towards recognition.—"Education—unsectarian, universal, thorough, and free" was cordially responded to by Mr. COCK (Wesleyan), the secretary of the Tenterden British Schools.—Rev. ROBERT SPEARS gave a long and interesting address on the great doctrine taught by Christ, that there is but one God, the Father.—The following resolution was then proposed by the Rev. R. E. B. MACLELLAN, seconded by J. E. MACE, Esq., and carried unanimously:

"That we have heard with pleasure of the continued interest taken by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in our various churches in Kent and Sussex; that as important and extensive alterations are being made in some of our chapels, we regret that we cannot, at present, raise any funds for missionary purposes; but we trust our London friends will assist, as heretofore, some of our isolated and struggling societies, and that they will especially do all in their power to foster the congregation at Hastings."

The proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

BIRMINGHAM: MINISTRY TO THE POOR.

THE annual meeting (twenty-fourth anniversary) of the Church of the Messiah Ministry to the Poor was held in the congregational room on Monday evening. The chair was occupied by Mr. T. KENRICK, and the meeting was well attended. Among the gentlemen present were the Rev. W. James (Bristol), Rev. J. Wilson, Rev. B. Wright, Rev. S. Bache, Dr. Russell, and Messrs. W. R. Wills, A. Smith, A. B. Phipson, H. L. Osler, Brooks Smith, R. Chamberlain, and W. Kenrick.

Mr. W. R. Wills read the report of the committee, which was very encouraging. The committee had recently taken steps for placing the schools under Government inspection. From the treasurer's account it appeared that the receipts for the year ending August 3, including the balance in hand from the previous year of £26. 19s. 6d., had been £350. 9s. 4½d. After deducting the payments, including £277. 3s. 11½d. for salaries, there was left a balance in hand of £25. 0s. 10d. The collection at the church on Sunday last amounted to £39. 3s. 7d.—The Rev. J. Wilson's report stated that all the institutions were in a prosperous state. Grateful allusion was made to the fact that greater attention was given to the social and physical condition of the people by religious associations than was the case in former years. Poverty, ignorance, enforced idleness, and defective sanitary arrangements were all matters of concern to the minister to the poor. Caution was urged against hasty legislation for the removal of the evils referred to. Allusion was made to the suffering caused to many poor people by the action of the rate-paying clause of the new Reform Bill. The subject of education, and the operation of the Factory and Workshops Act, were named, and the opinion expressed that compulsory education was not a necessity. The report also urged friendly co-operation by all concerned in the employment of young children. Many instances were given of the income and expenditure of poor families, showing the necessity which exists of supplementing, especially in the case of old and sick people, the assistance given by the parish. Examples were given, showing the beneficial operations of the varied agencies. The chapel congregation was much larger than formerly, and consisted mainly of persons who had not been attendants at any place of worship. It commonly numbered about 100 adults, but often extended to from 150 to 200. The week night service was attended by from thirty-five to fifty persons. The Sunday and day schools had also grown in number. The night classes in winter, the mothers' meeting, and children's dinners had been continued as usual. The Temperance Society, Band of Hope, and Lifeboat Crew continued in active operation. Various resolutions—the adoption of the reports, thanks to the Rev. W. James for his services the previous Sunday, a vote in recognition of the services of the Rev. John Wilson, the missionary, and votes of thanks to nearly everybody, were unanimously passed.

LONDON AUXILIARY SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE twentieth annual meeting was held at Unity Church school-room, Islington, on Wednesday evening, November 25th; F. NITTELFOLD, Esq., in the chair.

After an address from the Chairman, Mr. I. M. WADSWORTH, secretary, read the annual report of the committee, from which we give the passages of most general interest:

"Seeing that the association can now number its experience by decades of years, it may be thought well to cast a glance backwards for a moment, and count off the stages through which we have come. The association commenced in 1848, and the present Lord Mayor was one of the first school-visitors. There were then in existence but seven schools—viz., those at the two Domestic Mission stations, Chap-l-street and Spicer-street, and those at the only five other of our places of worship in London then having schools attached, viz., Carter-lane, Deptford, Newington Green, Stamford-street, and Worship-street. The first return of these seven schools gave the number as 780 on the books; the morning average as 445; afternoon ditto, 583; and the number of teachers as 114. In 1854, after an interval of ten years, the schools had increased to twelve, and Spicer-street had added an infant-school to its usefulness. The total number of children on the books stood at that date as 1,004; average morning attendance, 459; afternoon ditto, 619; teachers, 170. It will thus be perceived that, even with the addition of infant classes—which are now becoming pretty general—the schools had begun to decline in their average attendance; whether in consequence of the introduction of infant classes or from some other cause or causes external to the school management your committee are unable to determine. They only know that the experience of the first ten years has not been improved by that of the last ten; for whilst the numbers of schools, scholars, and teachers have each been more than doubled, the average attendance has not increased in the same proportion; the morning attendance especially being hardly half as much again as it was in 1848.

"The returns received from the schools this year—there are now seventeen, including the new one recently opened at Hoxton—are—total number on the books, 1,780; average morning attendance, 674; average afternoon attendance, 1,176; total number of teachers, 258.

A long and interesting report was next read from the Visitors. After mentioning that during the year a school was opened with some promise of success by the Kensington congregation, but upon their removal to Lisson Grove had to be abandoned for a time, and dwelling upon the miserably poor supply of teachers now in schools connected with congregations abounding in people who would make excellent teachers, the report proceeded:—

"The visitors have heard frequent observations from superintendents to the effect that the excessive heat of the past summer thinned the attendance of their scholars very much. Also the old complaint, uttered with a little greater intensity this year, that Church and Dissent alike unite in one thing, that of frightening parents into the withdrawal of their children from our schools on account of our faith. In one district especially, where a new rector and his two curates have been working most assiduously in this direction, their efforts have been 'blessed,' as they will no doubt phrase it, 'with a large measure of success,' and our school has visibly suffered by their sectarian zeal. This, however, has not discouraged our teachers so much as might be expected, for they feel confident that most of the children will come back to them again, as, indeed, in several instances has already been the case.

Among the schools that at a glance presented the greatest signs of improvement may be named Hackney, Mile-end, and Hampstead, more especially the two first. The Hackney school consists almost exclusively of girls, and is conducted entirely by ladies; it professes to be only an adjunct to the week-day school; but this latter is now numbers about forty children, whilst the former numbers about eighty, and the visitor found about sixty children actually present on the Sunday of his visit. It always seems a matter for great regret that there are no gentlemen in connection with the congregation ready to volunteer their services in trying what success the opening of a school for boys in the morning would meet with here.

Much improvement is obvious in the neater and more orderly appearance of some of the schools, though something remains to be done in this respect yet. It seems to the visitors astonishing how teachers, evidently in other matters possessing both taste and culture, can be content to let their schoolrooms remain Sunday after Sunday a practical contradiction to the lessons they theoretically teach. There is no place, not even the chapel itself, that ought to convey in its very appearance more appropriate lessons than the schoolroom. Obviously it should be in it, as far as possible, the model of what is taught within its walls.

Another important remark of the visitors is on the too common practice of reading to the classes:

The habit of reading to the children by the teachers in class is very generally adopted now, but it appeared to the visitors that too much time may be and is often spent in this way. The time for direct class teaching in most schools barely extends to one hour, and many of the classes are exceedingly backward in reading and spelling. Now, if any of these children should happen not to attend a day school, or even if they do, and are yet backward in these rudimentary acquirements, every minute of one or two hours on the Sunday is not too much to give to this object, more especially if the book selected for reading by the teacher and the manner in which it is read should fail to enlist the greater attention of the children. One of the visitors, observing a class of this kind, ventured to take up the class-book and re-open it at the lesson that about eight or ten tolerably big backward boys had been reading. After asking them to spell a few of the simplest words of that lesson, most of which they were unable with the first trial to do, he came to the word 'village.' 'What is a village?' asked the visitor. 'Jerusalem,' said one boy, quite in earnest; 'the sea,' said another; 'the country,' said a third; whilst the fourth would have it that it was a 'big house,' and the fifth that it was a road; not a boy amongst them could at once spell the word. Surely, in a class like this, there was ample room for all the reading, spelling, and questioning that could be got into sixty minutes, without anything else to distract their attention."

The visitors speak with a timidity curiously in contrast to their usual distinctness on a subject on which we should have been glad to have had a frank expression of their opinion:

"In two of our schools the visitor observed that experiments were being made in teaching the children to read the Greek Testament, accompanied at the same time by lessons in the Greek grammar. In two classes of one of these schools, which were being taught in this way, the children, though full young for the study of such an accomplishment, seemed all very much interested in their work, and the superintendent said that they were amongst the best attended in the school. In the other, not only was there a good large class of elder children gathered round their teacher, but several of the other teachers readily availed themselves of the half-hour before the commencement of the school to profit by the instruction as well."

During the year one of the visitors had had an opportunity of visiting a Church school, numbering over two hundred and sixty children, and a Wesleyan Methodist school, numbering over one thousand. The following is their experience as to attendance:—

	No. on Books.	Average Morning Attendance.	Average Afternoon Attendance.	Total.
Church School.....	265	89	135	16
Wesleyan School.....	1,089	220	654	80

"In both these schools the teachers consisted mainly of those who were formerly scholars there, and each of the superintendents stated that there was no limit to the number of children they might have, except that imposed by want of space and teachers. In the Church school the visitor was asked to teach the first class of boys, and in the Wesleyan school he was induced to give the afternoon address and service to the largest gathering of children it had ever been his privilege to speak to. In both these cases the visitor has every reason to believe the superintendents knew he was a Unitarian.—We are, gentlemen, yours most obediently,

"THE VISITORS."

Mr. JACKSON (Essex-street School), in moving the adoption of the report, said he thought, on hearing the report, that the great bane of all our schools is that we are too ready to receive scholars without reference to the number of teachers, and that if we were more particular in limiting the number in accordance with our staff, we should not hear such a miserable report from year to year of the average attendance. The statistics of the schools were not kept with strict accuracy, so that we might form wrong conclusions from the returns. He thought we often aimed at a higher standard than the material we had to deal with warranted. We have, in London at least, to deal with children of the lowest class, engaged during the week in most cases in very laborious occupations. So little time was left for instruction in the Sunday school that it is very sad to see the greater part of the time used up by teachers in reading to the scholars.

Mr. W. N. GREEN (Stamford-street) drew attention to the mode in which the returns from the schools were given, and suggested that the average number of scholars on the books during the whole year should be given, instead of the number at the particular time when the return was made. He found that in London the average attendance in our schools was greater than the average in orthodox schools as given in the returns of the Sunday School Union; and so it was in the country, although in a less degree. Whatever the cause, other schools were worse than our own.

Mr. TURNER (Newington Green) then read a paper entitled "Some Thoughts on Sunday-school Objects and Influences," which chiefly consisted of a review of the controversy in various papers about a year ago on the alleged failure of Sunday schools. The paper was listened to with considerable interest, and was much applauded.

The Rev. H. IERSON, in moving the thanks of the meeting to Mr. Turner for his paper, gave some remarks on the work of the teacher, and said that it might be laid down as a general rule that if the children in a school were not interested it was the teachers' fault.

The discussion on the paper was continued by Mr. N. M. TAYLER, the Rev. T. L. MARSHALL, Mr. CORKRAN, Mr. KING, Mr. WADE, and Mr. BARTRAM, the general tone of the discussion being expressed by Mr. Corkran, that Sunday schools were not a failure; that their influence could not be measured by any statistical returns, and that the grand object to be aimed at is to produce results in character, and gradually and permanently to raise the whole tone of character in the children.

The CHAIRMAN maintained that the work of the Sunday school was moral and religious, and not secular, and that in these times it should not attempt to compete with the day school. The teacher must not be tied down, but should be allowed the utmost latitude, and encouraged to bring to his work on Sunday whatever he was most interested in during the week. There will then be a feeling of sympathy and mutual affection between teacher and children. He thought that in our schools as at present constituted we adhered too closely to past rules and precedents. He suggested that it would be an advantage if one teacher took the same class through the whole school, beginning with the very lowest class and going on with it till it became the highest. The teacher being thus connected with the same class five or six years would gain much greater influence over the children.

Messrs. Wade and Bartram were then requested to continue in the office of visitors for the ensuing year.

It was resolved that an aggregate meeting of schools be held in the summer of next year, similar to that held this year.

The meeting closed with a cordial vote of thanks to the chairman.

CHOPPINGTON.

OPENING OF THE UNITARIAN CHAPEL.

ON Saturday afternoon, November 28th, the new chapel was opened and dedicated. It has been built by Mr. John Hogarth, builder, &c., Choppington; and is a plain, substantial building of brick and faced with stone, in the early English style, the windows being arched and traced with white brick. It is surrounded by a neat wall and iron railing, the latter being the gift of Mr. Wm. Shields, Newcastle. The interior is neatly and tastefully decorated, and holds about 200 persons. At the entrance, a room is constructed on each side of the passage, separated from the main building by movable panels, so that whenever it is necessary these can be made to form a part of the chapel. The pulpit platform at the north end of the building extends the full way across, the pulpit being placed in the centre. The pulpit is given by Messrs. James Hindhaugh and Co., Newcastle, and the Bible and a copy of Sharp's revised translation of the Old and New Testaments by Mr. Pilkington, Newcastle.

The preacher was the Rev. J. C. STREET, who selected for his text, 1 Kings 8 ch., v. 27. He said:

In that chapel they would teach the undivided unity of God; that God was One, not only in person, but in will, spirit, and purpose, knowing nothing of division of purpose, or of essences, but the One living God. They would teach the universal fatherhood of God; that He was the manifestation of absolute and perfect love. They would teach that there was a divine capacity in man; that he was not lost nor degraded altogether, but might become pure and perfect. They would also teach that there was a divine destiny for man. Concerning Christ they would teach his pure and perfect humanity; that he was tempted in all points as they were, and yet conquered; that he was a man who had realised the divine purpose, and become all that God desired. They would enforce, as the sum of all, the great doctrine of the final welfare of humanity. Within those walls they would preach the gospel, not of creed, but the gospel of grand and noble human love. In their worship they claimed the freedom to modify their opinions according to the increasing light of science and reason. Their object was the promotion of peace, of righteousness, of temperance, and goodwill. They dedicated that temple to the high services of Christian and human freedom; and to the promotion of all purposes which could make the world holier, wiser, and better. They would impose no restrictions on those who worshipped within those walls, they could worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences, and the only condition they would impose was that they and their children would never impose any restrictions. He prayed that their temple might bring blessings to youth, to manhood, and to age, and thus make this life more beautiful, and give assurance of the life to come; that it might lead many to righteousness, and do its part in preparing many for the kingdom of their God.

At the conclusion of the service a tea meeting was held. Mr. JOSEPH CLEPHAN, of Gateshead, was voted to the chair. He expressed his deep interest in the Choppington mission, which had received the most cordial and liberal support from all quarters; and hoped that the agencies which had now been adopted at Choppington would have a tendency to reclaim the erring, and convert them into better and more useful members of society. He proposed a vote of thanks to the Rev. Mr. Street for his services in connection with that place.

Mr. ROBT. ELLIOTT, jun., Choppington, warmly seconded the motion, which was unanimously carried.

The Rev. J. C. STREET acknowledged the large and noble support he had received from all parts of the country, and also the very earnest efforts of the Choppington people themselves. Their deep and honest desire for a free Christian church having been so earnestly expressed, the labour of supplementing their efforts had been to him truly a labour of love.

The Revs. J. WHITWORTH and E. W. HOPKINSON and Mr. J. M. PILKINGTON afterwards addressed the meeting. During the evening, Captain Fish and Mr. Baker Ellis entertained the company with instrumental and vocal music. The proceedings closed with a hymn and the benediction.

MANCHESTER: HULME DOMESTIC MISSION. OPENING OF THE NEW PLACE OF WORSHIP AND SCHOOLS.

ON Sunday last, the new Mission premises in Embden-street, opposite Upper Medlock-street, were opened for worship, and for the purposes of the school, to replace the old inconvenient room in Tomlinson-street. The Rev. CHARLES BEARD, B.A., preached morning and evening. After the sermons collections were made, which amounted to £40. 17s. The congregations on both occasions were very large. On Monday evening a tea-party was held, when about 250 persons were present. R. D. DARBISHIRE, Esq., treasurer of the Mission, presided, and there were present the Revs. J. Harrop (missionary), S. A. Steintal (secretary), W. H. Herford, J. Drummond, B.A., Jeffery Worthington (Bolton), and Dr. Beard; Messrs. Richard Aspden, E. C. Harding, J. Francis, H. Bowman, Thomas Worthington (the architect), S. B. Worthington, Thos. Britain, and Dr. Marcus.

The building contains a large schoolroom on the first floor 60ft. by 30ft., which it is intended to use as a place of worship on Sundays. This room is lofty and well lighted on all sides, having an open timbered roof of simple construction, and has a sufficiently ecclesiastical appearance for the purpose for which it is intended. It is approached by a broad flight of external stone steps, and an upper flight arched and enclosed. From the landing of these steps a covered gallery gives access to the class-rooms and cloak-rooms. The ground floor has a second schoolroom, 39ft. 3in. by 30ft., and an infants' school, 30ft. by 20ft., about 14ft. in height, and there is a side staircase communicating between the two floors. On the ground floor are also class and cloak-rooms, boiler-house, heating chamber, coke-shed, &c. The building, though plain, is airy and well lighted, and is considered admirably adapted for its purpose. The various rooms are heated by hot water, but fire-places and flues are also constructed in case it should appear hereafter desirable to use them.

After an address by the CHAIRMAN, who congratulated the Tomlinson-street friends on their now having for their work larger and more comfortable rooms, and spoke of the objects of the mission, which had been begun ten years ago by the efforts of the Rev. J. H. Hutton,

The Rev. S. A. STEINTAL read several notes of apology—one from Mr. Hutton, regretting his inability, on account of distance and press of work, to be present. Another letter was from Mr. H. J. Leppoe, enclosing £10. Mr. R. Nicholson, one of the founders of the mission, and the Rev. J. Wright regretted their inability to be present, and the Rev. W. Gaskell was prevented by a sudden illness.

The Rev. J. HARROP, in a brief address, called the attention of his friends to the fact that their object was not to interfere with the labours of any other Christian agency in the neighbourhood; what they wished to do was to gather in from the streets and courts and alleys, those who at present attended no place of worship. After congratulating his friends that at last they were in their new house, he reminded them of their increased responsibilities, and concluded by some touching references to the associations that linked themselves in his mind with their upper room in Tomlinson-street.

Addresses were also delivered by the Rev. Dr. BEARD, Mr. FRANCIS, the Revs. J. DRUMMOND, S. A. STEINTAL, JEFFERY WORTHINGTON, and, in acknowledgment of the very warm appreciation of his work as architect, by Mr. THOS. WORTHINGTON; after which the meeting was closed with the benediction.

During the evening the choir of the mission sang several pieces of music.

INTELLIGENCE.

AN IMPOSTOR, calling himself the Rev. John Cowan, has just been committed by the Bradford magistrates to prison for a month, as an idle and disorderly person. He has been going about for a considerable time, obtaining help on the strength of various representations, backed by letters from Dr. Bellows and several American consuls. He has been largely victimising Bolton and Bradford friends. "He is well 'got up' for his character," a Bradford friend writes us, "but has a curious twist in his nose which may serve to identify him when he comes out."

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. C. L. Whitam, student of the Home Missionary Board, has received and accepted an invitation to become the minister of Christ Church, Nottingham, on the completion of his studies, and will enter upon his ministry on the 1st of February next. Another student, Mr. Wm. Brunton, has been appointed minister of the Mid-diesborough Congregation, and will enter upon his duties at the same period, as will also Mr. James M'Donald, likewise a student, as minister at Nantwich.

BELFAST TEACHERS' UNION.—A meeting of the Sunday-school Teachers' Union was held on Tuesday evening, the 17th ult., in the Mission Rooms, Stanhope-street; Rev. J. Scott Porter in the chair. A paper was read by James M. Darbishire, Esq., on "The duties of teachers and scholars in our Sunday-schools." Remarks on the paper were made by Revs. C. J. McAlester, J. Jellie, T. Bowring, and Mr. W. Shaw.

BELFAST.—THE CONFERENCE OF NON-SUBSCRIBING MINISTERS AND LAITY.—A meeting of this conference was held on Wednesday, Nov. 25, at twelve o'clock, in the vestry of the Second Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-street; Rev. John Porter presided. Among those present were—Rev. Professor Orr, Comber; Rev. T. H. M. Scott, M.A., Dunmurry; Rev. Richard A. Armstrong, B.A., Bunbridge; Rev. David Thompson, Moneyrea; J. R. Neill, Esq. The minutes of last meeting were read by the secretary, and approved of. Rev. Mr. Armstrong read a paper on "The Nature and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel." The deep and sustained spirituality of the Gospel was beautifully described, and the evidence for and against its Johannic authorship was concisely and carefully indicated; the conclusion came to being that "the disciple whom Jesus loved" was the author of the Gospel which bears his name. A brief discussion followed, and thanks were given to Mr. Armstrong for his paper.

LEEDS.—On Tuesday evening week, the first of a series of winter entertainments was given in the Congregational Hall to the scholars and friends of the Mill-Hill Sunday school. The room was exceedingly full, upwards of 400 people being present. The programme, consisting of music and readings, was very good, and well sustained by all who took part in it.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—A very successful conference of teachers and friends was held on Saturday last at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, to consider two schemes of usefulness, whereby an increased measure of efficiency and a higher standard of systematic class instruction were supposed to be obtainable. John Dendy, Esq., B.A., presided. There were present the Revs. J. Drummond, B.A., H. E. Dowson, B.A., J. Worthington, J. Freeston, and a large number of superintendents, &c., from various schools. The subject of "Competitive Examinations in Sunday Schools" was introduced by Mr. John Jackson, of Stalybridge. These examinations were to be confined strictly to Gospel history, and it was believed by him, that such a plan would benefit the scholars and the teachers, and cause them to be much more interested in the study of Scripture, from the fact of knowing they had something definite to do; and he thought the day had arrived when teacher and scholar should be better educated in the facts and principles of their Christian faith. Mr. Chadwick, the visitor of the association, supported the scheme, because there was not only a great want of Scriptural knowledge in junior classes, but the elder scholars often betrayed it. The scheme was opposed by Mr. G. Smith, Rev. J. Worthington, and Dr. Marcus, on the ground that it was opposed to the spiritual influence of the Sunday school. After a very fair and candid expression of opinion, the Rev. J. Freeston proposed, seconded by Rev. H. E. Dowson, and carried unanimously, that the scheme be left to the consideration of the General Committee, who should report upon this or any such scheme, at the next Good Friday meeting. The subject of "The use that might be made of the leaflet system in Sunday schools," was brought forward by Mr. G. Smith. It is proposed to issue leaflets occasionally, beginning with the New Year, at a very low cost, and adapted for circulation in and out of school, treating upon matters bearing upon Sunday school management, discipline, &c. The meeting closed with singing and prayer.

STOKE NEWINGTON GREEN.—Last week a marble tablet was erected in this old Presbyterian building to the memory of Joseph Mundy Tapp, a trustee, and for twenty years a worshipper there. There are other marble tablets to the Rev. Dr. Price, Mrs. Letitia Barbauld, the poetess, and daughter of Dr. Aikin, and to Samuel Rogers, the poet, who was a trustee for 65 years.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All letters, articles of intelligence, &c., should be addressed to the Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Market-street, and not to the private addresses of the Editors. No anonymous letters inserted: the writer of every letter must append his name for publication.

W. F. AND OTHERS.—We cannot insert notices of the separate lecture, or penny reading meetings of a series, but are obliged to restrict ourselves to a brief notice of the course, either at its commencement or at its close.

NEW CHAPEL AT POOLE.

To the Editors.—Will you kindly allow us a brief space in your valuable periodical to make an appeal to the generosity of the Unitarian public in behalf of our friends at Poole? They are about to open their new chapel, and there is still a deficiency of £500 in the building fund. Very zealously have they striven to uphold our cause, and they have subscribed liberally according to their means. Lay members of the congregation have now for a long time conducted the religious services, and preached courses of Unitarian lectures. If they are hereafter to enjoy the advantage of a resident pastor—which they earnestly desire—the chapel must be freed from debt. We believe the case to be one which deserves a much larger amount of assistance than it has hitherto received. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has, in consideration of the urgency of the case, made a second grant. We shall be happy to receive and transmit the contributions of friends.

A MANUAL OF CHRISTIAN EVIDENCE, containing, as an Antidote to current Materialistic Tendencies, particularly as found in the Writings of Ernest Renan, an Outline of the Manifestation of God in the Bible, in Providence, in History, in the Universe, and in the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. By JOHN K. BEARD, D.D. 8vo. bound. Price 10s. 6d.

CHAPTER I.—Renan's Lineage, Education, Literary Career, and Character: How far is he fitted to write a Life of the Lord Jesus? A list of his principal writings. CHAPTER II.—Renan's Spirit, as contrasted with the Spirit of Christ, disqualified for writing a Life of the latter. CHAPTER III.—Renan's view of the Supernatural disqualifies him for writing a Life of Christ: the miracles of Jesus described, defined, and defended. The Biblical idea of God as the ground of the Biblical view of the universe and of miracle. The natural, the supernatural, the divine. Renan's definition of a miracle examined. The miracles of Christ were subject to scrutiny. Are the miracles ascribed to Christ real? "Prove the miracles." The challenge accepted. The miracles of Christ attested by history and their own intrinsic qualities. The ministry of the Baptist compared with that of Christ supports the miracles. Cont. momentous anti-stationary Saint-Etienne, a French Protestant priest, the Rev. James Spencer; the Founder of ragged schools; a ship Carpenter; a deformed Collier; Conscience among the Gentiles; Socrates, the philosophic martyr. Renan's view of man in his own words. Society and religion make the human race one. Man a progressive being. Supremacy of religion. Conscience the human centre and source of religion; the origin of sacrifices, anticipations. CHAPTER V.—The God of Revelation and the God of Idealistic Materialism: 1. The God of Revelation, God, who is spirit, reveals himself in the spirit of man. The Bible—its character, functions, and specific value. Testimonies from Goethe; Alexander von Humboldt; his brother Wilhelm; Müller, the German historian; Professor Schellius; Chevallier; Bunson; George Herbert. God and the worshipper seek each other. God bears witness of himself, (i.) in the beneficent influence of the outer universe; (ii.) in man his image; (iii.) in conscience; (iv.) in the pure of heart; (v.) in man's spiritual nature; (vi.) in the general tenor of Scripture, by blessing the human race, by giving hope in despondency, by showing consideration for human weakness, by exercising mercy in judgment, by peopling the wide spaces of the earth, by sending out the first emigrant and apostle, by providing the emigrant with a home, by making a covenant with the emigrant, by rewarding the emigrant on account of his domestic virtues, by withholding his retributive hand on account of the righteous, by succouring the abandoned and needy, by making a way of escape for those whom surrender to duty leads into straits, by consoling and assisting the falsely accused, by educating good out of evil. VII. God bears witness of himself in the ancient Hebrew prophets. The call and consecration of Isaiah; Isaiah's testimony to God, and God's dealings with men: (1) the one living and true God, the Creator and ruler of all, is (2) supreme; (3) incomparable; (4) sends good tidings; (5) is the one God Samaritan; (6) shows love and pity toward his children; (7) in tenderness exceeds a mother; (8) challenges his censures; (9) has made man frail; (10) rebukes sin; (11) rebukes guilty rulers; (12) rebukes the mammon worship; (13) rebukes female ostentation; (14) rebukes the intemperate; (15) rebukes impurity; (16) puts the great alternative; (17) is remedial in his chastisement; (18) prefers obedi-ence to sacrifice; (19) gives comfort in pardon; (20) secures the safety and happiness of the righteous; (21) causes the righteous to exult; (22) makes a way in the wilderness; (23) gives invitation and gracious promise; (24) describes his own servant; (25) promises a deliverer; (26) calls forth greeting to his herald; (27) overthrow the foreign oppressor; (28) sets up a King to reign in righteousness; (29) rules with benign results; (30) rathers in the righteous; (31) prepares a universal banquet; (32) appoints Israel's religious teacher of the world; (33) reveals the spirit of man's idealizing faculty, while man himself proceeds from material forces, and, perishing as an individual, lives on only in the furrow which he has cut in history. God as portrayed in Scripture. The self-revealing God described by Dr. Watts. CHAPTER VII.—God bears witness of himself in History: The human race historically traced to the north-east of the Punjab, divides itself and spreads over Asia and Europe in the uncultured Turanians, and the cultured Aryans and Semites, with their descendants in the Hebrews, Arab, Phenicians, &c., on one side, and on the other in the Kelts, the Teutons, the Greeks, the Saxons, the English, the Latins, the Italians, the Spanish, the French, &c. in history, as related by Confucius, Zoroaster, Brahmanism, and Buddhism (specimens of their doctrines), together with Plato, Luther, Bunson, Channing—their several testimonies. CHAPTER VII.—God bears witness of himself in Science: Socrates instructing Aristodemus. Cicero on God, Providence, and immortality. Testimonies from Lord Bacon, Tycho Brahe, John Kepler, Linnaeus, Sir James E. Smith, Orsted, Alexander von Humboldt, Lord Brougham, Professor R. Owen, Professor Huxley, Flammario, Jules Favre, Paul Janet. David Hume's experience of being without God. CHAPTER VIII.—God bears witness of himself in the Literature of the New Testament, and in its Principal Personage, the Lord Jesus Christ.—PART I. The Synoptical Gospels: The scholar's argument for the credulity of the Evangelical narrative is solid, but in applicability and force inferior to the internal argument made to all minds by the intrinsic, moral, and spiritual excellencies of the words and deeds of Christ. How much of the Heralds of the New Testament must be pronounced unimpaired? The Spirit of God in Christ, which produced the Gospels and the Church, still bears witness to both. The one reliable criterion of divine reality applied (1) to assert the claims of history, and to distinguish history from legend; (2) to the Synoptical Gospels considered as supplying materials for a life of Christ; the Synoptical Jesus of Strauss, his outline of the historical Life of Christ, atrocious thereon; but for miracle Jesus would have lost his opportunity of founding the Kingdom of God; (3) the criterion applied to the testimony given to the historical Christ, and specially his resurrection by Paul. PART II. The criterion applied to the Fourth Gospel. Renan's concessions, added to those of Strauss, suffice to attest the reliability of the substance of the Gospel history. The four Gospels are not so much histories as announcements or proclamations; the fourth is expressly an argument conducted mainly by historical instances. The primitive Church declared John to be its author, and known facts tend to confirm the decision rather than to set it aside. The proper task of criticism is not to prove or disprove the Johannine origin, but simply to review the facts with due acknowledgment of the argumentative disadvantages under which it now labours. The Christ of the fourth Gospel is the true Christ. Luther, Lardner, Priestley, Bretschneider, Tischendorf, Reuss, and others speak more or less in behalf of the generally-received judgment of the Church. What the Gospel teaches as to the substance of Christianity and how its author conducts his argument to the effect that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; (1) the origin of Christ and Christianity being in God, the religion is universal in aim, spirit, tendency, and effect, and, consequently, will become universal in prevalence; (2) the evidence of John the Baptist that Jesus is the impersonation of the divine tenderness; (3) the acceptance of that testimony by disciples of the Baptist; (4) beautiful illustration of John's testimony in the miracle at Cana; (5) argument from the expulsion of the traffickers from the Temple; (6) from the conversation with Nicodemus; (7) the universalism of Jesus in contrast with the localism of the Samaritans; (8) the cure of one of Herod's courtiers; (9) the restoring of the Bethesda paralytic to soundness; (10) the feeding of the five thousand; (11) the rescue of his disciples by Jesus walking on the sea; (12) the resurrection of Lazarus and the resurrection of Jesus; the former remains entire after two assaults by Renan; the latter illustrated and confirmed by (1) natural circumstances attending it, and (2) natural circumstances following it. Evidence of Clemens Romanus, Polycarp, the Epistle to Diognetus, Justin—Conclusion.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Melbourne Argus says that the Wesleyan Methodists in the colony of Victoria provide accommodation in their places of worship for a larger number of hearers than the Church of England, and are also ahead of that body in educational matters. Among the Wesleyans, eighty-eight in every hundred can read and fifty-seven write; whilst in the Church of England the proportion is respectively seventy-seven and forty-seven. The Presbyterians occupy a midway position. Out of the 91,000 sittings in the churches of South Australia, the Wesleyan Methodists provide 22,000, the Bible Christians 12,100, and the Primitive Methodists 12,000.

The Italian Government has introduced a bill abolishing the privilege hitherto enjoyed by the clergy of exemption from the conscription.

Pio Nono, it is stated, has intrusted to the learned Jesuit Fathers, Ballerini and Piccirillo, the task of writing the history of his reign. The Secretary of State's archives are to furnish all the documents that may be required by the historians, who have already submitted a sketch of their preliminary labours to the Pope.

According to the Times, the Parliament now elected will represent about thirteen million members of the Church of England, five million Roman Catholics, four million Presbyterians and Dissenters from that body, and about eight million British Nonconformists of various denominations. It is impossible to suppose, says the Times, that a Parliament so elected can enforce any principles or any truths except those in which the constituent communities are agreed.

An M.D., who is a Liberal voter of East Devon, in a letter to the Daily News, gives a curious specimen of the way in which the "screw" is employed by Clerico-Tory landlordism in his part of the country. A form of lease, printed, therefore much in use, came into his hands, by which a clergyman bound the tenant to the following conditions: 1. That he maintain a Christian conduct. 2. That he conform to the doctrine and service of the Church of England. 3. That he support those principles of the constitution commonly called Conservative. The lease also reserves to the landlord all game—hares and rabbits. A Devonshire Liberal has happily put the terms of the lease into verse:

Keep far from off this sacred land,
Dissenter, Turk, and Jew;
Maintain my church's doctrine, and Maintain my rabbits too.
Vote as I vote, pray to my gods,
And see but through my seeing;
In me, at all and any odds,
Live, move, and have your being.

An odd incident is reported to have taken place at a meeting of the Belfast Board of Guardians last week. An old and infirm inmate of the workhouse announced that he wished to change his religion from Protestant to Roman Catholic. The chairman inquired "if the patient was of sound mind;" and that point being settled in the affirmative, a difficulty arose as to the guardians who should act as a deputation to hear the pauper's confession of faith. A Roman Catholic guardian not being at that moment procurable, an Episcopalian and a Presbyterian were selected to act as a watch upon each other during the scene. "Mr. Entwistle and Mr. Tierney then retired to carry out their instructions;" and on their return Mr. Tierney astonished his friends by announcing that their interesting disciple "wished to be a Unitarian."

We learn from the Liverpool Mercury that Mr. William Rathbone, M.P., is grappling with another of those great social questions on which the welfare of a vast number of the lower classes depends. He justly attaches great importance to the regular attendance of children of outdoor paupers at school as a means of checking pauperism at its source; and at a meeting of the Liverpool Select Vestry, last week, he obtained the appointment of a special committee to report on the subject. The plan which he seems to look upon with most favour is the one in force at Merthyr Tydvil, where the guardians pay in proportion to the number of days the children attend certain schools which are under inspection.

The Church papers tell us that Father Ignatius has been presented with an old monastic house and five acres of land, "all in good repair" near St. Albans. So the farce of playing at being monks is, it seems, to be continued.—The "Father" wrote on Tuesday to the papers: "The Bishop of London has thought it right, for good reason of his own, which may shortly transpire, to sever the connection which has subsisted between myself and St. Edmund's for nearly two years." The Bishop's reason, it appears, was a letter of Mr. Lyne's to a lady, in which he stated that he proposed to excommunicate her daughter, and publish the sentence in the newspapers, for having "broken a solemn life vow of obedience" to him, "received and taken in the name of the Most Holy Trinity."

The Church News states that there are to be twelve Roman Catholic sees created in Scotland, and that Dr. Errington, formerly Cardinal Wiseman's coadjutor, is to be Archbishop of St. Andrew's, and the primate.

When it was announced, about a fortnight ago, that the Hon. Colin Lindsay had joined the Church of Rome, the telegraph was set in motion to contradict the statement. In the Weekly Register of Saturday, however, we read: "The Hon. Colin Lindsay, brother of the Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, and late president of the English Church Union, was received into the Catholic Church on Saturday last, by Dr. Newman, at the Oratory, Edgbaston, near Birmingham. Mr. Lindsay was many years in the Indian Civil Service, and was for a long time session judge at Delhi."

A new society, calling itself "The Free Grace Protestant Union," has just been formed, which makes a special appeal for help "to those who love the civil and religious liberties" which have been so long enjoyed in this realm. The committee, "feeling that every lawful effort ought to be used to stir up and keep alive a strong Protestant feeling among the people of this land, are anxious to purchase a first-rate magic lantern with dissolving views"—the object being to "illustrate lectures on the most striking massacres, &c., recorded in Foxe's 'Book of Martyrs,' in order that people may judge of what Rome is by her actions; and that from seeing pictures of what she has done they may know what she would now do if she only had the power." The chief promoter of this original design appears to be the Rev. T. H. Gregg, curate of Cradley, and we hope few would be so uncharitable as to wish to rob him of the credit of it.

The other day, after the proctor to Convocation for Stafford had been elected, a clergyman of the archdeaconry handed in the following protest, though the Archdeacon declined to read it:

"Whereas a considerable body of the beneficed clergy in the archdeaconry of Stafford is averse to the existence of Convocation in its unreformed state, and desires to abstain from any connection with it, I hereby protest against it being supposed that the members now elected represent the opinions of that body, or of the beneficed clergy generally in the said archdeaconry."

The English Independent calculates that in the new House of Commons there are 12 Independents, 5 Baptists, 5 Quakers, 2 Wesleyan Methodists, 1 Calvinistic Methodist, 17 Unitarians, 10 Presbyterians (non-conforming Presbyterians are probably meant), 6 Jews, and 26 Roman Catholics, of whom 1 only, Sir John Simeon, represents an English constituency.

Dr. F. G. Lee, the editor of the Directorium Anglicanum, has retired from the English Church Union, in consequence of its Liberal proclivities. The Church Times cruelly says that to the Union this is equivalent to a gain of at least a hundred new members.

The clergy of the English Church seem to be losing the dignified, gentlemanly bearing which was formerly supposed to distinguish them. A meeting of the Christian Knowledge Society, on Tuesday, was of the most uproarious character, and quite justified the apprehension of a correspondent of the Guardian that the Society's Hall was "in danger of becoming the cock-pit of the Church." The standing committee, having been advised by counsel that the resolution passed a couple of months ago by which it was agreed to hand over £2,000 for the assistance of Bishop Gray's schismatical projects in South Africa was illegal, now resolved to recommend that £2,000 be granted for the promotion of Christian knowledge in Natal, the expenditure to be under the control of the committee. The Rev. W. G. Humphry moved this resolution, and Mr. E. A. Fitzroy, who moved the resolution which has been pronounced illegal, moved as an amendment that the Bishops of Capetown and Grahamstown should have the spending of the money. Archdeacon Denison seconded this, and on the vote being taken it was lost by 765 to 674. The ruling of the chairman, the Archbishop of York, was disputed, and a regular row took place. The Archbishop had to threaten to leave the chair, but ultimately Mr. Humphry's motion was admitted to be carried by a considerable majority. The result of this decision is that the society is cleared from the imputation of subsidising a movement in opposition to the Church of England.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS

In the Sword and Trowel for this month, Mr. Spurgeon writes thus sensibly:—

"To inquirers who wish to know the religious views of Mr. Lawrence, the member for Lambeth, we can only refer them to himself for information. At an election, if a man is eligible in other respects, we cannot discuss his soundness in theology. To do so would be persecution. It is one of our first principles that a man's civil rights are not to be affected by his religion. If the office sought had been that of a teacher of religion, we should have examined the candidate with the Westminster confession; but as the duties were such as any honest Liberal can discharge, we did not note the colour of Mr. Lawrence's hair, his views on the planet Jupiter, or his opinion upon the origin of species. For a horde of graceless Tories to set up for defenders of orthodoxy is a transparent piece of hypocrisy. Their zeal for truth is like the thief's zeal for honesty—very suspicious, to say the least."

In the same publication, Mr. Spurgeon says:

"Our teetotal friends need not be so greatly agitated by our brother's speech. We neither of us have ever designedly said a word to injure the abstinence cause, and hope we never shall. We only wish that such friends could accept our co-operation in their great end rather than insist upon our conformity to their mode of action. Perhaps there may come a day when all temperate men will be allowed to fight the demon of drink in kindly association, and will not fly into bad tempers with each other because they fight with different weapons. Meanwhile, we suppose bitterness must be allowed to wear itself out. We will never put our conscience under any man's heel, be he teetotaler or vegetarian, but we shall in our own way aid all labourers in the temperance cause; whether they like our way or not we shall not rail at theirs."

Blackwood, to which, perhaps, the sunset of life gives mystical lore, deals in terrible prognostications of the things that are to come upon us as the results of the recent election. Sad to think,

"The Scotch constituencies see no benefit in a religious establishment at all. They will probably begin upon their own Kirk as soon as the Irish Church is got rid of; and when they do, neither Mr. Gladstone nor anybody else will be able to stop them."

In regard to a paragraph which we printed last week, on the subject of free seats at St. Andrew's, Wells-street, the Rev. B. Webb writes to explain that "the influx of strangers, many of them coming from mere motives of curiosity, had often excluded the regular worshippers," and that the plan adopted by his churchwardens is "to reserve certain parts of the church until five minutes before the service begins, for the use of such persons as are known to them as habitual attendants," and that then any vacant seat may be occupied by the first comer. This, he thinks, "is a very different thing indeed from a return to the old dog-in-the-manger system of a pew-rented church."

The feud between the two leading parties in the Establishment does not appear to be growing weaker, but rather stronger. At a meeting of the St. John's-wood Branch Church Association, the Rev. C. Campe summed up his remarks by saying that "either the Ritualists or the Evangelicals must go out of the Church." Another speaker stated that only £1,000 more was required to complete the guarantee fund of £50,000. The Record, however, says £3,000, and makes an appeal ad misericordiam, as several of the original subscribers decline to pay up unless the whole amount is subscribed.—The Church Review, of the other faction, says "nothing can be more erroneous than to imagine that because Churchmen of the Recordite stamp are steadfast maintainers of the loaves and fishes, therefore their principles are the best security for the Establishment. On the contrary, their principles are exactly those which deprive the Establishment theory in this country of all basis of common sense or justice."

The Times has discovered that "at least fifteen thousand of our clergy have a great and direct interest in the remodelling of the Establishment upon a voluntary footing, or on the principle of adjusting the pay to the merit and to the work."

"Any man of ordinary personal qualities," it declares, "and willing to do his duty, would be sure to find a congregation ready to give him a good deal more than he gets now." Is the Times among the Voluntaries?

"An admirer of Mr. Gladstone," who is a Tory and always votes for a Tory, but "is not simple enough to believe that Lancashire is Tory too," writes thus to the Guardian:

"The fact is that Mr. Gladstone and the rest of the Liberals were defeated by one man, the notorious Murphy. He is almost a king amongst the lower orders, and his powerful, inflammatory, vulgar harangues are attended with an astounding effect. Whether the man is sincere I do not stay to inquire, but here he is, and no one with a grain of sense will question his influence. If the elections had simply referred to the issues of Tory or Radical, Church and State or separation, Lancashire would have answered differently, and have sent to Parliament probably an equal number of both parties; but, fortunately or unfortunately, the cry of 'No Popery' was raised, the Tories were the No-Popery men, Murphy, sincerely or not, took up the cry, and so vast was his influence that the masses shouted after him, and ousted the Liberals. I am sorry for Mr. Gladstone—so are numbers of other Conservatives; but his well-known Church principles, and his Irish Church resolutions, called forth Murphy, and the violent Orange declaimer has beaten the scholar, the statesman, the gentleman, and the Christian. Let Mr. Gladstone try again when he has settled the Irish Church matter, and the 'No-Popery' cry has been found to be a sham, and he will be returned at the head of the poll. I am convinced he is a sincere man, and a good man; and if he were to stand for this division of the county I would vote for him, for I believe that a good Radical Christian and Churchman makes a better member of Parliament than a fine old Tory of the port wine stamp, who goes to church because his forefathers have gone, and religiously makes up for his frequent nodding during the sermon by next day asking the preacher to a good dinner. I like your old Tory, but I like better a man whose convictions are almost too deep for utterance, and whose private life is a model to copy."

Mr. Joseph Barker gets both stranger and stronger in his defence of the Irish Establishment. That the former of the two adjectives is appropriate, a single proof will show. Writing to the Editor of the Wesleyan Times, he charges him with leaving out several passages from a letter of his, and asks to have the manuscript returned that he may repeat what has been "suppressed;" and when his request is complied with, he telegraphs, "I was mistaken; cancel my complaint;" which leads the Editor to say, "We have added this to our forgiving list of 'seventy times seven.'" And that the latter of the two adjectives was not misapplied, a short passage from his last letter will be sufficient to prove:

"The infidels, like Mill and Bradlaugh, know what they are about, and so do the Romanists; but the good-hearted, well-meaning, Protestant enemies of the Church are under a sad delusion. The friends of temperance among the Churches should especially look to their steps. The leaders of this crusade against the Church are Gladstone, Bright, and Earl Russell. Earl Russell and his friends gave us the beershop system, one of the greatest plagues of our land. Bright, when on the Sunday Closing Committee, betrayed the cause into the hands of Roebuck and the devil. Gladstone has reduced the taxes on the most dangerous kind of wines, and granted to every grocer's shop, and, in effect, to every house in the country, the privilege of turning itself into a drink-hole—a more demoralising measure than even the beershop system. And are these your political gods, ye friends of temperance and Christianity? If ever there was a party inspired by the father of lies, and of all ungodliness and iniquity, it is the movement headed by our modern revolutionary and infidel politicians."

Archbishop Longley's last charge has just been published. It is mainly devoted to the doings of the Ritualists. While admitting their meritorious exertions among the poor and afflicted, he says:

"These cannot undo the great mischief which their conduct and proceedings have caused, cannot atone for every extravagance they may please to adopt, which startles and estranges those whom it ought rather to be their aim to conciliate. There may be zeal without knowledge, and zeal without charity; that charity which refrains from things which are not expedient, even though they be lawful, for the welfare of the Church in general."

Then, after referring to the course which he had taken, when Bishop of Ripon, with the clergy of a church at Leeds, who, among other offensive practices, had adopted auricular confession, and who afterwards behaved honestly in avowing their true principles and seceding to the Romish Church, he continues:

"It is far from my intention to impute to all those who have taken this ill-advised step of adopting the sacrificial vestments any sympathy with Roman error; but I am constrained to avow that there are plain indications in some of the publications which have been issued as manifestoes of the opinions of that section of our Church, that some of its professed members—yes, even of her ministers, think themselves at liberty to hold the doctrines of the Church of Rome in relation to the Sacrifice of the Mass, and yet retain their position within the pale of the Anglican Church with the avowed purpose of eliminating from its formularies every trace of the Reformation, as regards its protest against Romish error. The language they hold with respect to it is entirely incompatible with loyalty to the Church to which they profess to belong. They call it 'a Communion deeply tainted with Protestant heresy;' 'Our duty,' they say, 'is the expulsion of the evil, not flight from it.' It is no want of charity, therefore, to declare that they remain with us in order that they may substitute the Mass for the Communion; the obvious aim of our Reformers having been to substitute the Communion for the Mass."

In an article on Mr. Gladstone's pamphlet, the Rock almost outdoes itself in characterising the present Prime Minister. He is "The accepted leader of infidels."

"The leader of Radical Dissenters."

"The leader of Revolutionary Dissenters."

"The leader of the Popish and Ritualistic party of politicians."

He occupies "a position . . . unparalleled in the records of the most profligate and abandoned statesmanship."

A "man whose whole political life has been a lie."

He "comes forward with a tongue of silver and a face of brass to justify his huge hypocrisy."

His pamphlet is "a further aggravation of the political guilt and infamy of the apologist."

He "degrades the office of a statesman . . . into the condition of a hack."

"Does Mr. Gladstone still believe the truth of Protestantism?"

"The present state of that statesman reminds us of one whose last state was worse than the former."

In noticing the death of Mr. Charles Langdale, one of the representative men of a generation already forgotten, the Pall Mall says:

"Moderation in dogma, a sincere belief in the compatibility of political liberalism with the theological supremacy of Rome, a dislike of foreign Mariolatry and of all fanaticism in devotion, a disinclination to be made the instrument of sacerdotal aggrandizement, a quiet but earnest performance of religious duties, and unbending family pride—these were the characteristics of the class of which Mr. Langdale was one of the most prominent members. They chafed under the political ban which shut them out from the Houses of Parliament, in which they, with their aristocratic prejudices of birth, held themselves pre-eminently entitled to sit. But holding, as they often did, large landed estates, and devoting themselves to country pursuits, they often lived on terms of much social intimacy with their Protestant aristocratic neighbours. Then came Lord John Russell's Durham letter, and everything was changed. The anti-Papal frenzy which that manifesto aroused throughout the country, called forth all the latent esprit de corps of the proud Roman Catholic families, and the game was at once in the hands of Cardinal Wiseman and the ultramontane clerical party. Mr. Langdale took the lead in the new movement, very naturally resolving that he would come forward in defence of a clergy whom he held to be unjustly attacked. From that time the consolidation of the ultra-clericalism in the Roman Catholic body has been steadily carried on. The old school of Catholic laity has nearly disappeared. The bishops and clergy are in almost open hostility to the more honest thinkers of the modern school, and enforce claims which they would scarcely have ventured on hinting at in the days of the Langdales, Stourtons, Cliffords, Welds, Chaloners, and Butlers. Whether the country is a gainer by the change need not be discussed. It is enough to note the fact that the most prominent and highly-esteemed leader of the past has gone to his rest, almost on the very day of the advent to power of the statesman destined to achieve the removal of the one last great injustice under which Roman Catholicism has suffered in Ireland."

In convoking the Ecumenical Council to be held Sept. 8th, 1869, on the Feast of the Immaculate Conception, the Cardinal Vicar affirms, what we were not aware of before, that God "pointed out, and honoured the birth of Mary, by causing it to be foretold by the prophets during a long succession of ages," and that it was "expected by all nations." He says that the Convocation being fixed for the day when it is, "proves that the Church and her Head expect from Mary, the august and powerful vanquisher of death, the graces needed for the restoration of faith, of piety, of morals, of social justice, of peace, and universal prosperity." And attributing to her, as it seems, all Divine Power, he adds, "let us, O ye faithful, unite with the commemoration of the glories of Mary, in the Church triumphant, our hopes for the blessings which the Church militant is expecting from Her: and thus may it be granted to us to hail this Ecumenical Council as an image of the Eternal assembly of the saints."

The Pall Mall pronounces the clergy to be invariably unlucky as to the causes which they embrace:

"Speaking from the experience of the last sixty years, one cannot but see that every measure which they have zealously supported has proved a failure; every step in politics which they have strongly opposed has succeeded; every statesman whom they have worshipped has abandoned them; every proceeding which they have denounced, after their peculiar fashion, not as a mere error, but a crime, has succeeded, and nobody seemed one penny the worse.' They stuck manfully, as a body, by the best of kings, George the Fourth; and his memory now speaks for itself. They opposed as a body the Roman Catholic relief measures, one after another, with far more energy than they now display in favour of the Irish Church. They opposed all relaxations of the laws against Dissenters. They opposed (that is, the great majority of them, although some sort of denial of this has been recently attempted) the repeal of the corn laws and other free-trade movements. They supported Church rates to the last. They opposed the law of divorce to the last. Generally speaking, those who have taken part in the contest at all have consistently opposed every successive extension of the parliamentary suffrage. In short, their entire political history is one of zealous or desperate adherence to unsuccessful causes. And now, whenever we are informed that the clergy as a body are in favour of this or that political opinion, we have a pretty safe prognostic that the opinion in question is destined to defeat. There are two subjects on which the clerico-political mind is now deeply engaged. One is the maintenance of the Irish Church; the other, that of religious exclusiveness in universities. No one can entertain much doubt that both are destined to be broken down as soon as certain obstacles of detail, not of principle, are overcome."

In a farewell address to his parishioners, the Rev. Mr. Pye expresses himself rather strongly of the Church to which his father-in-law, the Bishop of Oxford, belongs. He says, "I firmly believe that what is called the Church of England is not a Church at all; in common language, that it is a sham Church; and as I think it necessary, from what I read in Scripture, to belong to a real Church, I cannot make up my mind to continue any longer in such a system as that which is called the Church of England." Among the circumstances which opened his eyes to the fact that the Establishment could not be "the pillar and ground of truth" were these—that a clergyman, Mr. Voysey, was allowed to keep preaching against the Bible, and original sin, and the atonement; that another preacher openly stated that there is no hell; that another, after saying "seeing this child is regenerate," openly preaches that it is not; that one clergyman says that in the Sacrament the Body of Christ is present, and another says that it is not. "In fact, the law allows every one to teach just what he likes, and so, in plain language, it is all a 'toss-up' what the people in any place may be expected to believe. But can such a system as this be what St. Paul describes as 'the pillar and ground of the truth?' Of course, Mr. Pye can now only regard his High-Church father-in-law as a heretic, and must feel some anxiety as to what is to be his future fate."

The Church News thinks there is no reason to doubt the statement that the appointment of Dr. Tait to the Primacy was made in obedience to the pressure of Royal influence. "If so," it adds, "if indeed Mr. Disraeli allowed his own convictions and principles to be thus overpowered, he has missed an opportunity of winning the enthusiastic respect and esteem of all Churchmen such as never can recur in his lifetime. If he had resigned his office sooner than make such an appointment which his conscience could not endorse, he would have done so amidst a perfect furor of gratitude and honour, which would have tended more than anything to strengthen the confidence of the Conservative party in him."

REVIEW.

The Pilgrim and the Shrine. 3 vols. London, 1868.

FOLLOWING so closely as this remarkable book does upon "Beyond the Church," comparison between them is inevitably provoked. They are both histories of a mind's progress from the old faith to the new: they are both the works of cultivated and thoughtful writers. Yet there is little further similarity between them. "Beyond the Church" was an avowed novel—and, let us add, a very good one. "The Pilgrim" is a collection of letters and journals of two persons, which came into the "editor's" possession a few years ago; and which he pieces together with a narrative. Some reviewers seem to have accepted this account of the book's genesis; but we can hardly do so. The three writers' styles are too much alike not to be akin. The lady's journal is just like the gentleman's, and both of them just like the editorial story. "All the puppies resemble each other—especially Pompey."

"The Pilgrim and the Shrine" is a work of greater talent than "Beyond the Church." It is not, indeed, so readable, nor yet so healthy. It belongs to the critical, carking days of Liberalism, and reads all through just like a new edition of the "Nemesis of Faith." The discordance of its spirit with the tone of to-day, is one more proof of the great changes the last ten years have wrought towards bringing Liberalism from being an anxious and rather wearisome criticism, to be a definite and inspiring faith. But the writer's style is singularly graceful and his thoughts subtle. His descriptions of Californian scenery deserve all the praise they have received; and many a clever passage in his theological reflections carries fire and sword into the enemies' camp. But the Pilgrim with all his freedom is hardly the cool, impartial critic, at whose feet we can reliably sit. He may have got beyond all that ordinary men know, but he has not got there by going through it. One suspects the logical depth of a gentleman who has reduced everything that he understands "to a condition so simple as to be self-evident." (iii. 278.) He has quite outgrown the Bible;* but this is not because he is too far advanced to need any written support. Oh, no! but he finds a higher inspiration in, at first, Carlyle's "Hero-worship," and afterwards is so fortunate as to meet a book "laying the foundation for all future thought, as far as I can foresee its probable course." (iii. 278.) Strange to say, this sacred volume turns out to be old Mirabaud's "System of Nature," or—as Voltaire preferred to call it—his "Sin against Nature." His thoughts are often bold enough to stiffen the hair of the most daring young deacons that ever played croquet.

"The best we can comprehend must ever be the Divine for us. . . . God the absolute is altogether past finding out. Wherefore we elevate the best we can imagine into the Divine, and worship that—the perfect man or perfect woman, surely it is no matter which, since it is the character and not the person that is adored." (iii. 209.)

Far be it from me to bring charges of heresy. I will not cry "Atheist," "Pantheist," because an earnest thinker pauses in reverent silence before the Infinite, and deems all words inadequate to express the great reality. Better for such an heretic than the ready gentlemen who map out the Divine with all the glibness and detail of special correspondents. S. Gregory said, "It is impossible to express Him, and yet more so to conceive Him." But he was a Popish saint, and had not their light.

Yet I do not sympathise with the pervading tone of the Pilgrim's meditations. Why always asking "Is not this false? Is not that doubtful?" If it be doubtful, in God's name let it alone altogether, and give yourself devotedly to that which you are assured is true. We feel a closer sympathy even with Comte and Congreve, when they have a plan to propose or an aim to accomplish, than with these criticising Christians, whose only employment is to perfect their theories and discourage their brethren. They are too intent on proving that there never was anything wonderfully good in the past, to have time for making anything wonderfully good in the future. The fevered seaman in the tropics plunges in the deep because he fancies it a meadow; these men leave the meadow which they tread, to seek another in the deep.

Let no man hide his doubts or deny his difficulties. But do not let him drudge days and nights to ponder them, "and in the endless labour die." Let him go down below them to whatever rock still stands firm beneath his feet, and on that rock let him lay some stones for the great palace of humanity. However dim his vision be, though Heaven itself be cloudy to his eyes, let him still labour on, and higher light shall dawn. Not to those who speculate and argue, but to those who do His will comes the knowledge of the doctrine of God.

On the eve of ordination the Pilgrim, rather than agonize his family by disclosing his doubts, leaves England and the bishop for a West Indian voyage. His earlier history with the growth of these doubts—it would have been the most useful portion of the book—is passed over. From Jamaica he goes to California as a gold digger. Here his wild freedom first makes life acceptable to him; and he pursues his reflections without either parent or parson to snub him. The news of the Australian gold fields calls him thither. On his way, he sojourns in a Pacific island, where a fair young savage falls in love with him—as seems to have been the custom of her sex. At first he desires to adopt the placid life of these islands—apparently out of deference to Mr. Tennyson's authority, as expressed in "Locksley Hall." After a good struggle with himself (the best thing of all his history), he determines that he has a higher part to play than that of a Pacific Lotos-eater, and pursues his way to Sydney. Here the beginning of the end comes speedily.

"The Sunday after my arrival I, for the first time since leaving England, went to church. It was so curious: just like being metamorphosed backwards into a previous state of existence." (Later in life, by the bye, he seems to conform to the customs of an unprejudiced friend of his, who said "I don't go to church myself, but I am very tolerant to those who do.") "In the pew with me was a young lady," who assisted him in the manipulation of his Prayer-book, an art which he seems rather proud of having forgotten. The reader may imagine for himself, at any length which he prefers, the description of her "tall, graceful figure, and rich auburn hair," &c. "During the sermon I detected myself indignantly uttering the word 'Stuff.' I did not know I had done so audibly until I saw her start and look towards me, as if roused from a reverie. She then seemed to listen for a few moments, when I am almost certain I heard her say to herself, 'Why, so it is!'"

A singular occurrence, of course, takes place soon afterwards, and results in his forming her acquaintance. Naturally it is discovered that her "combination of innocence, truth, nobleness, intellect, and devotion, is so perfect and harmonious that every other woman appears to be of an altogether smaller and poorer nature." (ii. 102.) And of necessity, "Epithets cannot describe her. She is not beautiful, but Beauty; not religious, but Religion." Fortunately her insight into character is as remarkable as her other qualities, and the Pilgrim's merits soon awaken the affection they deserve. She reveals it to him with a delicious self-abandonment which male readers will pronounce most improbable, and female ones most improper. He goes to her father's country house, believing it to be unoccupied.

"Looking towards the house, I beheld her standing in the porch beside her father! Surely an illusion, I thought, and advanced with my arms unconsciously extended. Another moment, and she was clasped in them. One embrace, one kiss, and I bethought myself of her father.

"Sir, sir, do not be angry with me. I could not help it." He turned away, smiling, and went into the house. 'He is not angry with me, Mary. Are you?'

"My father loves you, Herbert."

"Does his daughter share the feeling?"

"Can you ask? What else do I here?"

"It was true. She was still in my arms."

Let us leave her there.

The Pilgrim's progress is thenceforth through delectable mountains, where our feet are never likely to follow him. With a wife who is perfection, as well as an heiress, and an incipient family who appear destined to copy her, he wants, indeed, but little here below. And so the storm-tossed thinker with whom we set out on pilgrimage comes at last to the chair-days of most reverend age, and the shrine of a local justice-ship. He is now a respectability. Alas for "the deep damnation" of the word.

We can hardly hold out as a likely prospect for the wearied thinkers of these days the deliverance which the Pilgrim found at last. Many may go through long years of thought and suffering without finding ultimate consolation in the bosom of a lovely free-thinker, with an English education and an Australian fortune. Erasmus augured ill for the spirituality of Protestantism, when he found every conversion terminate in a wedding. He who has fought his way to Liberalism has learned little from his conflict if it has not taught him to live for a wider family than one roof can cover, and by wiser counsels than one tongue can ever give. Some can love only those whom they see, and be cheered only by the caress which they feel. Let the dead bury their dead. Are not we alive?

No doubt the elevation of woman is the greatest of the changes that are coming. Many a social problem will it solve. Men say, "Why should I marry? A wife would increase my expenses and could not increase my income: she cannot work." Women say, "Why should we live only in the drawing-room and the nursery. Teach us your professions; and let us earn their rewards." Some day both men and women will see that it is the same restriction which mutilates the lives of both; and that the remedy is one.* At present the man who values his freedom of thought and his unselfishness of action, trembles as he links himself to one whose prejudices, all unchecked either by education or practical life must cramp or crush them both.

Positivism—in spite of its reverence for Catholicism—ordains that its priests shall necessarily marry, for only by means of marriage can they obtain the full development of the moral nature. Is it so? Often have I met a man, full of lofty thoughts and noble aspirations, intent only on making them yet more lofty and noble: and have prayed God speed him on his work. But it never occurred to me that the best aid for him in the endeavour would be a companion inferior to him in everything—except, perhaps, volubility and waltzing. The Greek priests that are, like the Positivists that are to be, must marry. Report does not say much for the moral development that they have attained through that obligation. For Anglican priests and prelates it is lawful to marry "at their own indiscretion." They concur in no part of their church's creed so heartily as in that which declares that they need neither "vow the estate of single life nor abstain from matrimony;" but it would be interesting to compare the reputations of the married many and of the scanty single. The memory of Kenn is much greener than that of Tillotson; and though Bishop Barlow (the very first of his order who ever married) had five daughters who married bishops, we somehow have heard more of bachelor Bishop Butler than of all six of them.

Perhaps those old monks had got nigh to the root of the matter when they taught that he who would give himself to the unselfish life must abandon marriage equally with wealth—must no more live for one other than for himself alone. No doubt the forcible external imposition of the rule was wrong; no doubt the rule itself, proposed as arbitrary and inflexible, is wrong. There are cases where marriage is a softener of a rugged nature; there are cases where ambition obtains for us power which we may use nobly. Yet, despite all this, none the less are they means, and means only, to the higher aim beyond; and he who embraces them for themselves alone, is unfaithful to that aim, even though by chance he serve it. He may happen to kiss Humanity, but it is with the lips of Judas.

It is a hard saying, and now, as in the Master's days, only they to whom it is given can receive it. But he that would gird himself to toil, must cast aside the scarf of honour as well as the every-day jacket; and he who would buy the keenest sword for the battle of life, must sell his love-tokens as well as his garments to purchase it. Catholicism has had its myriads of monks, and but for the protecting shelter of their cowls would have been dazzled to death by the Italian Renaissance and the German Reformation. And has not Protestantism its devoted ones also—devoted as utterly, though by no spoken vows; and distinguished as markedly, though by no formal garb? How many a student building in deserted libraries the faith of the future; how many an exiled thinker, pondering "The Duties of Man," or planning the regeneration of a race? It is in the presence of these men that the heart beats fast and the words come slow; it is on their brows that the prophet's halo sits; it is on their heads that we see the oil of ordination, poured

*The Pilgrim says (iii. 214)—though he makes no allowance for the doubtful genuineness of the passage—that our gospel "represents Jesus as ascending into heaven with a curse almost upon his lips. 'He that believeth not, shall be damned.' . . . an atrocious sentiment." In the copy lying before me, an unknown hand has written, "Is not the true meaning very different? He who does not believe in good things, must be not, in the nature of things, sustain loss or damage?"

*Some day they will find that the education which would give the wife the intellectual pleasures from which she is now debarred, would give her also the intellectual powers for whose companionship her husband longs.

by no human hand. "Radical" and "heterodox" perhaps they are, "dangerous" to the state of things which they see around—we should set little value on them if they were not; but they are the true followers of those old Hebrew heroes whose words stir us so deeply as we read them to ourselves to-day, yet sounded so strange and incomprehensible to us when the elderly married gentleman recited them last Sunday morning.

The High Church revival, which for thirty years has been growing in England with such vigour, owes all its strength to a band of celibate leaders. Pusey and Newman, and even Froude and Oakley, did not give to the Lord only of that which cost them nothing; they were ready to sacrifice the pride of life as well as the lust of the eye. The consequence to-day is, that the Low Church is dying, and the Broad Church too much an invalid to live anywhere but in the study. If the free faith of Liberal thinkers is ever to spread amongst the people; if, after having talked so much, it is ever to do a little, it must find men who will count it dearer to them than either money, power, or caresses; it must acknowledge them as its true leaders, and not be ashamed of them, even when they admit that to serve their race is to them a deeper joy than any man's applause or any woman's kiss. Such men, treading in old Bishop Kenn's path of peace and well-doing, will repeat his morning vow,—not to marry this day. They will add, nor the next.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1868.

MR. GLADSTONE'S PAST AND FUTURE.

THE pamphlet which Mr. GLADSTONE has just published in explanation of the changes that have taken place in his views on the subject of the Irish Establishment, is of so unusual a character, that it is difficult at first to estimate its value. "Qui s'excuse s'accuse," says the proverb, and the first instinct of most people will naturally be to think that it would have been better if he had let it alone; and if it were to be regarded only or chiefly in the light of a move on the chess-board of politics, we could come to no other conclusion. The fact is that the present is an age of change, and Mr. GLADSTONE has only shared in the general movements of thought which have brought most of our leading public men to positions very different from those at which they started. Thus, for one man to put forward an elaborate apology for his changes, inevitably wears, to some extent, the appearance of implied condemnation of those who may not have as good explanations to give. Moreover, the very earnestness of this pamphlet may weaken its direct political effect; unless the present House of Commons is very dissimilar to any of its predecessors, a large proportion of its members will be found to be secretly repelled by earnestness. They are not earnest themselves, and they dislike enthusiastic convictions in others. The influence of Lord PALMERSTON, whom it would be difficult to conceive of as penning such an explanation, yet lives in the cold and half disdainful Liberalism of many of those who by the necessities of party will be ranged on Mr. GLADSTONE'S side.

But this pamphlet is of far deeper than mere political significance. The very reasons which will make it unacceptable to party politicians will give it a more impressive value to thoughtful men outside of public life. If it confirms the former in their idea of Mr. GLADSTONE'S being but an indifferent party leader, it will at the same time produce in the minds of the latter throughout the country the conviction that Mr. GLADSTONE is much more than a party leader. There is a simple honesty of tone in it which none but the most bigoted adversaries can help feeling. It is an unusual move, but it is the move of an unusual man. We confess that we like the frankness of the pamphlet, and we like Mr. GLADSTONE'S desire to put himself right and square before his countrymen. It cannot fail to import something of a higher tone into the great controversies that are impending, even if we may not look upon it as the inauguration of a nobler phase of political leadership than any which has been known for generations.

The general course of Mr. GLADSTONE'S explanation has been too widely made known by the quotations which have appeared in the papers to need any minute description or analysis from us. That the thoughtful but doctrinaire author of "The State in its Relations with the Church," exactly thirty years ago, should even then have had his views shaken by MACAULAY'S keen and eloquent reply; that the impracticability of his idea should become still more manifest to him by the evident necessity of endowing the Catholic College of Maynooth in 1845; that in 1847 and 1851 he should, when obliged to speak on the subject, be unable to speak except in guarded sentences, which revealed to shrewd observers the changes that were silently taking place in him, needs, to our readers at any rate, little explanation, and still less justification; while the fact of his having some years ago begun to avow his conviction that the Irish Church must be disestablished, has for some time been matter of notoriety. Peculiarly instructive, however, is his account of the impression made upon his mind by the gradual development of the Anglican Church. He wrote his work in glorification of the principle of a State Church at a time when all earnest men in that Church might well feel hopeful of its future. It was in what the Pall Mall Gazette, with its genteel but subdued aversion to earnestness, calls "a gush of convalescence and revival;" old churches were being restored and new churches built, slovenly services were changing into beautiful and impressive worship; the old school of clergymen was passing away before a race as zealous and sincere as the ministers among the Nonconformists. It might well be supposed that the Church of England was going to convert the nation. Two striking facts, however, gradually wrought upon Mr. GLADSTONE'S mind. The one was, that as the Church rose out of its lethargy, in proportion as it became earnest in equal proportion it became divided—one development of zeal flying off into Roman Catholicism, and "a not less convulsive rationalistic movement" arising at the opposite extreme. The other fact was, that even in its aroused activity the Church could not keep pace with Dissenters. He speaks upon this latter point in a manly spirit of appreciation.

"I remember the astonishment with which at some period—I think in 1851-2—after ascertaining the vast addition which had been made to the number of churches in the country, I discovered that the multiplication of chapels, among those not belonging to the Church of England, had been more rapid still. But besides the immense extension of its material and pastoral organisation, English Nonconformity in general appears now to have founded itself on a principle of its own, which forbids the alliance of the civil power with religion in any particular form or forms. I do not embrace that principle. But I must observe, in passing, that it is not less unjust than it is common to stigmatise those who hold it as 'political Dissenters'—a phrase implying that they do not dissent on religious grounds. But if they, because they object to the union of Church and State, are political Dissenters, it follows that all who uphold it are political Churchmen."

We suspect after all, however, that Mr. GLADSTONE'S pamphlet will be more eagerly scrutinised for indications of his future than for justifications of his past, and we must confess that in this aspect it has least in it that is definitely satisfactory. That a man in recounting the story of his changes should speak guardedly of the future is only natural. But there is something more than guardedness in the closing pages in which he endeavours to set forth his present views on the broad subject of Established Churches. There is a hesitancy of tone which we cannot help feeling unconsciously betrays a lurking sense of a logically untenable position. The question between the Irish and the English Establishment is after all only one of degree. We have no wish to press this. There will be plenty of Mr. GLADSTONE'S adversaries to do that. With a leader so honest and sincere we can afford to bide our time.

AN APOLOGUE.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

I DREAMT that I was in the cabin of a large ship, which was filled with people divided into various groups listening to men who were explaining to them the beginning, the nature, and the end of their voyage, and the rules of navigation by which it was regulated. The different speakers did not agree. There was a general resemblance between their accounts, but there were also wide differences between them on which they insisted with extreme eagerness. All seemed to think that to adhere with absolute confidence to the teaching of some one of them was an absolutely essential condition to every one who wished to complete the voyage prosperously. The cabin was handsomely furnished and brightly lighted, but there was something about it which filled me with depression and distrust. The various maps and charts to which the different speakers appealed were plain and systematic enough in parts, but in other parts they were exceedingly confused, obscure, and apparently contradictory, and when this was pointed out to the speakers they became enraged, and laid all the blame on the persons who pointed it out. Moreover, the general character of the prospects which they held out to us was horrible in the extreme. We were assured, in every form of speech, that what they had to tell was the best and most glorious news in the world; but when you put it all together the substance of it was that nearly every one of us must expect upon landing to be confined in a hideous dungeon, and there to be put to a cruel death by lingering torments. Some, we were told, were to be otherwise dealt with for reasons and upon principles which it was difficult to follow or apply, and all our teachers with one voice agreed in extolling with passionate rapture the glories of the country to which we were bound, and the wisdom, goodness, and mercy of its sovereign and its laws. Much saddened and somewhat confused with all this, I managed at last to make my way from the cabin to the deck, where I found myself enrolled, I could hardly tell how, amongst the crew who were working the ship. When I had time to look about me a little, I observed several things which were strangely like and strangely unlike the accounts given of the voyage in the cabin. Our ship was one on which the sun never shone. Its voyage was made in the dark, under a sky which was often cloudy, and where at best we got no other light than what came from the stars. We could never certainly tell whether we were in sight of land or not. In certain quarters of the sky there were indications of the shore, and here and there we thought we saw lights. Some of our crew declared that it was all nonsense; that there was no port and no shore at all, and that it was mere weakness and folly to think about them; that it was better to let the ship drive where she would than give ourselves so much trouble as we did to try to keep her to what was understood to be her course. The fact that there was such a course was the strangest thing about that strange vessel. Many theories there were about it, none of which were quite satisfactory. Yet it was a generally understood thing that, under all circumstances whatever, we were to steer due north, or as near thereto as we possibly could; and it was remarkable that the est and bravest and wisest of our crew would run incredible risks and undergo incredible dangers, often at the hands of companions who were dissatisfied with them, in order to keep the ship on that particular course. It was also very remarkable that when she was steered on any other it never turned out well in the end. Putting these things together, and connecting them with the fact that the ship obviously was a ship framed, equipped, and suited in every way to make a voyage, I could not help feeling that she was bound somewhere, and that she would find her port at last, although I doubted the wisdom of those who professed to know all about it. However this might be, I used to feel that I would try to do my duty, in the hope that it might turn out to have been a duty, and as I stood on deck with the fresh air blowing over me, the stars shining silently from the sky, and the ship leaning from the wind and riding over the seas with a motion full of freshness and vigour, I felt that there was something bracing in the very mystery with which I was surrounded, and that at all events ignorance honestly admitted and courageously faced, and rough duty vigorously done, was far better than the sham knowledge, the bitter quarrels, the sickly odours, and the glaring lamp-light from which I had escaped.

MIRACLES IN 1868.

In reference to the statement under the above heading, in our issue of Nov. 20, Mr. Jones, of Enmore Park, South Norwood, desires to state as follows:

"That the seven witnesses are really to sign a declaration as to the facts therein stated.

"Those miracles transpired in the quiet of domestic life, and are only a small portion from others felt and seen. Miracles of a kindred character have been witnessed by me and very many persons in and out of London for upwards of thirteen years.

"Those and other miracles are merely the external incidents that draw attention to those divine messengers (angels) who, by various methods, guide those who open themselves to receive guidance.

"I publish them to correct a grievous mistake made by many clergymen in their pulpits—'That the days of miracles have ceased'—a statement that shows their utter ignorance of the past inner domestic histories of the representative families of nations, communities, and theologies, as well as of passing events. I publish them also to boldly rebut the attacks of 'scientific' bigots, who declare that angel life is a myth, and that man becomes extinct on the death of the flesh.

"SPIRITUALISTS are persons who know by facts—

"1st.—That at death man merely comes out of his disorganised body, an intelligent individualised being dispossessed of flesh, but still possessed of his soul (ghost body); having a perfect remembrance of the past, and knowledge of his new surroundings, and is therefore what is called 'immortal.'

"2nd.—That, under divine laws, he is still in sympathy with his relatives and others in the flesh; and under conditions, if they are receptive, can and does influence mentally and physically.

"3rd.—That angels and devils not only exist, but take an active part in producing men's actions, and that now, as heretofore, there are archangels and arch-devils and also intermediate beings of varied moral condition and intellectual power.

"SPIRITUALISTS are to be found amongst Trinitarians, Unitarians, Jews, &c.

"Opposition is to be expected. Since my boyhood, I have heard the public laugh and seen the sneer at believers in gas, steamboats, railways, photography, mesmerism, electric telegrams; and now it grins at spiritualism.

"TO THE BEREAVED, the knowledge that our loved relatives have, by 'passing away,' increased their power to efficiently help us, is a stay, a support, a blessing."

AMERICAN NOTES.

In noticing a work on the history of Methodism, the Liberal Christian says:

"Not that we would deny or question the earnestness and consecration always—the tact, eloquence, and logical power often—displayed by the early Methodist preachers. If any have doubts on these points, let them read these volumes, and doubt no longer. Nay, let them open their eyes to the dimensions, the vigour, the power of the Church which, under God, these men founded and nurtured into such robust life—the largest religious body in America to-day, and growing more rapidly perhaps in numbers and influence, the country through, than any other."

It is stated that the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church at Washington is to be supplied with a pulpit made of wood "cut from the Garden of Gethsemane," whilst other furniture is to be made of cedar-wood from Lebanon. "Marble that once paved the court of Solomon's Temple" will be used on the vestibule.

At his induction into the Presidency of Princeton College, New Jersey, of which Jonathan Edwards was the first President, Dr. M'Cosh, late of Belfast, delivered an address to a large audience on Academic Teaching, which seems to have surprised many of his hearers by its liberal views. Its object was to show how to combine the existing scholastic scheme with the needs of the present and the immediate future, and to point out the place which religion should have in the universities of the land. On this point, he said, Let the State provide the secular instruction, and the Churches the religious training in the homes in which the students reside. The experience which he had gained both in Scotland and Ireland enabled him to speak effectively on the subject which he had chosen; and, while faithful to the Gospel of Christ, he advocated full freedom of thought in connection with it.

The papers which come to us from the other side of the Atlantic often contain things that look odd to English eyes. For instance, an announcement of a marriage, in the Quebec Morning Chronicle of Nov. 7, ends thus: "No cards! No cake!! No wine!!!"

The Freeman vouches for the following condensed advice to a congregation having been given, at the recent installation of a Baptist minister, in Lower Canada, by a brother minister:

"Dear brethren, I suggest that you pray for your minister daily; guard his reputation carefully; hear him preach weekly; listen to the Word wakefully; treasure it up joyfully; practise it faithfully; labour with him sympathetically, both individually and collectively; attend the prayer and conference meeting constantly; support the Sabbath school heartily; subscribe for him liberally; pay him promptly; give him a bit of meat and a ball of butter occasionally; call on him frequently, but tarry briefly; greet him cordially, but not rudely; and may the God of all grace bless you abundantly, and add unto you daily such as shall be saved eternally!"

In a lecture on Brook Farm (with which thousands became acquainted through Hawthorne's "Blithedale Romance," where the rule was to be so many hours of labour for so many hours of instruction, Mr. Emerson lately amused his hearers by describing the way in which some of those who should have been among its cultivators, while eagerly availing themselves of the instruction, shirked their share of the labour:

"One man ploughed all day, and another looked out of window all day, and both received the same wages at night. The ladies took cold on washing days, so the gentlemen shepherds hung out the clothes, and when they danced in the evening clothes-pins fell plentifully from their pockets. It was a perpetual picnic, and its leaders should be thanked for making a pleasant place to live in. It was an education to those who were there; a fine experience of life-long value." In the course of his lecture Mr. Emerson alluded to the Dial, (a hymn from which will be found in our "Fireside Readings") "whose writers were its chief readers," and "which enjoyed its obscurity for four years, when it died." He likewise paid characteristic tributes of praise to the men whom he made his friends long before the world began to find them out—Thoreau, who celebrated poverty, and felt that "God could not be unkind to him if he tried," and Alcott, who "read Plato as an equal."

The Jesuits in the United States are reported to be preparing for the reception of numbers of their brethren who have been expatriated by the recent revolution in Spain. An importation of black cattle not, perhaps, of the most desirable kind.

The Toronto Guardian, remarking on the recent election in the States, says:

"There is an incident in the history of Ulysses Grant not to be found in the Radical biographies, and which, strange to say, escaped the attention of his opponents, for the American fashion is to hunt out blemishes in an antagonist's character from before he was weaned, and to rake up the dust of five or six generations if so many can be discovered, in the hope of finding some old frailty or folly to pelt at their political foe. In the beginning of the war, when Seward was prophesying smooth things with respect to its short continuance, Grant was working hard on a small farm near St. Louis. He was a West Point man, and had been in the regular service for several years. In the southern part of Missouri there resided another West Pointer—a contemporary of Grant's—who had just raised a regiment for the Confederacy. Grant applied to his old friend for a captain's commission in this regiment, but the colonel declined his services, stating the reasons why he deemed it to be his duty to refuse the offer. Immediately afterwards there was a great demand for officers in the North who knew something of tactics, and Grant easily obtained a commission in the Federal service, in which his promotion was very rapid. In the latter part of the summer of '65, as then commander-in-chief of the United States army, he travelled through Canada. At that time all our cities and towns had colonies of refugees who had escaped with little else than their lives from the great Southern wreck. Among those living in Montreal I met the Missouri Colonel to whom reference has been made. On the steamer between Quebec and Montreal he encountered Grant, and the General immediately recognised him and addressed him with great kindness and courtesy. They conversed for hours together, and not many days after the Colonel got a pardon and returned to Missouri. The whole matter is well known to many of the Southern refugees, but as it was regarded as a chivalrous, noble act on the part of Grant, it was considered that it would be ungenerous to let it get abroad during the great contest for the Presidency."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

A BRIDAL DEATH SCENE.

(On the death of Mrs. Denison, temperance lecturer, who was married Sept. 4th and died Sept. 9th.)

With festal thoughts a loving crowd assembled
Beside the altar where young Martha stood,
That type of angel-beauty; sighed and trembled,
Half guessing death meant smiting if he could,
While yet her fair unearthly form resembled
Some dear departed spirit of the good.

Not in God's temple was her life-play ended
Amid the grandeur of her wedlock scene,
Where psalms of bliss and whispered prayers were Blended

To cheer the white-robed, fragile fairy queen;
But at her home was sacred breath suspended,
Where life's intenser friendship reigns serene.

As short-lived, sun-kissed flowers have been Appointed

The brightest hues and richer fragrance to convey,
So she, by holy powers on high, anointed,
Toiled nobly midst her bodily decay;
Her works of love, by heaven's aid conjoined,
Did sweetly bless mankind in her brief day.

Her work is done; now softly is she sleeping
Where faithful daisy guardsmen watch the dead,
And o'er her tomb brown brambles will be Creeping,

As if to woo the corpse, now life hath fled:
And oh! we linger where she resteth—weeping,
Reflecting on her deeds and what she said.

VESUVIUS.

As a supplement to the description which we gave, a week or two since, by one who had looked down into the crater of the volcano while it was still in full activity, we subjoin the following account, from the Naples correspondent of the Guardian, of the effects which the eruption has produced:

Vesuvius, after ten days of intense activity, is comparatively quiet again. The lava-currents are cooling down, and the awful grandeur of the scene is passing away. No fire is visible by night, but by day the nature and extent of what has been going on is distinctly marked by a cloud of white vapour which hangs over the yet hot and seething sea of lava. But the effects of this last eruption are very serious. The floods of fire have rolled over the old beds, and beyond the old boundaries, and have trespassed fearfully on what has been claimed for many years by the husbandman as the secure domain of cultivation. Large tracts of rich soil have been swept by the devouring sea. Chesnut woods, vineyards, gardens, have in a few hours been withered, charred, buried, and irrevocably sealed up in a sepulchre as impenetrable as iron. Nay, the dead, who had been long buried out of sight, and whom loving hands had wrapped in marble against the Great Day, have been re-buried, and the bonds of death been drawn tighter. A whole cemetery has been overwhelmed, and one huge black tombstone covers a multitude of graves in one embrace. Great distress prevails in the neighbourhood of this scene of desolation. The principal sufferers are the small farmers. A subscription is set on foot for their relief, but it is melancholy to see on these occasions how small are the sums which flow from the names and purses which, if estimated by their equipages which thunder and flash over the Chiuga daily, ought not to suffer a want or case of distress for many miles round to remain unrelieved for an hour. The scene I witnessed on the night of the 20th will not soon be forgotten. I ascended the mountain as far as it was possible on such a night to proceed. The lava-flood had begun to cool on the surface and to slacken its pace, and was being powdered over by showers of ashes clotted with steam, which a strong east wind was driving over it. But the two great fountains of fire recently opened in the side of the cone were yet open and giving out enormous bodies of liquid lava. The whole of the north and north-east side of the mountain was in glow with the light and heat of the flowing tide. That tide was to be seen, not now racing as on the Monday and Tuesday, previous, but tumbling down into the plains of St. Sebastiano and St. Iorio far below, two miles at least in the distance towards Naples. As we beheld, it was desolating, in its slower but still onward course, acres of trees, crops, and habitations of men. No lives have been lost, that I am aware of,

as timely notice was given of what might be the end of this eruption. To give an idea, however, of the rapidity with which at one time the lava flowed, a friend of mine told me that while standing one early day of last week at the foot of the mountain, watching the progress of the terrible stream, a peasant ran up to him, and, with vehement gestures and earnest cries, entreated him to leave the spot, or the lava would be upon him. My friend was not for moving directly, as he calculated that it would take the lava an hour to reach the place on which he was standing; happily persuaded, however, to recross a bridge by which he had passed, and getting to a safer distance, in ten minutes from the time he received his warning, he saw the hungry flood rush forward and devour the very bridge which he had but just crossed. On Friday night, as I viewed the scene from the back of the Observatory, which stands rather more than half way up the mountain, the tide, though abated and less swift in its flow, was still running. The whole of a great valley down upon which I looked, though not sheeted with fire, was yet like a stormy sea flashing into ten thousand lights shed by the crests of its ten thousand billows. The Vesuvian sea was black indeed, but the waves of it which tumbled and dashed were crested with fire intensely red. Every here and there rose a monster billow, a perfect cascade, which poured forth its fiery masses and dashed them in glittering foam on the dark furrows below. Beyond this valley of fire was another, greater in extent. It was separated from the one into which I was looking by a huge ridge or wall most fantastic in its outlines, formed wholly, the guide assured me, of molten lava. Another sea of fire raged on the other side of that molten ridge. The bright glow of these valleys stretched from the cone above us on the east to Naples in the west. They were the beds of the streams which issued from the two fountains by which the cone of a mile in circumference, and but lately full to the brim with liquid lava, was emptying itself into the plain below! The blocks of cinder or scoria on which we stood, and which but twenty-four hours before were of red heat, heaved and cracked under our feet. Through the interstices we could see and feel unmistakably the fiery stream slowly creeping onwards and downwards. Comparatively few visitors have been attracted by this great sight.

AN ARCHIEPISCOPAL BON MOT.

THE credit of a bon mot, which has been "going the round," is attributed to Archbishop Manning. Somebody was expressing his regret at Mr. Gladstone's defeat in Lancashire, and his having to put up with the representation of a third-rate borough. "I don't see," replied the Archbishop, "how we could do better than as we have always done—take the time of day from Greenwich."

WHAT MARY GAVE.

WHEN the contribution-box comes round in church, boys and girls throw in money which their parents have given them for that purpose. The money is not their gift, but that of their father and mother. They have just as much to spend for their pleasure as they had before. And so I once heard a kind-hearted girl complain that she had nothing of her own that she could give. I will tell you what she was in one day, and you will see that she was mistaken. She gave an hour of patient care to her little baby sister who was cutting teeth. She gave a string and a crooked pin and a great deal of good advice to her three-year-old brother, who wanted to play at fishing. She gave Ellen, the maid, a precious hour to go and visit her sick baby at home; for Ellen was a widow, and left her child with its grandmother while she worked to get bread for both. She could not have seen them very often if our generous Mary had not offered to attend to the door and look after the kitchen fire while she was away. But this was not all that Mary gave. She dressed herself so neatly and looked so bright and kind and obliging that she gave her mother a thrill of pleasure whenever she caught sight of the young pleasant face. She wrote a letter to her father, who was absent on business, in which she gave him all the news he wanted in such a frank, artless way that he thanked his daughter in his heart. She gave patient attention to a long, tiresome story of her grandmother's, though she had heard it many times before. She laughed just at the right times, and when it was ended made the old lady happy by a good-night kiss. Thus she had given valuable presents to six people in one day, and yet she had not a penny in the world. She was as good as gold, and she gave something of herself to all those who were so happy as to meet her.

A YOUNG HEROINE.

Every now and then circumstances bring to light cases which teach to show how much real heroism, of the kind which finds no chronicler and makes no show, may lie hidden among those whose lot is cast amid scenes of poverty and distress. One such case we have in that of a young girl, named Eliza Spillmark, for whom a subscription has been opened in Brussels. This poor girl, who was a cripple, in order to save her sister from a week's imprisonment, to which she had been condemned for some slight offence, went there instead of the offender. The fraud was detected after she had suffered the punishment, and when brought before the judge she was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, which, however, she will now escape. Her answer to the question what induced her to substitute herself for her sister was that, being a cripple, she could not maintain her aged mother, which her sister had done for a long time, "and therefore," she added, "it was better for me to go to prison and let her be free."

H Y M N.

INFINITE Spirit! who art round us ever,

In whom we float as motes in summer sky,
May neither life nor death the sweet bond sever
Which joins us to our unseen Friend on high.

Unseen, yet not unfelt; if any thought

Has raised our mind from earth, or pure desire

A generous act or noble purpose brought,

It is Thy breath, O Lord, which fans the fire.

To me, the meanest of Thy creatures kneeling,

Conscious of weakness, ignorance, sin, and shame,

Give such a force of holy thought and feeling,

That I may live to glorify Thy name:

That I may conquer base desire and passion,

That I may rise o'er selfish thought and will,

O'ercome the world's allurements, threat, and fashion,

Walk humbly, softly, leaning on Thee still.

The Dial.

THE SCOTTISH UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE anniversary sermons on behalf of the Scottish Unitarian Association were preached in St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh, on Sunday, November 29, by the Rev. JOHN GORDON, of Evesham. In the morning Mr. Gordon took his text from 2 Peter i. 5: "Add unto your faith courage;" and in a most able and eloquent discourse pleaded the cause of the association, and urged its claims upon public support. Observing that sins against the mind and conscience, of which society takes no cognisance, are quite as bad as sins against the body, such as drunkenness, of which society does take cognisance, he showed that men may offend in two ways in regard of their religious profession, either by lending their support to systems of which they do not approve, or by withholding it from the systems of which they do approve. Mr. Gordon preached a second time in the evening. There was a good attendance on each occasion.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

On Monday, Nov. 30, the meeting for the transaction of business was held in the chapel at two o'clock; IVIE MACKIE, Esq., the president of the association, in the chair.

The Rev. H. W. CROSSKEY read the report, which showed that the different agencies called into existence by the association had been effectually sustained.

After sketching the history of the association from its reorganisation in 1861, the report goes on to state that during the year just closed the Rev. J. G. Slater, of the Home Missionary Board, was appointed missionary, and entered upon his duties at Aberdeen, on the 16th of February. The services which the association has rendered to the cause of liberal Christianity in Scotland are as follows:—First: The series of annual meetings has been of very great importance. The discourses delivered on these occasions by Revs. E. B. Aspland, J. J. Taylor, W. H. Channing, Charles Beard, James Drummond, and J. Page Hoppes, have attracted public interest, and awakened thoughtful inquiry, while the sympathies of our English brethren with the struggle in Scotland have been increased by these yearly visits. Secondly: Two missionaries have been kept in active work, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association having generously voted £100 annually for mission work in Scotland, and co-operated with the Scottish Association in enabling these engagements to be made. Thirdly: The church at Dundee has been established. Fourthly: Unitarianism has been preached for the first time since the lamented loss of the Rev. George Harris, in many places, such as Montrose, Stonehaven, Perth, Kirriemuir, Stirling, and Greenock. Fifthly: The Aberdeen Church, which has had severe losses, has been strengthened and increased; and £200 has been raised for the purchase of the ground on which the church stands. During the past year the sustenance of the churches at Aberdeen and Dundee has been the special work of the Association, and these churches must continue to be sustained until they become self-supporting. The Dundee Church in particular has shown signs of satisfactory progress, and the self-devoted labours of Mr. Williamson are deserving of special commendation. He reported that a subscription had been started for a new church, which now amounts to £275.

Very interesting reports were also read from Mr. Slater and Mr. Williamson, showing that the cause was gaining ground slowly but steadily in Aberdeen and Dundee. Mr. Williamson's report, which we give in full, shows what good work the association is doing through its missionaries.

"REPORT FROM DUNDEE."

"The average attendance for the year upon the services has been about 69 in the morning and 140 in the evening. The largest morning attendance was 91, and for the evening 400. The school has now about 50 members. Several new members have joined the congregation; there are evidently a considerable number of others who are in sympathy with our cause, but who have not yet determined to throw in their lot with us. I have strong hopes that those will be induced to lend us their aid before long. The number of representative names on the register is now 90.

"In May last I suggested to the congregation the desirability of taking some steps towards the erection of a church. I am happy to state that my proposition was accepted, and a subscription was at once started, which now has reached the sum of £275. We hope the friends of the Unitarian cause abroad will aid us in our efforts. In addition to the work on Sunday in Dundee, I have given several lectures on week evenings upon doctrinal subjects, inviting questions from the audience. I am at present carrying on a regular weekly meeting of this kind. There is an average attendance of about a hundred persons.

"Occasional lectures have been given in St. Andrews, arrangements for which have been made by Mr. Bethune, of Blebo. A lecture given in Arbroath was but poorly attended, owing, no doubt, to the advertisement not having been sufficiently extensive.

"An experiment made in Perth on the 4th of November was more successful than I expected. I have lectured in that town once a week since; a local committee has been formed; the attendance has been from fifty to one hundred and fifty. I have also lectured in Kirriemuir once, and hope, all being well, to do so again before long. A committee has been formed there. It seems pretty certain that I could get an audience in any place, if the lecture was only sufficiently advertised.

"The funds at my disposal for extra work in the neighbourhood of Dundee have consisted of £3 given by the Scottish Association more than a year ago; I have lately received a grant of £5 from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association towards the expense of extra missionary work. After nearly three years' experience in the office of Unitarian missionary, I am disposed to feel hopeful that there is a fair prospect for our cause in this part of Scotland. I am satisfied the common people generally are quite indifferent as to what may become of the popular theology. It has no real hold upon the minds of men. All the more reason is there, if this be the case, for us to seek by every means to recommend the simple, rational, and progressive theology which it is our privilege to hold.

Mr. W. C. BRIGGS spoke most highly of the good work Mr. Williamson was doing—breaking new ground every day. The times had not been good in Dundee lately, and hence the difficulty of raising money. Still the people do very creditably, and there are about ninety people who pay pretty regularly. The sums promised for the erection of a church are for the most part from men and women in the receipt of weekly wages of a pound or two pounds a week, and who pay their subscriptions by weekly instalments of a shilling at a time. There would be some difficulty in getting a good site in the centre of the town, where they must have it; but he hoped they would be successful in spring. He concluded by announcing that Mr. Mackie had generously promised £100 towards the building fund, and thought there would be no difficulty in raising funds if a few friends would follow the example of the president.

The election of officers was then proceeded with, Mr. Mackie being unanimously re-elected president.

THE SOCIAL MEETING.

In the evening a social meeting was held in the Hopetown Rooms, Queen-street, when there was a very large and gratifying attendance. Among the gentlemen present were the Revs. John Gordon, H. W. Crosskey, A. Gordon, J. Cranbrook, H. Williamson, R. B. Drummond, J. G. Slater; and Ivie Mackie, Esq. (in the chair), George Hope, A. Bethune, of Blebo, J. Warren, H. Briggs, H. Blyth, Esqrs., &c., &c.

Mr. MACKIE, who took the chair, said he had been very much gratified by the reports he had heard read that day, and which showed that a very satisfactory amount of progress had been made during the past year. He had always taken a very warm interest in the progress in Scotland of those views of religious truth which Unitarians held. It was a very difficult thing to act upon the Scottish character with respect to any changes in religious opinion. Whatever the change might be, the Scotch people only repelled it, and did not come out as they ought to do and declare their views openly. (Applause.) But he thought the time had now arrived when creeds and confessions were having less power over the people than they had had heretofore. He was told the other day by a Scotch gentleman, with whom he had travelled part of the way in the train from England, that the whole tone of religious opinion was going in their direction, and that the doctrine of the Atonement was now given up altogether by the reflecting part of religious bodies. He was glad to see present their friend, Mr. Cranbrook. Having taken some interest in what he had seen in the newspapers respecting the position in which that gentleman was placed, he thought no man had braved public opinion and public obloquy more than he had done. (Applause.) He would not undertake to define what Mr. Cranbrook's theological position might be, but he would allow every man and woman to think for themselves, whatever their differences of opinion might be. It was a very difficult thing for a man when isolated to assert his opinions, because, as they knew, he must pay a penalty for so doing. And whatever conclusions Mr. Cranbrook might have arrived at, he deserved their respect for the straightforward, manly course he had adopted. Before fifty years passed, he believed the opinions held by Unitarians would prevail in Scotland to an extent which at present they little anticipated, and already all the great minds of the country were turning away from their former professions and confessions, and going in that direction. In Manchester the Unitarians, instead of being looked down upon, were looked up to; and that was the position he wished to see them holding in Edinburgh.

Mr. GEORGE HOPE, in proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Gordon for his services of the day before, said that they, as Unitarians, had often been taunted with having no creed to propagate, and that was the reason why they had made such small progress. That he entirely and utterly denied. At the same time he freely and frankly admitted that on many important questions they differed much among themselves. For his own part he was thoroughly convinced of the historical truth of Christianity as detailed in the Gospels. Others saw difficulties in this belief, but he had no quarrel with them on that account, as he had no doubt they were as thoroughly anxious for religious truth as himself.

Mr. A. BETHUNE, in seconding the motion, said that he was quite a recent convert to Unitarianism, but he thought that what had been said about the probability of Unitarian opinions making a very rapid progress in the future was quite true, and he was glad to think that the hopes expressed by the chairman had the sanction of the present Archbishop of Canterbury, who said, or at least was reported to have said, he presumed quite correctly, at the meeting at Sion College, that if the Church of England was disestablished Great Britain would become Unitarian. (Laughter and applause.) Although Mr. Mackie would not define Mr. Cranbrook's theological position, he (Mr. Bethune) thought he might attempt to define his own. Whatever subject a man took an interest in, he held that he was bound to devote to it a large amount of attention. Now all his life he had devoted a great deal of attention to agriculture, and next to that, or rather it ought to be a long way first, he had studied mankind. And his religion came to this—faith in God, and faith in man. He might sum it up in the simple words—Our Father who art in Heaven. When he conducted religious services at St. Andrew's, as he did occasionally, he generally took with him one of Theodore Parker's sermons—he was not sure whether he was a sound Unitarian or not—(laughter)—and after reading a portion he made his own remarks upon it. He was afraid, however, that he had wandered a little from the subject, and he would conclude by seconding Mr. Hope's motion. The vote of thanks having been unanimously and heartily accorded, was responded to by Rev. JOHN GORDON, in an able and eloquent speech. As, however, our space is limited we must not attempt to report it, confining our attention to the addresses of the laymen present, and to that of the Rev. JAMES CRANBROOK, who said that he had had so much experience of the evil effects of religious associations that he had perhaps a somewhat morbid dread of them, but when he received the invitation to be present upon this occasion, he felt that he was bound by gratitude for the kindness that had been shown him by the Unitarians of Edinburgh, ever since his secession from the Independents, to accept it. He referred to the stirring changes in religious thought during the past few years: but scarcely believed that the tide of thought would advance so rapidly as Mr. Mackie had predicted. When they looked at the history of religious knowledge on a large scale, taking not merely our generation, but taking some centuries, they saw that the tide had flowed, on the whole, but slowly; sometimes rolling in with big waves upon the shore, but at other times driven back. All sorts of superstitions sprung up, and the friends of progress, looking upon the real advance, discovered that it was small indeed, and that great work remained to be done. It was, perhaps, the destiny of humanity ever to be struggling to advance—advancing apparently rapidly, every one around them clapping their hands, applauding the progress, when, lo! and behold! the very men who had cried "Hosanna" begin to exclaim, "Crucify him! crucify him!" (Applause.)

Addresses were also delivered by H. C. BRIGGS, Esq., and the Revs. J. G. SLATER, H. WILLIAMSON, H. W. CROSSKEY, and R. B. DRUMMOND. Altogether the meeting was of the most successful and cheering character, and proved that the cause of liberal Christianity in Scotland is by no means languishing.

DOMESTIC MISSION: EMBDEN-STREET, HULME.

The opening services were continued on Sunday last. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal preached in the morning to a full congregation, and the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., in the evening, when, notwithstanding the drenching rain, there was not a vacant seat in the place. The whole of these services have been of a most interesting and encouraging character, and, as far as the numbers that attended them goes, thoroughly successful. The collections from the four services amount to £53. 3s.

The Sunday scholars assembled for the first time in the new school on the afternoon of November 29th, when there were upwards of 150 present; and on Sunday last, the number was still larger. It is gratifying to the teachers to see that, though the school has been removed to a considerable distance from the old premises, nearly the whole of the scholars have accompanied it. The same is the case with the day school; while the number of fresh scholars that have already applied for admission affords no unreasonable ground of hope that the new premises, so thoroughly commodious and well arranged, will be appreciated by those for whose benefit they have been erected, and the field of usefulness be greatly increased. It is proposed as a means of self-help, among many other advantages, to introduce, at the beginning of next year, the offertory after each of the religious services. With a view to facilitate the commencement of these, the Rev. Wm. Gaskell has kindly provided the congregation with a hundred copies of Martineau's hymn book. And it is hoped that other friends of the Mission will be disposed to help it with the means which are needed for effectively carrying on its Christian work.

INTELLIGENCE.

WARNING.—An unfortunate man, about the middle stature, seeking assistance, who is clad in seedy brown clothes, strutted with a military bearing, gives as his name Henry O'Bryan, a sergeant from London, formerly 21 years in India, but now a member of Stamford-street congregation, and very intimate with the Rev. R. Spears, &c., &c., is an impostor.

CHORLEY.—On Sunday, Nov. 29th, two sermons were preached in Park-street Chapel, by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., of Hyde Chapel, Gee Cross, and collections amounting to £14. 2s. 9d. were made in aid of the chapel fund.

KIRRIEMUIR.—On Monday last, the 7th Dec., the Rev. H. Williamson delivered a lecture here. Subject: "Unitarian Christianity contrasted with Popular Theology." Although the night was very wet above 100 were present. Several questions were put and courteously answered by the lecturer. Tracts were distributed illustrative of Unitarianism which many appear to relish. It is intended to continue these lectures monthly as long as circumstances will permit.

LEEDS: HUNSLT.—On Monday evening, the first of a series of musical and literary entertainments was given at Hunslet. The new schoolroom proved itself admirably adapted for the purpose. The entertainment was enthusiastically received by a crowded audience.

LONGTON.—On the 30th ult., the Rev. John Page Hopps delivered a lecture on "Points of difference between Unitarians and other Christians," in the Mission-room. The attendance, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, was good. The friends at Longton, having secured a site, are looking forward hopefully to getting a chapel.

STOCKPORT.—On Thursday evening, Dec. 3rd, the annual congregational soirée was held in the school-room of St. Peter's Gate Church. Nearly 300 members and friends of the congregation were present. The room was tastefully decorated, and various scientific instruments were displayed on the tables. Short addresses were given by the Revs. J. Black and S. A. Steinthal, Major Coppock and others. The proceedings were very agreeably diversified by the singing of part songs, &c., by the choir. The friends dispersed soon after ten.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All letters, articles of intelligence, &c., should be addressed to the Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Market-street, and not to the private addresses of the Editors. No anonymous letters inserted: the writer of every letter must append his name for publication.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

It is stated, though the statement seems hardly credible, that Mormonism, with a view to exclude Gentile light and consequent perversion, is trying a most ambitious expedient. This is nothing less than the invention of a new alphabet, and 10,000 copies of certain school books printed in this are said to have been delivered at Salt Lake City.

A grand illumination recently took place in Jerusalem on occasion of the publication of an edict of the Sultan, liberating the Holy City for ever from military service and from all payment of taxes connected with it.

The Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia, now in England, testified their sympathy with the Schleiermacher festival, of which we gave some account a fortnight ago, by addressing the following telegram to the Burgomaster and Town Council of Berlin:

"Away from home, we desire to give the Burgomaster and Town Council a proof of our sympathy in the celebration of this day. The name of Schleiermacher, a man who resuscitated the dormant energies of the Church, and gloriously shared in the revival of patriotic enthusiasm at a time of sore trial" (1806-1813), "deserves to be had in everlasting remembrance by our people."

"FRIEDRICH WILHELM.
"VICTORIA."

The famous scholar and critic, Professor Ewald, has been arraigned for treason by the Prussian Government, in consequence of the publication of a pamphlet entitled "Praise of the King and the People"—that is, of Hanover—in which he sharply criticises the Prussians. The trial is to come off in a few days, and it will be curious to see what the result of this duel between the redoubted Bismarck and the great Gottingen professor will be.

Happily for the inhabitants of St. Iorio and Portici, the floods of fire which have been pouring from Vesuvius have been arrested in their course. This merciful arrest has doubtless been caused, as the priests of the district are teaching their flocks, by the interposition of St. Januarius, to whom a special appeal was made for help, and not to the exhaustion of the mountain, as Professor Palmieri and other scientific men are profanely declaring.

The Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall gives us an account of a visit which Fuad Pasha paid the other day to the Pope. He was received by the Holy Father in the most cordial manner, and they soon chatted as familiar friends, while the Turk was profuse in his expressions of gratitude for the attentions paid to him by the Pope during his late severe illness. The Holy Father, on his part, described the Sultan as his "meilleur ami" among the sovereigns of Europe, and spoke gratefully of the toleration he extended to Roman Catholics, not forgetting to add that he hoped his Highness would grant them further privileges. Fuad Pasha remarked that the Sultan deeply regretted he had been unable to visit Rome on his late tour through Europe, when the Pope rejoined with a laugh, "Who knows but I shall go to see him at Constantinople? You are not ignorant that Christ has given me all the earth, and my empire extends to the Dardanelles and far beyond, but unlike that of a neighbour monarch, threatens no dangers to the Sultan. Indeed, his highness and myself are in much the same situation as to neighbours, for he has his Piedmont in Russia, and I have my Czar in the Italian revolution. We are menaced by the same dangers, and our brother rulers have the same measure for the Cross as the Crescent. At least your Sovereign believes in his Prophet, but the other Governments of our day do not believe even in God." The Holy Father then requested Fuad Pasha to use his good offices with the Sultan for the protection of Catholics in every part of the Ottoman empire, and with that the interview ended.

It is understood that his Holiness is about to launch his thunder against this dreadful Spanish revolution; with what effect we shall see. Of course, the allocution is to be in Latin, but from some cause or other, that language seems to have lost a good deal of its old terrific force.

A correspondent of the Guardian writes:

"Italy is in every sense a new country now, to one who remembers it before Magenta and Solferino, when Italy was, as Prince Metternich used to say, only 'a geographical expression.' It is not only that the demarcations on the map are effaced, the petty sovereignty of Grand-Dukes and titular Princes abolished, and Florence itself, as the capital of Italy, no longer an inexpensive residence for our countrymen. This change of political relations affects the national life in its every aspect. Instead of the swarm of friars and monks which the traveller met everywhere, it is a rare thing now to see the picturesque garb of the monastic orders. What would Torquemada and his myrmidons think of a bookstall in the great Piazza at Milan close to the very walls of 'Il Duomo,' with New Testaments in the vernacular freely displayed for sale to the passers-by? I must add, however, on the other hand, that the preacher whom we chanced to hear at St. Lorenzo here the other day was as energetic and as impassioned in his word-painting of Purgatory and its horrors as Tetzel himself could have been. It was a sermon eloquent enough in its way, and enforced by all the gesticulation with which an Italian naturally supplements his eloquence."

The Rev. Dr. Cooke, best known to many of our readers as the chief opponent of Dr. Montgomery in the great Remonstrant fight of 1829, and long the leader of the illiberal party in the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, died in Belfast on Sunday evening last, at the advanced age of eighty-one.

"Father Ignatius," having been inhibited from St. Edmund's Lombard-street, held a religious service on Saturday evening at the Store-street Music Hall, Bedford Square. The hall was densely packed in every part. The "Father," who appeared in monkish habit, and had upon the table on the platform a crucifix, with long candles burning on either side, preached from the words, "The door was shut."

A party of Salford Protestants, last Sunday, displayed their reverence for the right of private judgment, and at the same time for the Church they hold so sacred, in a very marked and open manner. The Rev. F. Hains, of Wigan, who has been a public supporter of Mr. Gladstone during the late election, was chosen to preach in St. Philip's Church, Salford, on behalf of the Additional Curates Fund. As he was about to enter the pulpit twenty or thirty persons rose and left the church, some of them on their way to the door shouting, "No Popery." These excellent Protestants, it is stated, do not belong to the congregation, but came for the express purpose of thus relieving their feelings.

Archbishop Manning has made public a plan, which has already advanced beyond its first stage, for providing his diocese with a metropolitan cathedral. The grand style in which he works may be inferred from the fact that three acres of ground have been bought for the purpose at the West-end of London, and with an independent frontage on almost every side, at a cost of £36,000. "It is a duty," the Archbishop says "to provide for the future." The undertaking is a large one: is there any chance that Dr. Manning will live to see it completed, and to consecrate the cathedral? He himself says, "I hope not, for if the cathedral were to be finished in my day, it would not be a metropolitan church worthy of England." The building is to be constructed upon the largest proportions of scale, and in the early English style, as "a sound judgment prevails in favour of grandeur, stateliness, solidity, spaciousness, and majestic elevation." It appears that (including a bequest of £5,000) £29,000 has been subscribed. We thought that the Archbishop a few months ago expressed his conviction that England before long would return to the true faith; his urgent appeals, however, to his people to make sacrifices for raising this cathedral do not look as if he expected them soon to be in possession of Westminster Abbey.

The Glasgow Citizen informs us that Miss Marsh, niece of Lady Anstruther, of Belcaskey, preached to a crowded audience, in the Union-hall of St. Monance, a few Sunday evenings ago, and that the sermon was a gem in its way.

The statement made by Mr. C. Bradlaugh, that a Church of England clergyman at Northampton had voted for him, is denied by the agent of the Conservative candidates, who states that he has referred to the register, and can authoritatively say that no such vote was given.

The English Independent, in a corrected list, makes the number of Unitarians in the House of Commons to be nineteen; we make them just a score.

The force of folly can no further go than the following announcement, made recently, with a good intention, we suppose, at Nottingham:

"Goose Fair, Sunday. The ransomed of the Lord will hold a large meeting in the great marketplace, to be conducted by a converted thief, sweep, doctor, and miller. J. Birch, D.D., a converted nigger, will play his banjo; and as host of Heaven's royal family. Morning services at 10.30, afternoon 2, evening 8. If the weather be unfavourable the services will be held at the Tabernacle, Durham Ox Inn, and the Mission Hall."

There has been a report that Dr. Jackson is unwilling to exchange the see of Lincoln for that of London, and High Churchmen are again putting forward the claims of Dr. Wilberforce to be translated to the latter. But alas! as the John Bull says, "there is that terrible legacy of dislike which the Queen has had bequeathed to her from her Royal Consort, which is said to be the perpetual ban against any promotion of the Bishop of Oxford."

In relating the proceedings of the battle royal at the meeting of the S. P. C. K. last week, the Times thus describes what took place when Dr. Miller, of Greenwich, a member of the Standing Committee, rose to speak:

"The partisans of the Bishop of Capetown instantly raised a storm of furious noises, and continued them without intermission for some ten minutes. They shouted, they hissed, they yelled, they stamped; Dr. Miller essayed to leave the room, the Archbishop threatened to leave the chair, and Lord Harrowby vainly appealed for fair play by mute gesticulation."

It might be worth the consideration of the society, it seems to us, whether it would not be well for it to convert itself from one for Promoting Christian Knowledge into one for Promoting Christian Practice.

On Tuesday last, the Church was exhibited in one of those positions which scarcely redound to its credit. The Duke of Norfolk, being a Roman Catholic, is deprived of the right of presentation to the livings in his gift; and in consequence the advowsons of five of them were put up for sale by public auction. Fears, however, were expressed by some of those present as to the security of ecclesiastical property, and notwithstanding the assurance of the auctioneer that "the Legislature of a great nation would never confiscate the property of the Church of England," and that "whatever might take place, the rights of parties would certainly be reserved," bidders were not induced to come forward as freely as was expected and only one of the five livings was sold.

It appears that Mr. Joseph Barker is going about the country delivering lectures against Unitarianism and Unitarians. On those who are acquainted with his past erratic course his lectures are not likely to produce any effect, unless it be the opposite of what he intends; but as there may be many who are not, our friends at Choppington have done well in publishing a little tract, that might be serviceable elsewhere, in which Mr. Barker is confuted out of his own mouth, and it is shown how little any opinion of his is entitled to credit.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS

Mmgr. Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans, has published a "Letter on the approaching Œcumenical Council," addressed to the clergy of his diocese, which has already passed through three editions, and appears to be much read in France. Its object is to set forth the nature, object, and motives of the Council; the necessity which exists for holding it under the present circumstances and aspect of society; to dissipate fears as to the result of so important a movement by the Church; to entreat attention and obedience to this opportunity and summons on the part of ses frères séparés; and, above all, and as the sum of all, to set forth and insist upon the claims to authority and absolute predominance on behalf of what is, of course, in his eyes the sole Church Catholic. In assuming, as he does, that all other religious communities are absolutely in the wrong and his own absolutely in the right, he only represents the temper and spirit of the Romish Church; but there is little of Christian humility in such an assumption. He tells us that the Pope has invited to his Council "all the bishops of the Christian world," the "Episcopacy of the whole earth;" and though he does afterwards mention separately by name the "disunited Greek Bishops," all other bishops, with a feigned ignorance, are ignored, or classed under the head of "nos frères séparés" of Protestant communions. In explaining what an Œcumenical Council is, he repeats the old argument that, in order to obviate the instability of private interpretation, a "sovereign," that is "infallible" doctrinal authority was necessary, and that of this infallibility "the principle of unity" is one consequence, and a "centre of unity" another. The Council (which the Pope alone has the right of convoking, and to which, with him at its head, infallibility belongs) precisely because it is Œcumenical, composed of the representatives of "all the Churches of the earth" and of bishops living under every political constitution and social régime, excludes the predominance of any one school, of any narrow or national spirit, or any local prejudices. It is the "grand Catholic spirit" alone which will inspire its decisions; and whatever may be the special opinions of "such or such a fraction" or "such or such a school," the Council will bring forth true light and unity. We can only say, "So be it!"

In noticing a letter to the Times on "Religion in Spain," in which it was said that the Spanish infidel is the victim of "hazy doubts and shallow sophisms," and yet that no good results are to be hoped for from Protestantism and the circulation of the Bible, the Pall Mall asks:

"But what do you, the writer, believe? Do you believe seriously and fully in the truth of any of the Protestant theological systems? If not, why do you sneer at the 'arrant infidel,' and call his doubts 'hazy,' and his reasons for his opinions 'shallow sophisms?' If you do believe that any one of the Protestant systems of theology is true, why do you not advocate the duty of preaching it in Spain? Because, you answer, it would not suit the Spaniards, it would produce a religious convulsion, their minds are not prepared for it. This language is perfectly intelligible in the mouth of a man who does not believe that one creed is truer than another; but such a man has no business to write as if he had a creed. Real belief in any creed is worthless and insincere unless a man is prepared to run risks for it, unless he thinks it important and true enough to be preached at the risk of religious convulsions and whether the minds of those to whom he preaches are prepared for it or not. If any of the various forms of Protestantism are true, or are honestly believed to be true, by men who regard Spanish Popery as a degraded superstition, they ought to take the risk of preaching them at all hazards, and of being martyred, if necessary, for doing it. Would the Times' special correspondent have advised the small knot of Jews who met in the upper room at Jerusalem 1800 and odd years ago not to attempt to preach their pure creed to people immersed in every form of idolatry? If he would, he is consistent in his advice to Protestants in the present day. If he would not, and if he believes that any Protestant body is in possession of the pure unadulterated Christianity which made such changes in the world, then he is grossly inconsistent. For ourselves, we do not wish to see a Protestant propaganda in Spain, simply because we do not regard any theological system whatever as pure truth, and because it is not worth while to risk religious and social convulsions for anything which is not regarded as having a claim to that character. We think at the same time that it is altogether impossible to imagine a stronger proof than is afforded by the present position of Spain of the fact that some general consent as to religion, some intelligible tenable theory on the subject, capable of being accepted by the highest minds and of being simply stated and explained to the lowest, is the one great want of the age. The fact which is attested on all sides, and by evidence of every kind, that, with everything in their favour, the priests have been utterly unable to retain their hold of the minds and consciences of Spanish men is conclusive evidence of the failure of Catholicism, if anybody is not convinced of it by the history of the last three hundred years. As to the work of supplying the religious wants of mankind, no one man or nation or century will do it; but a distinct recognition of the existence and of the overwhelming importance of the problem, and the exposure of the insincere assumption constantly made on behalf of orthodox Protestants by such writers as the one before us to be in possession of its solution, is the first step towards finding one."

While the Guardian is unable to follow the Wesleyans in their attempt to do away with their founder's testimony to the authority of the Church, it quite agrees with them in their view of the hopelessness of corporate reunion now. It says, with a good deal of truth:

"When a society has been formally established, chapels and schools settled on strict trusts, an ecclesiastical system elaborately defined, and a kind of hierarchy recognised, it is vain to propose reunion with the Church. Too many personal sacrifices are involved, too great an interference with vested interest and cherished authority. Moreover—we have no wish to disguise the truth—the experience of a more cordial fellowship and a more lively esprit du corps, such as sectional communities naturally engender, is unfavourable to acquiescence in the condition of things which belongs to a national Church, including all classes of persons, and very various degrees of religious advancement. Wesleyans persuade themselves that they have no admixture of tares in their own portion of the spiritual field; and they do not willingly accept a system in which the existence of tares along with the wheat is sadly, but clearly, allowed. In view of this state of feeling among Wesleyans, as well as of the repeated and sometimes angry refusals with which every overture towards agreement has been met by them, we cannot counsel Churchmen to persist in their entreaties. Churches prosper in reality by their own internal vigour; they attract aliens, not by proposals for union, but by the attraction of greater gifts and clearer manifestations of spiritual life. The Wesleyans went out from us—so far as they may be considered to have gone out—because our clergy and laity were deficient in zeal and godliness. When we are more zealous and more godly than they, we shall have the best of them again within our fold."

In a letter to the Daily News, a clergyman writes:

"Although I have never thought the establishment of the church of a minority capable of defence, I have hitherto been the steady advocate of the establishment of the church of the majority. The disgraceful conduct of the clergy (especially of the Lancashire clergy) at the recent elections, has, however, now convinced me that establishment is, under all conditions, an injury to the church and to Christianity. Where no establishment exists, individual clergymen may take sides in politics according to their individual convictions; but there could be no such marshalled array of intolerance and slander as this general election has exhibited. I may add that I am no 'advanced thinker,' or a 'Broad Churchman,' but a firm maintainer of definite and dogmatic creeds, and of the apostolic order of the episcopate."

In some remarks on the present civil status of ex-clergymen, the Pall Mall says:

"The remedy, to take away the only remaining practical grievance and to do away with the absurdities of the theoretical non-recognition of a condition which everybody does recognise, is some such act as that introduced by Mr. Bouverie in 1862. But there was one provision in that act which should be reconsidered. It obliged any one taking advantage of it to declare that 'he conscientiously dissented from the doctrines of the United Church of England and Ireland.' As far as the State is concerned it ought to be sufficient for a clergyman to say he is desirous of relinquishing his profession. The Church, of course, may consider him excommunicate and a dissenter; but it is hard to see why the State has any more reason for asking a clergyman why he wishes to change his profession than it has for asking a barrister or a doctor. The probabilities are that such a bill as Mr. Bouverie's will receive little opposition in the new Parliament. Even in 1862 many bishops, including the Bishop of Exeter, were favourable to such a measure. Since that time the words 'honesty' and 'dishonesty' have been bandied about pretty freely amongst the clergy. Ritualists urging that Rationalists, and Evangelicals insisting that Ritualists, should quit the Church. If they are really sincere they should continue to facilitate the object of their desire."

We have not yet done with the "Natal scandal;" but the Rev. H. Douglas, in a letter to the Guardian, says:

"The only possible mode that I am aware of for bringing the merits of the case again under review lies in the hands of the Bishop of London, within whose diocese the books of Dr. Colenso, charged as heretical, were published. Though he cannot judicially cause the acts of the South African Church to be reviewed, he may, if he sees fit, virtually do so by appointing a Commission on these books, and then proceeding judicially on the report given. Dr. Colenso himself, I fancy, is beyond his range, but his books are within the scope of his jurisdiction."

At the election of a Proctor for Devonshire in Convocation, the Rev. Mr. Mackarness, referring to the claims which had been put forth for his opponent, the Rev. Mr. Sanders, said:

"He does not stand on the strength of his high qualities. His supporters introduce him to us simply as one who will 'support the existing relations of Church and State.' Sir, they might as well assure us that he will repeal the Reform Bill. What possible opportunity or power will Mr. Sanders have, or the whole Convocation have, of imposing on the State any other relations with the Church than those which the State itself sees fit to maintain? Six months ago the relations between the Church and the State included—and it was in some respects the most important relation of all—a compulsory church-rate. Mr. Sanders's supporters would have told you then that he would maintain 'existing relations'—church-rates included. How could he have maintained them? If he had been your Proctor, I believe that he would have done as I did; he would have held his tongue: but if he had protested every time Convocation assembled, the church-rate question would have been settled by Parliament, when Parliament had made up its mind to settle it. The truth is, that this whole idea of supporting existing relations fades away when you come to examine it. Why, there has been hardly a year—certainly not a Parliament—in our times, which has not witnessed a change in them. Look at the transfer of the whole jurisdiction over wills and marriages from our Church Courts: look at the Dissenters' Marriage Acts: look at the Commutation of Tithes, the admission of Jews to Parliament, Church-rates, and a multitude of smaller matters, in which changes have from time to time been made. The course of events, as it has pleased God to order it, is making and will make perpetual alterations in such things; and it is our wisdom to recognise the fact, not to sit—as the friends of Mr. Sanders wish him to sit—like Canute on the seashore, bidding the tide to come no farther up the strand. Sir, I have been accused, in spite of my repeated disclaimers, of hostility to the principle of Church Establishments. I believe that I am a more sincere friend to them than my opponents. To me a Church Establishment represents the will of an united people; and there is no political fabric more admirable to me than that of a State identical with the Church, because every citizen of the one is also a true member of the other."

The Tablet, under the heading "Newspaper Morality," has been "down" upon the Saturday Review and the Pall Mall Gazette, with the evident object of preventing Roman Catholics from reading these papers on account of what it regards as their irreligious character. In a defence of itself, in which it declares the charge to be "altogether untrue" that on the great fundamental question, Is there a God? it showed sympathy with those who took the negative side of the question, the Pall Mall says:

"We do not believe that our critic in the Tablet would say, if he were directly asked the question, that he believes in his heart that the writers of the articles, or that the managers of the papers in question, are bad men in any broad sense of the words. A newspaper may do many bad things. It may misrepresent; it may libel and slander; it may pander to base passions in a score of ways. We do not pretend to be faultless, but, setting aside the fact of our utter rejection of Catholicism and of our refusal to regard its truth as a matter worthy of serious argument, we would ask our critic himself whether, in his heart, he thinks us bad—bad judged according to our own and according to the ordinary standard of morality? If yes, let him specify the grounds of his opinion. If no, then the religious opinions which he regards with horror are consistent with goodness; and if so he may talk and write for ever without persuading men to regard the bare holding them as a crime. But it is a fundamental tenet of his own creed that to hold them explicitly, with a full appreciation of their meaning, is a deadly sin; and how can habitual wilful deadly sin, a state of damnation, be consistent with moral goodness? The question has been asked in millions of hearts for many centuries. Did any man of sense ever answer it fairly, and with an acknowledgment of the real difficulties connected with it, without ceasing to be a real thoroughgoing Catholic?"

In his speech to his constituents, Mr. Disraeli described the people of Ireland as surrounded by a "melancholy ocean." Fun asks, "Was he alluding to the Irish seas?"

Mr. Adderley, ex-Under-Secretary for the Colonies, in a letter to the Times, respecting the action of the Christian Knowledge Society, observes:

"It is the special folly of certain Churchmen to suppose that Convocation, or any body they may institute among themselves, has any legal authority or power beyond their own internal relations. Dr. Colenso is de facto Bishop of Natal. His letters patent remain uncancelled, and no valid decision has been judicially given either against his doctrine or authority. For the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge to grant out funds intrusted to it for that purpose to enable a rival Bishop to exercise Episcopal functions within an occupied see is either to ignore and usurp authority, or to treat Christian knowledge as synonymous with schism. So glaring a breach of trust and misappropriation of Church property are in no way palliated by being disguised under fictitious designations. Whether the proposed rival Bishop be called a roving missionary, or assume the title of an ideal see, or conceal his real purpose in any other way, if the intention is that he should trespass Episcopally on the occupied see of Natal, it would be better done openly and directly; the mask will not even hide, still less excuse, the violence done to constitutional authority and Church principles, nor mitigate the injury caused to the permanent interests of the Christian religion."

James Taylor, B.D., head master of the Grammar-school, Wakefield, has come forth in a pamphlet which, we feel sure, will make those who read it "all admire." It is entitled "A Commentary on the 'Chapter of Autobiography,' by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P.; proving from his own words, that no portion, however small, of the interests of his countrymen should be entrusted to his hands." Our readers may imagine how badly poor Mr. Gladstone fares in the hands of a head master of a grammar school, and how severely he whips him. And he seems, too, to threaten something still more terrible in the future, for "there is a limit to passive obedience, though it is no easy matter, especially h-foreh nd, to fix the point." We should have feared, however, from Mr. Taylor's account, that this point must have been reached already. This, according to him, is the actual condition of things:

"Everything in Ireland, even the Church of the Living God, is being given up to the rebellious attitude of the Romish peasantry and the imperious demands of the Popish bishops and priests; and so, we are told, it is to be in England soon, in obedience to the proud behests of Protestant Nonconformists. The brace, though impelled by different motives, run well together; the former stimulated by interest, the latter by envy. One hopes to share the sacrilegious spoil, the other to be on a level with the rest, where all are low. Clamour, threats, and rebellion, both in Ireland and England, are by instalments claiming all they want, and getting all they claim."

When in a state like this, Mr. Taylor merely says, "By and by, resistance may become a duty," he reminds us of the man who exclaimed, "Sir, you've beaten me, and kicked me, and spit upon me—beware, lest you rouse the sleeping lion!" The head-master, however, conscious of a giant's strength, mercifully tries the mild measure of a pamphlet first; but if this proves ineffectual, then he will "be no unwilling witness or even agent in God's hand to inflict righteous retribution," and the "despoilers of our Zion will assuredly bite the dust."

The Pall Mall says:

"A good many people have heard of the story of the ardent young Puseyite of the early days of Puseyism, who went down upon his knees before his bishop and entreated the episcopal blessing. 'God bless my soul!' exclaimed the astonished prelate; 'who am I, a miserable sinner, that I should give a blessing to any one?' It is gratifying to learn, as we do from a very advanced 'religious' newspaper, that for the future no English bishop need be disturbed by the want of a formula appropriate to the most startling occasions. Mr. Walker has published a book, called 'The Services of the Church,' in which he kindly comes to the aid of the bench, by suggesting to them a variety of 'Episcopal Benedictions' for their use when called upon. We are not in a position to state whether these 'Benedictions' have been designed by Mr. Walker with any special reference to the varieties of religious opinion cherished by the several members of the Anglican Episcopate. Still it may be hoped that for the present the supply will be found equal to the demand. In other necessities for episcopal and sacerdotal use it appears that Mr. Walker's volume abounds. There are innumerable 'introits, gradualls, and tracts;' and, which is doubtless an important thing, the 'cautel's' are given at the end of the communion office. Also, bishops are instructed how to bless plate and vestments, and to consecrate 'oil and chrism;' also, but we are ignorant whether these are strictly episcopal functions, how to bless 'candles, ashes, and palms.' Further, we are presented with a rubric, invented, it seems, by a Greek archbishop of Canterbury, one Theodore of Tarsus, which it is supposed must convince the most timid of Puseyites. Again, such persons as do not practise fasting are confronted with such overwhelming authorities as the Penitential of Archbishop Egbert, the Capitula of Archbishop Theodore, and the canons of a national council under King Edgar, before which even the most unwilling must yield, even though the whole of the living Convocation of bishops, deans, and proctors unhappily take the opposite side. But, in all seriousness, what a hollow sham is all this begging, borrowing, and stealing of rules and ceremonies from an extinct past! Are we really asked to believe that the English bench is on the look-out for forms of words to help them in reviving all these long-forgotten 'blessings' and 'consecrations?' If the whole thing is not of the nature of a prodigious jest, what is it?"

CHRISTIAN OR NOT CHRISTIAN.

In the November number of the Christian Examiner Dr. Bellows has a long paper on the late National Conference, in which he states in the following clear and able way the real question at issue between those who are trying to edge off to a Theistic basis, and those who hold out for distinctive Christianity:—

"Is the Christian Church the main instrument to be depended on for the moral and spiritual culture and salvation of humanity? The question is not, Is it the only one? or whether other instruments are not very important. But is it the main instrument; and is it the instrument which the Unitarian denomination comes in council together to strengthen and maintain. If this be conceded,—and although it would be disputed probably by the gentlemen who have formed the Free Religious Association, it would, we are convinced, be sustained by the vote of nine-tenths of the Unitarian body, could it be distinctly and separately brought before them,—then the question arises, on what does this instrument, the Christian church, rest? What has made it what it is; and what keeps it what it is? There is an honest difference on this point, but a difference which forbids any compromise on the part of those who adopt the positive side? They say, the Christian Church owed its birth, its power, its peculiarity, to the personal influence, the personal character, the personal sacrifice, the personal resurrection of Jesus Christ. Christianity is not a system of ideas or opinions, but an influence which, put in motion by the miraculous or supernatural, or simply incalculable personality of Jesus Christ, has deposited the external church as its historic condition, and communicated by its divine tradition and through the unbroken fellowship and communion of personal discipleship, that Christian faith and spirit which is the life of human souls in their highest and holiest inward experience and outward conformity. They feel that the personality of Jesus Christ gives the only value to Christianity which it possesses over any abstract system of moral philosophy or devout speculation; converts what would else be a theory into an institution, and makes all the difference between a warm, living influence, objective in its origin and existence, and opening its arms to receive and nurse the spiritual infancy of succeeding generations, and a cold, barren abstraction, which must be realised subjectively by voluntary and persistent individual effort, and which possesses only that power given to it by the mind and heart and will of its studious receiver. Weaken the connection between Christ and Christianity, and you diminish proportionately its power over the affections and the will, although you may possibly increase its acceptableness to one order of intellects; an order by no means the highest, even when Mill and Spencer and Bain are counted as its exemplars. Pure intellect, like pure oxygen, is not a vitalising element. The greatest minds are not the most purely intellectual ones, but the minds in which reason, affection, sympathy and imagination blend in the largest quantities in the truest proportions. Shakspeare's or Milton's instinct in regard to the place Christ had in his religion would be worth vastly more than Comte's or Mill's logical inferences. And the common sense of eighteen centuries, during every one of which this question has not been without its able disputants, has rightfully a weight in its wide wisdom of instinctive belief in the inseparable relation of Jesus Christ to his own religion, which it would take a thousand minds like Herbert Spencer's or Huxley's or Tyndall's to outbalance.

Again he says:—

The real question before the Unitarian Conference, at its three sessions, has been this: Are we inside or outside the Christian church? Have we broken with Jesus Christ as our Mediator and Saviour, or not? Conceal it, evade it, slip round it, or fill the air with the golden dust of sparkling charities and glittering generalities as we may, this is the real question; the question which is conscious of itself in the minds and hearts of the few who are in the habit of carefully defining their thoughts and feelings to themselves, and is dimly and unconsciously working in the minds and hearts of all the rest.

JEWISH BUTCHERY.

FROM an action just tried in the Court of Exchequer, in which a Jewish butcher charged Dr. Adler, the Chief Rabbi, with having slandered him and injured his business, it appears that the Jews have not lost their ancient punctiliousness with regard to "meats," whatever they may have done with regard to "drinks," but still make it a religious question in what way animals shall be killed for the table. Among the witnesses examined was Dr. Marks, Professor of Hebrew in University College, London, who gave some curious evidence. He said: The word "kosher," synonymous with "right" and "correct," has a general application among Jews, and applies to everything which is fit to be eaten or fit to be used by Jews, in a religious sense, which includes ritual customs. The other word "trefa" occurs in the book of Leviticus and other parts of the Pentateuch, in connection with the foregoing word "nebila," which means anything that dies of itself. It is held traditionally by Jews that it applies also to an animal which after having been slaughtered, discovers on examination a disease of which it would have died if it had not been slaughtered. "Trefa" means that which is torn. That is its primitive meaning, and it is believed by Jews that it referred originally to an animal that might have been torn by a beast of prey, inasmuch as anything so torn was unfit for food. It became in course of time a generic term, and applied to everything that was unfit for food or for religious use by Jews. To be fit for the consumption of Jews, an animal must be slaughtered by having its throat cut. Then all the life-blood is allowed to run out. The slaughterer is not a butcher in the accepted sense of the term. He is a man who must be qualified in many respects which do not apply to a seller of meat. He must be thoroughly conversant with all the laws and regulations that have traditionally been handed down with respect to the slaughter of cattle. Again, he must be a man of steady hand and great sensitiveness of touch. The principle of slaughtering animals amongst the Jews, which is based on pure humanity, seeks to save the poor brute any unnecessary pain. His touch must be so correct as to feel the slightest notch on the slaughtering knife.—Mr. Baron Martin: I thought that stunning the animal was the least painful death.—Professor Marks: There has been great discussion in Paris of late with respect to the easiest mode of killing meat, and the question has been submitted to a commission of medical men and others, and by far the majority has determined that the Jewish mode of killing causes the least amount of pain to the animal. I have to add another qualification. The slaughterer must be a man of high moral character. In opening the animal he must make a thorough inspection of it, and if he finds it in any way diseased he pronounces "trefa"—that it is unfit for the food of Jews. That is all that relates to his duty as slaughterer.—Mr. Lewis: Does a person before he becomes a slaughterer undergo an examination? Mr. Marks: He is bound to undergo an examination before the ecclesiastical authorities of the place with respect to the three qualifications I have mentioned. If he undergoes that examination satisfactorily he is a qualified slaughterer of cattle in that district over which the ecclesiastical authority extends. He is not qualified for all places. It is the custom when a slaughterer of cattle comes from abroad, bearing the certificate of a foreign rabbi, and wishing to practise here, that he shall submit his certificate to the inspection of the ecclesiastical authorities of the place where he intends to carry on business. It rests with those authorities to grant permission at once, or to require the slaughterer to undergo a fresh examination as to fitness. It also rests with them to postpone permission until full inquiries have been made as to why he left his former place, and as to whether there is anything against his moral character. A man licensed to kill at Hamburg is licensed to kill here, subject to the qualification I have mentioned. When meat is pronounced "kosher" a seal is placed on it, stating that it has been killed according to the traditional customs of the Jews.—Mr. Lewis: May meat so stamped be exhibited for sale either by a Jew or a Christian?—Mr. Marks: I must answer that question in a qualified manner. In London it could not properly be sold by a Christian, but in the provinces it might, because it is not difficult to find Jewish butchers in London, where Jewish consumers of meat are counted by thousands. It is difficult, if not impossible, to find Jewish butchers in the provinces ready to enter into the business. In the provinces meat properly stamped may be sold by non-Jewish butchers.

SYLLOGISMS FOR STATE CHURCHMEN.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Methodist Times, who is "very much astonished at the course Mr. Joseph Barker has taken in relation to the question of State Churches, and still more at the arguments he employs," begs him to "just tackle the following arguments."

1. "The existence of a State Church is necessary to give the State a religious or godly character;" but such a Church may be the Church of a minority; therefore, the godliness of a State depends upon a minority, or, a part is equal to the whole.

2. "But the godliness of a State is distinct from that of the Commonwealth," the latter being godly if the people are so, the former being ungodly without a State Church. But the State, or governing bodies, being composed of persons taken from the Commonwealth, is really for the purposes of government, the Commonwealth itself, if properly constituted, and will necessarily possess in its individual members the constituent elements possessed by the general society derived by the process of representation; therefore, the State may be godly as to its individual members, but ungodly in its collective form, or a thing might be black and white, right and wrong, good and evil at the same time.

3. "The establishment of Churches by the State is a proof of its godliness;" but States have Established Churches professing antagonistic creeds; therefore godliness does not depend upon belief of any creed, or all creeds are made equally the instruments of promoting godliness by the fact of their being established by Government. If the former, then practice no longer depends upon principles; but, if the latter, then their force depends upon the authority which imposes them, and not on the principles they contain.

4. The establishment of Churches by the State is expressive of its religious faith, or it is not; if the latter, Dean Close's reason for establishments is repudiated; but, if the former, then the State is inconsistent, for it has established Churches professing creeds which are mutually antagonistic.

5. The godliness of a nation depends upon the extent to which its people are under the influence of the truth: but the State Church may influence only the minority; therefore, the State Church may not be adequate to the promotion of national godliness.

6. The State exists for the general good of all classes in the Commonwealth, and to this end all its institutions should directly tend: but this establishment of the Church is a convenience only to the minority; therefore, the State has established an institution for the minority at the expense of all other classes in the nation.

7. "The establishment of a Church by the State is for the maintenance of Scriptural truth," since a Church must enforce uniformity in the teaching of its doctrinal articles or otherwise; if the latter, it will include within its pale many varieties of belief contrary to said uniformity; if the former, it will repress freedom by pains and penalties, or, giving this freedom, it will expel or excommunicate dissentients, and create protesting bodies outside the pale. In the former case the establishment ceases to be a witness for the Truth, and in the latter case it becomes an engine of intolerance and oppression to a portion of the nation.

8. The State Church must either tolerate dissent or extinguish it by force; if the latter, it must be by the employment of authority derived from all classes in the Commonwealth; but, if the former, it concedes the justice of dissent and its right to promote the dissolution of the State Church.

9. All the governing bodies of the State derive their authority from the national will; but all derived authority is responsible to the power which confers it; therefore, all the governing bodies are responsible to the national will.

DISESTABLISHMENT AND DIS- ENDOWMENT.

At a time like the present, we must be prepared to meet with attempts from many quarters to divide the ranks of those who are struggling to remedy the gross injustice of the Irish Establishment; and we must not be surprised at exultation in the opposition camp at any appearance of disagreement. It is natural that the pro-Establishment party should rejoice over Mr. SAMUEL MORLEY'S withdrawal from the Executive Committee of the Liberation Society. At the very time when that society is receiving from various parties unexpected accessions of strength, it finds itself deserted by one of its oldest and warmest supporters. Just when many Churchmen are avowing their adherence to its leading principle, that the religious life of a people should work itself out alike unpatronised and uncontrolled by Government; just when even reluctant Nonconformity is admitting, that, after all, the only perfectly comprehensive Church must be that aggregate of all the Christian life of the country, organising itself and dividing or drawing together according to its own affinities, which constitutes the true universal Church of England, one who has borne the burden and heat of the day separates himself from his old companions on a minor and collateral detail of their policy. Mr. MORLEY'S difficulty is as to the "secularisation" of Church property, which he seems to regard as a fundamental principle of the Liberation Society. We think, however, that he is mistaken in thus regarding it. Named at first on the programme of the Liberation Society in order to meet the sneer that Dissenters desired to get hold of the Church's property for their own sects, it is a matter on which wide diversity of opinion has always existed among the members of the Liberation Society, and has never been generally regarded as one of the articles of a creed to which its supporters committed themselves. For ourselves, while strongly supporting the Liberation Society, we have invariably urged that the great question at issue should not be allowed to degenerate into one of endowments and estates. With regard alike to the Irish and the English branches of the Church we have always felt that the pressing change required is not disendowment but disestablishment. Great as would be the injustice of leaving a sect with unrestricted possession of property the bulk of which is distinctly national property, we should be willing to waive this part of the question for the sake of the larger principle involved—that all religious opinions and Churches shall be simply equal before the law.

Yet, at the same time, now that the whole question has come prominently to the front, it is of no use blinking any of the difficulties lying in the way of its settlement. One of these undoubtedly is, What must be done with Church property? We shall not pretend to solve a problem which will task our ablest statesmen to the utmost before its details can be settled satisfactorily, but it does seem to us that one or two principles may be discerned with tolerable distinctness.

There is a certain amount of Church property about the application of which there can be little doubt. We allude to such as has been distinctly devoted to Church uses at various periods since the Establishment became what it now is—one, if the largest, of the sects. To the continued use of all this the Church is clearly as much entitled as are Unitarians or Independents to the endowments left to their chapels by Dissenters of past generations. This, as far as we are aware, not the most ardent member of the Liberation Society has ever proposed to touch.

There is, however, an enormous amount of property included in the general designation of Church property to which these remarks do not apply, its ecclesiastical appropriation dating back to periods before the Reformation. It was originally given for Catholic uses. Our Anglican friends may interpret the term how they will, but by no valid construction can they make out that it rightfully belongs to them. They can only get out of the difficulty of its having been left to Roman Catholic uses by affirming that it was left for the religious use of the whole English people, and that the nation cutting itself off from Rome had a right to deal with it simply as national property. And this is all that any one proposes to do now. The cry against "secularisation" is merely the raising of a cloud of dust in order to hide the simple truth—that this property does belong to the nation as a whole, and having always been dealt with as such by the nation, must inevitably be so dealt with again.

Meanwhile, it may be as well to remind our Church friends of the real origin of some of this property, and of the way in which they have themselves been dealing with it time out of mind. We should like to know whether the wildest scheme of any Liberationist would do as much to secularise Church property, in the real sense of the word, as does the way in which those livings which they are so afraid of our despoiling are shamelessly bought and sold among themselves. We should like to know the degree of sanctity, as Church property by no means to be touched, attaching to that enormous amount of wealth in Church livings gradually acquired by the trustees of WILLIAM HULME, a Lancashire man, out of the increased value of an estate which he at the close of the seventeenth century distinctly left for purely educational purposes. We may rest assured that in the ultimate settlement of the great question of disestablishment, there will be a tender regard for the maintenance of all real religious interests; but when once the nation warms to its work it will not be hindered by mere names and words.

AMERICAN NOTES.

A "National Christian Convention" has been sitting for three days in New York discussing various subjects and projects, which seems, at all events, not to have been wanting in hope. One of the topics considered was "the possibility of evangelising the whole world within the present century." Several gentlemen expressed their opinion that it might be done within the thirty years, and the Rev. Mr. Blair said that it must be done, and would be done. The Rev. Mr. Bourne, of New York, however, not without reason, ventured to suggest that the Church itself sadly needs converting.

The New York Times, remarking on the present condition of the Romish Church on this side of the Atlantic, which it regards as not at all flattering, says:

"Europe, it is evident, is no longer a field for Roman Catholic missionaries. Where will they turn to establish a new empire? America is, and has for some time been their favourite field; and on this continent they have met and are meeting with their greatest success. In Europe, with a population of about 287,000,000, 23 per cent. are Protestants, and 50 per cent. Roman Catholics; in America, with a population of 73,000,000, 38 per cent. are Protestants, and 59 per cent. Roman Catholics. It must be remembered that all America, with the exception of New England, was originally colonised by Catholic countries. It is a favourite theory of the Roman Catholic clergy that republics are the best fields for their missionaries, and that the Church prospers better in Republican America than in monarchical Europe. But this theory has one alarming defect—the republics and the Church do not seem to prosper together. Where the republic is prosperous the Catholic Church is not; where the Church grows rich and influential the republics do not. In the United States—the only really stable and prosperous republic on the continent—the Roman Catholics are in the minority; in the disorganised republics of South and Central America they are largely in the ascendant."

The Methodist Churches seem to be, on the whole, advancing more rapidly than any other in the States. In eight of the annual conferences—Alabama, Georgia, Holston, Tennessee, Mississippi, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia, and North Carolina, there has been a total increase of 33,000 members during the year 1867-8, the advance being at the rate of nearly fifty per cent.

In an article, on the Ministry, the Liberal Christian has the following remarks, which we are inclined to think would hold good here as well as in America:

"We do not believe that the ministry is declining. Here and there may be pointed out a very small specimen of humanity vainly trying to preach a Gospel he neither knows nor believes. Such men have always infested the ministry, as rats infest the holds of ships. But we believe there are fewer weak and wicked men in the Christian ministry among us to-day than ever before. The people will not tolerate them. The Christian conscience repudiates them. The majority of American ministers are men of more than average intelligence, culture, refinement, and moral elevation. If not eloquent, they are earnest to do good. If they are not brilliant, they are faithful workers in their chosen field, doing with their might what their hands find to do. They compare favourably with the bulk of the members of any other profession in the land. But it is unfair to judge a profession entirely by the rank and file, without also taking into account its leading minds—those who represent the thought and sentiment of it, who give direction to its movements, and inspire the whole body with their magnetic influence. It will not do to judge the body without its head. The ministry to-day has a bigger and a better head than ever before. It has more men of creative and commanding genius, more great preachers, skilful organisers of social and charitable movements, accomplished scholars, notable authors, remarkable philanthropists, and real saints in its ranks now than in any previous age. The great preachers of those days were conspicuous chiefly because, like parterre oaks, they stood alone, solitary in their eminence. But the great preachers of our time are so numerous and so clustered together that, like the trees of the forest, they throw each other into the shade."

We take the following articles of "A Protestant Non-Credo" from the New York Christian Advocate:

I don't believe the Pope to be the head
Of any Church whose badge is red;
I don't believe the Pope can claim succession
To aught of Peter's—save to his transgression.
I don't believe in Papal right divine,
Or own Rome's Church legitimate in line;
I don't believe in Rome's infallibility—
Her character is famous for fragility;
I don't believe in tenets of idolatry,
In angel-worship, or in Mariolatry;
I don't believe in saintly mediation,
Or in any work of supererogation;

I don't believe our title to inherit
 An inch of heaven on the plea of merit;
 I don't believe a word tradition teaches
 Beyond the doctrine that the Gospel preaches;
 I don't believe in penances or masses;
 I don't believe in sacerdotal passes
 For franking souls to heaven, not to grieve in
 The purgatory that I don't believe in;
 I don't believe in priestly absolution,
 It does not suit the Christian constitution,
 It needs the faith of very raw beginners—
 No man may license sin, or whitewash sinners;
 I don't believe that prayers can buy salvation;
 I don't believe in transubstantiation;
 I don't believe in image "stocks and stones;"
 I don't believe in relics, dead men's bones—
 Not even in their heads, though these increase
 By keeping, till they've sometimes four-a-piece!
 I don't believe in saintly portraits winking,
 I'd just as soon believe them prone to drinking;
 I don't believe in canonizing powers;
 I don't believe in holy water showers;
 I don't believe in holy shrines or vapours;
 I don't believe in holy oil or tapers;
 I don't believe in gorgeous decorations;
 I don't believe in bowings and prostrations;
 I don't believe in convents and confessions;
 I don't believe in priestcraft or processions;
 I don't believe in alb, or stole, or cope;
 I don't believe in Cardinal or Pope;
 I don't believe in Papal Bulls—and then
 I don't believe in Popery. Amen.

In a recent sermon, Henry Ward Beecher thus keenly portrayed the political Pilates of our day:

"What is a Pilate? A Pilate is one of those courtly gentlemen—polished, tasteful, expert—who is not disturbed nor warped by convictions in over-measure, who looks upon all moral qualities as a gambler looks upon cards, which he shuffles, and plays according to the exigency of his game—and one just as easy as another. A Pilate is a man who believes in letting things have their own way. 'Do not sacrifice yourself. Do not get in the way of a movement. Do the best thing. Live in peace with your time. Be not like the fool who stands in his own light. Maintain good appearances—that is profitable. See to it that you do not go too far one way or another. Study the interests of Number One all through, and whatever comes, see that you come uppermost. Do not be gross, brutal, fanatical—that is not profitable. Preserve your balance. See that you keep your eye on the chances. If they go this way, you go with them far enough to reap them. If they go the other way, go with them. Do not be too scrupulous. Be just enough so to gain your ends. Use men, use events, use everything that is profitable. Do not use your conscience too much!' This is the language of the Pilates of our day. Those who ride astride of the times, and of administrations, and of policies; those men who are polished, cold, calculating, speculating—these are the pirates—Pirates I mean! It was a blunder of the lip; but, after all, it hit right!"

The number of children attending schools in the United States is reported to be 5,000,000. For these there are each year manufactured 20,000,000 textbooks, costing 18,750,000 dollars.

THE ANTI-JEWISH PREJUDICE.

We take the following passages from an article on the "Asian Mystery" in the New York Nation, as affording a good illustration of the decadence of an old and deep-rooted prejudice:

Mr. Disraeli is the first man of Hebrew descent who has reached the high places of political power in heterodox England, and of the many obstacles which he had to surmount during the forty years since the boyish dream of "Vivian Grey" that he had had his eye fixed on the supreme prize of English ambition, that descent was by no means the least formidable. A middle-class origin, slenderness of fortune, the want of powerful connections, at least at the beginning of their career, had been overcome by Addington and Canning, and by them only, of all the prime ministers that England has known. The taint of Hebrew blood aggravated these other difficulties of Mr. Disraeli's career, and would have made them insurmountable had it begun a half-century earlier. And the fact of his success is one of the most striking proofs of the Horatian apothegm, that men change with the changes of the times. We need not go back to the good old days of Lord Mayor Fitz-Richard, in the reign of Henry III., who let loose the populace of London on the Jews "there commorant," who sacked their houses, spoiled their goods, and put some five hundred of them to death, for it is not much more than a century ago that all England was turned topsy-turvy by a simple proposition to allow Jews to be naturalised by Act of Parliament, like other aliens. The Lord Mayor of London, the Aldermen and Common Council, petitioned against the measure as destructive to trade and subversive of religion. It was urged in Parliament that, if the law passed, the Jews would get possession of Church and State, and that Judaism would become so fashionable that the church would be deserted for the synagogue. The mob were excited by a senseless cry off: "No Jews, no wooden shoes!" and the act had to be repealed the next session.

But we need not go back for a century to show the mighty change which time has worked in the prejudice of England against the Jews. London has undergone such a change of heart in that line that the citizens insisted on electing Baron Lionel de Rothschild one of their members for the very purpose of breaking down the bar which kept Jews out of the House of Commons. This bar consisted of the oath of abjuration of all the descendants of James II., "on the faith of a Christian." As there had not been a descendant of the last Stuart king since the Cardinal of York died, about sixty years ago, there could be no object in keeping it on the statute-book, except for the purpose of keeping the Jews out of Parliament. It took years to overcome the prejudice which yet lingered in the higher classes; but at last the obstacle was removed, and M. de Rothschild, his son and brother, Mr. Alderman Salomons, and several other of the children of Israel, entered into Parliament and possessed it, with no apparent detriment either to Church or State. There have even been Jews so un-mindful of their long descent as to marry their daughters to sprigs of the mushroom aristocracy of England. Knights and baronets there are good store of Hebrew race; but none of that lineage has as yet entered the House of Lords. Mr. Disraeli is the first Jew who has had a chance of taking his seat by the side of the barons whose ancestors used to draw the teeth of his by way of prevailing upon them to part with their money. But he has refused, like Pulteney, "to sink into insignificance and an earldom."

CASTLE BUILDING.

NEAR me sits a little maiden,
 Eyes of blue, and golden hair,
 Rosebud mouth, with nectar laden,
 Building castles in the air.
 Lofty walls, with golden portal,
 Trees, whose leaves are ever green,
 Lovely flowers, with hues immortal,
 In the radiant light are seen.
 Milk-white steeds, so gaily prancing,
 Answer to their lady's call;
 Forms of light, and beauty, glancing,
 Flit, like sunbeams, through the hall.
 Chide we not our little maiden,
 Blue of eye, and gold of hair,
 Rosy mouth, with kisses laden,
 Building castles in the air.
 Soon enough come care and sorrow,
 Soon enough come grief and pain,
 Youth, once past, hath no to-morrow,
 Childhood's joys come not again.
 Yet we would not, for our darling,
 Ask that life from care be free;
 Rather would we trust the promise,
 "As her day her strength shall be."

DANCING DERVISHES.

We take the following account, somewhat abridged, of these strange religionists, from the Friend of India:

Of the twelve great orders of Dervishes who abound in Stamboul and Scutari, the two best known are the Mevleves and the Rufais. The former are termed "dancing" and the latter "howling" dervishes, but both alike are distinguished by the ecstatic contortions and motions of their body to which the word dancing is popularly applied. The Mevleves present us with that dance of the spheres which was a prominent feature of the mysteries of Samothrace. Each dervish slowly whirls round with his arms extended, and all move in orderly relation to a central figure. The Rufais give us an idea of the old Thesmophorian or Persian dance of the Attic women in the Eleusinia. First seating themselves and then standing in a circle they bend themselves forward, then assume a perpendicular position, and then bend backwards. In addition to the dance they shout "la-i-lah il-la-lah"—the beginning of the Moslem confession of faith—each syllable marking a motion of the body. The notes of two brethren shrieking out the praises of Mahommed or Seid Ahmed Rufai, the founder of the order, may occasionally be heard in the pauses of the monotonous chaunt, which gradually rises into a howl, when the only sounds that can be distinguished are "lah" and "ha." Soon the ecstatic fury increases, the leader stamps with his foot, the time becomes quicker, and the dervishes place their arms on each others' shoulders, and bow and bend as one mass. Finally the orgie ends, or used to end, in a few licking red-hot irons and slashing their bodies with sharp swords. Very few, in these degenerate days, are really under the influence of frenzy, but they certainly impose on the people, who regard them, at the worst, as combining the power of the juggler with the sanctity of the inspired.

The best opportunity for studying the dervishes is afforded at the mosque of the Mevleves, at Pera. This order was founded six centuries ago. The dervishes were originally bound by vows of poverty, the word meaning in the Persian "the door-sill," as its Arabic equivalent "fakir" means "poor." But the Mevleves are now the richest of all these rich orders, having been endowed in the course of centuries alike by the Seljukide and Ottoman Sultans. The members of the brotherhood, however, are individually poor, it is said, their surplus revenues being spent on good deeds. Though all may at any time leave the order, it is asserted that the cases of a return to the world are rare. Mr. Brown, of the American legation in Constantinople, who has written a book on these orders, declares that the majority consist of most estimable and learned men, some of whom are his friends. They certainly look humble enough, with their bent heads and solemn salutation of Ya Hoo! or Jehovah. But it is not often that they condescend to salute anyone. The mosque in Pera commands

The very view

Which charmed the charming Mary Montague.

It is simply a little theatre fitted up with boxes in two tiers. They look down on what would be the pit, which is devoted to the dancing, being floored with well-polished wooden planks. Visitors may squat round the outer half, the inner being filled with worshippers who, on the close of the introductory service, take their seats as spectators of the dancing. When the writer was present, on the conclusion of the usual "Islam Namaz" four dervishes ascended to an upper box, where they constituted the orchestra. The Sheikh, with a green turban round his white felt hat, denoting that he was a descendant of the prophet, took his seat on a sheepskin at the edge of the dancing enclosure, close to the place of prayer. The dervishes, to the number of twenty-four, sat round. All were clothed, as the ancestors of the Turks were and as the Kbirghizes are to this day, in tall felt hats, brown cloaks, and thick white cotton gowns with ample skirts. After further prayer with frequent bending of the body, all walked in solemn procession thrice round the enclosure, bowing to the Sheikh, and then squatted once more in meditation. Suddenly the music, hitherto plaintively stealing forth from a reed with low drum accompaniment, became louder and wilder, and the whole of the dervishes started to their feet. Each passed before the Sheikh bowing low, and as he passed began to revolve on his left heel. The leader took his place exactly in the centre, the others at fixed distances, in imitation of the planetary system. All left their brown cloaks behind. Slowly they revolved at first, repeating under their breath the confession which the Rufais howl out. Gradually they began to extend their arms, some over their heads, others out from their persons. Perspiration streamed down all, and a peculiar expression dwelt on their features, in some luminous, in many idiotic, in all calm with half-closed eyes. Self-consciousness was in no case apparent. The shrill music rose and fell, and with it the speed of the whirling varied. But there was never the slightest disorder or collision even of the revolving petticoats. The writer timed them, and found that they spun round for five and twenty minutes, with two short intervals of not more than half a minute after the first quarter of an hour. The dancing frequently lasts much longer. A few fell out evidently exhausted. Resuming their cloaks and seats, all engaged in prayer, and the service, which lasted an hour and a half, was closed by each passing round the enclosure and presenting his hand to be kissed while kissing his fellow's. The crowd of spectators was large, consisting of men and women, the latter chiefly Levantines of a low class. Several of the American Missionaries who are doing so much for Turkey were present.

Sofoism and the theory of the religious orders of Mohamedanism meet the other extremes of Hindoo pantheism and Buddhist absorption into deity. Spiritual exaltation, freedom from the care and trouble of a material frame, and the consequent laying up of merit in this life with a view to superior happiness in the next, are what the dervish aims after. Gautama meditated under a tree at Gya, squatting in the attitude which the marble images of Burmah have made so familiar. The Brahmin Jogee vows to sit, or to hold one of his limbs for ever in a fixed position. Symeon sat on a pillar. So with the modern dervish. He too often seeks to attain his object by purely sensual means, such as the use of stimulating drugs and the physical excitement and even pleasure of such whirling and dancing as have now been described.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XV.

DOING THE BAIRNS.

The Manchester Courier is answerable for the following:

"During the summer, a minister of the Wesleyan denomination stationed in Weardale paid a visit with a friend to the wild mountain pass of High Cope Nick, a rugged chasm near Dutton, in Westmorland. On their return home through Teesdale, the minister was somewhat startled at an invitation he got to baptise a Teesdale farmer's children. The long walk and the mountain air gave the tourists an appetite, which was appeased at a farmer's board in Birkdale, near Caldron Snout, at which they called and got a Teesdale welcome—bread and milk. Just after the travellers had left, it struck the farmer that two of his children were not baptised, and as one of the gentlemen they had entertained was a minister, it afforded an opportunity not to be lost sight of; so the head of the house went out and stopped the departing guests with 'Hallo!' and a wave of the hand. The minister's companion went back, and the Teedaler, pointing to the individual with the white choker, said, 'Can yon fellow dew ba'ns?' meaning christening children, 'because,' he said, 'we ha twee ed wants dewn; ga' en te 'im tak i' back en dew'em.' The friend went to his reverence and interpreted what the good sire wanted, so they re-entered the house and the father saluted the minister with 'Can thoo dew ba'ns?' and being answered in the affirmative, every preparation was made for the ceremony. Jonathan was to be baptised first, but was out playing. However he was brought in not at all 'fettled' for the occasion, nevertheless he got baptised, and then came Nickle's turn. But the good-natured father found Nicholas asleep in the cradle, and he said, 'Nickle's asleep, an we'll not wacken im; ye ma co' sum uther ta'm en dew Nickle, and then they'll a' be dune.'

WIT DEPENDENT ON PATRONAGE.

The late Archbishop of Dublin making one day a very small joke, all the company laughed heartily except a certain popular author who was present. His grace, somewhat nettled at the very serious countenance preserved by the humourist, remarked, "I don't think you see what I mean," "Oh, yes, I do," was the reply; "but the living my brother is seeking is in the diocese of Armagh."

KEEP YOUR HEAD.

In a lecture on eloquence a short time ago, Emerson, in the course of his remarks, was led to speak of the need of presence of mind; and, in illustration of this, he referred to the utter collapse of it which occurred to Dr. Charles Chauncy, famous as a Boston clergyman a hundred years ago, who had such a dislike for sensational preaching that he was accustomed to pray that he might not be eloquent—a prayer, said the lecturer, which was answered. The Doctor was once told, while on his way to his weekly Thursday lecture, that a boy had just been drowned in a frog pond on the common, and the good doctor was requested to "improve" the sad event in his prayer and remarks. The announcement had so unfavourable an effect upon the doctor's presence of mind that he was entirely unable to get any nearer the subject in his prayer, after repeated efforts, than to pray that the "Lord would bless all little boys that had been drowned in the frog pond that day." There was no lack of talent and ability in this man; but his presence of mind was unable to stand the test of a sudden pressure.

AN AWKWARD CHANGE.

An American paper is our authority for the following strange mistake, which it declares was made in Philadelphia this last summer. One pleasant Sunday evening, an old lady whose failing eyes demanded an unusually large prayer-book, started for church a little early. Stopping on the way to call on a friend, she laid her prayer-book on the centre table. When the bells began to chime, she snatched up what she supposed to be her prayer-book and started for church. Her seat was at the chancel end of the gallery. The organ ceased playing. The minister said:—"The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him." In the effort to open her supposed prayer-book she started the spring of the music box, which she had taken instead. It began to play—in her consternation she put it on the floor. It would not stop—she put it on her seat—it sounded louder than ever. Finally she carried it out while it played the "Washing Day," an Irish jig tune.

THE NEW HOUSE.

Punch gives the following clever description of the new house:

"What a promising House! Young, Stronge, Hardy, Birley, Bright, Wyllie, and Wise, with Manners, Power, and Hope! What a useful House! With its Smiths, Taylors, Potters, Carters, Cartwrights, Arkwrights, Baker, Brewer, Miller, Collier, Forester, Turner, and Goldsmith! (Who says there are no working men in the new Parliament?) What a country House! Containing Woods, Wells, Hills, Beaches, Caves, Moores, Mills, Bourns, Dyke, Lea, Croft, Holt, Grove, Loch, Forde, Platt, Barrow, Reed, Hay, and Stone! What a familiar, free, and easy House! With its Richards, Williams, Edwards, Henry, Percy, Walter, Simon, Simeon, Lawrence, Cecil, Clement, Gregory, Charley, Davie, and Dick! What a jolly House! Tite and Merry, with Raikes, Gladstones, good Fellows, and Portman, with Cavendish and a Clay, with Lush, Bass, and Guinness, a Glass, and a Guest! What a serious House! Has it not Palmers, Monk, Chaplin, Vickers, Kirk, and Graves? What an accommodating House! With Chambers, Hutt, Booth, Davenport, Locke, and Bell, with Clowes, Cole, and Dyott, with Pease, Whitbread, and a Round! N.B. Prices Lowe. What a belligerent House! Supplied with Whitworth, Enfield, and Lancaster, and dealing both in Ball and Knox! What a sporting House! Hunt, Delahanty, Scourfield, Mowbray, Fowler, Bagge, Bagwell, and, alas! Pochin! What an intellectual House! Burke, Sheridan, Walpole, Erskine, Grenville, Wyndham, North, Peel, and Russell; Baxter, Berkeley, Crichton, Disraeli, Hamilton, Mitford, Robertson, and Sherlock; Barry, Blake, Northcote, and West; Gray, Collins, Coleridge, Herbert Hood, Otway, Campbell, Cowper (not forgetting Gilpin), Scott, Gower, Gore, Aytoun, Montgomery, Shirley, Beaumont and Fletcher, Milton and Pim!"

SUEZ FISH MARKET.

ONE of the sights of Suez (says Mr. J. K. Lord in Land and Water) is the fish market, which few travellers visit, because the fish are landed and sold soon after sunrise, an absolute necessity in this rainless, fiery climate. The fish are exposed for sale in the open street, and near the landing quay, spread upon the ground, or neatly arranged on small square tables; the fishermen are mostly Greeks: the Arab as a rule prefers purchasing his fish to catching it. Such lovely fish are these coral-feeders from the Red Sea that one is disposed to think they were created to be admired instead of devoured. Would that I had a pen ready enough to convey any idea of the gorgeous colouring of these wondrous fish, as I saw them gasping in the Suez market; unluckily it requires for its accomplishment a gift for word painting I do not possess.

Nearly all the Red Sea coral-feeding fish are exquisitely tinted; blue, yellow, orange, green, purple, and red in spots, stripes, and patches bedeck their scaly armour, like the colouring one sees and so admires upon the petals of tropic orchids. If I may venture to be sensationally imaginative without incurring the risk of ridicule, I should say a rainbow had been cut into short lengths and that these were turned into fishes. I can think of no comparison more apt, wild though it be.

Not the least remarkable part of these coral-feeders is the arrangement of their teeth. The teeth are consolidated into a pair of bony rippers placed, so to say, outside the mouth, and they look when on the fish-stall just as if they were viciously grinning at you. It is, however, a most efficient and splendid machine for browsing off the stony coral herbage growing in the submarine pastures.

There were, besides the fish I speak of, huge ray, with tails like pliant whips armed with bony spear-like appendages, that the fishermen called "stings." There were sharks, too, big enough to take a man's leg off if they but had the chance; and ugly monsters, all heads and fins, and spiky teeth—actually swimming mouths that never had any bodies. Shell fish were to the fore, both uni and bi valve, in great variety; prawns, two of which are nearly enough for a breakfast—I measured several quite nine inches in length; and quaint crabs, not so conspicuous for size of body as for length of limbs, very greyhounds amongst crustaceans.

POOLE.—OPENING OF THE NEW CHAPEL.

In the month of March last we noticed the closing service held in the old Hill-street Meeting-house, and on the 20th of April the foundation stone of the present neat and very substantial church, which was opened on Wednesday the 9th inst., was laid by Thomas Naish, Esq., an old and respected inhabitant of the town.

The building, which is an ornament to the street, is unequalled by any similar edifice in the county. It is in the Gothic style, built of white brick, with ornamental dressings of coloured brick and Bath stone. In the front of the building, on the left of the vestibule, is a tower and a spire, about sixty feet high. The body of the church is fifty feet long, by thirty-four feet wide. It is open-seated throughout, and the sittings will accommodate about two hundred worshippers. In place of the old style of pulpit there is a raised platform approached by steps from both sides. The windows are of Bath stone, and have been substituted by Mr. George Curtis, one of the contractors, at his own cost, instead of the brick windows designed by the architect. Over the entrance is a handsome stained glass window. There is a small gallery over the vestibule, which is approached by stairs under the tower. On the west side of the church is a school-room thirty-six feet long by fourteen feet wide, at the end of which is a minister's vestry. The organ, which has been thoroughly repaired and re-cased, is placed in a recess on the left aisle, in front of which are the seats for the choir. The church is admirably lighted with gas, and heated throughout by means of hot water, and is most comfortable and well-arranged.

Service was held in the chapel on Wednesday morning at eleven, when prayers were read by the Rev. E. Kell, of Southampton. The choir sang two anthems (1 Kings, viii., part of the verses 28, 29, and 30, and part of the 107th, 147th, and 148th Psalms). The hymns sung were the 577th and 566th.

The sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles Beard, B.A., of Liverpool, from the text, "And this is life eternal, that they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent." St. John, xvii., 8.

A collection was made at the conclusion of the service.

At two o'clock an excellent collation was provided at the Temperance Hall, when a considerable number of ladies and gentlemen were present. The room was decorated in a very pleasing manner with festoons and flowers.

The chair was occupied by W. J. LAMPOR, Esq., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and son of the late Rev. W. Lampor, who was formerly minister of the old chapel. The Rev. J. Cropper, of Wareham, occupied the vice chair. There were also present:—The Revs. C. Beard, R. B. Aspland, R. L. Carpenter (Bridport), E. Kell (Southampton), J. B. Lloyd (Wareham), J. Yelland (Ringwood), and W. Hargrave (Isle of Wight); W. Colfox and T. Colfox, Esqrs. (Bridport), F. Filliter, Esq. (Wareham), W. J. Pike, Esq., Mrs. and the Misses Pike (Wareham), G. B. Conway, Esq. (Ringwood), R. Pincock, Esq., A. Balston, Esq., J. Harker, Esq., Messrs. J. Darby, W. N. Western, &c. Grace was said before dinner by the Rev. E. Kell, and after dinner by the vice chairman. After the health of the Queen, and the sentiment, "Civil and religious liberty all the world over," to which Mr. W. COLFOX responded, the CHAIRMAN proposed "Prosperity to the Poole congregation." One of his oldest recollections, in spirit though not in sense, was that of the old chapel across the way. His father was minister there for seven years, and it was now sixty-four years since he left Poole. A long course of years elapsed before his father visited Poole after the termination of his ministry there, but he never forgot his old friends, or ceased to feel an interest in Poole families and Poole congregations. It was with sincere pleasure that he (the Chairman) received an invitation from them to preside on that occasion. He was happy to say that though he came to Poole on the previous night for the first time, he felt this morning that he was no stranger—that he was almost one of themselves, although divided from them by a distance of about two hundred and fifty miles. The chairman concluded by expressing his great pleasure in finding that so much of the prosperity of the Poole congregation was due to the exertions of energetic laymen.

Mr. A. BALSTON responded. Their old chapel, he said, had for something like two centuries been the bulwark of religious liberty and a protest against religious intolerance; and he believed it had done its share. It fell to the determination of the members to decide either upon closing the chapel or taking such other steps as they should feel desirable. The advice of the leading members of the Unitarian body was taken, and that advice was to do what they had already done. Not only was this advice given them, but also such kind sympathy as had enabled them to go through with the work. Mr. Balston went on to especially thank the chairman and the Rev. C. Beard, and to express a hope that the sermon preached that morning would be printed and published. He concluded by proposing the health of the Rev. C. Beard.

The Rev. C. BEARD said that if he had spoken any true word in regard either to their past or future, that would be in itself almost as great a reward as a preacher could wish for. This was but a small gathering, he proceeded to say, but his heart warmed towards the faithful few. There was something very touching in the sight of a few persons, amid social difficulties of every kind, clinging not only to Christian truth, but also to the mighty principles of civil and religious liberty, and firmly believing in their ultimate triumph. The speaker, admitting that in numbers the Unitarians were insignificant, pointed out the various great movements in which they had taken an active and a successful part, and the many instances in which they had succeeded in bringing other persons round to their views.

The CHAIRMAN proposed the toast, "The neighbouring Unitarian churches," to which the Rev. E. Kell responded, and after various other friends' toasts, the proceedings came to an end.

At five o'clock a public tea was held at the Temperance Hall, and a public meeting at the Town Hall commenced shortly after seven, W. J. Lampor, Esq., in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN gave a very interesting address, touching chiefly on the vast importance of instructing the young, even in their earliest infancy, in the truths of the Gospel. He concluded with a few remarks on our duty as loyal subjects of the Queen.

Mr. BALSTON next briefly addressed the meeting. He expressed a hope that Mr. Beard would allow the sermon which he had preached that morning to be printed.

The Rev. C. BEARD said if it was thought that the object they had in view was likely to be benefited by its being printed, they had liberty to do so. (Applause.)

The Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, M.A., alluded to the neat fabric that had been erected for the purpose of Divine service. He said the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association had given two grants, and he believed that the Unitarians of England would assist in the work. He read a list of subscriptions received by the London Society for the Poole church, two of which were for the sum of £10; and said, in conclusion, that they were promoting Unitarianism because they believed it to be honouring to God. They believed it to be the Gospel of Christ, and they considered it their duty to communicate the knowledge of that Gospel to their fellow creatures.

The Rev. R. L. CARPENTER, of Bridport, said he remembered preaching many years ago in the old chapel; but it was very different from the new church now opened. He proceeded to speak of the work carried on in Poole, and hoped the congregation would be knit together in the bonds of Faith, Love, and Charity. In his opinion all churches should be "Households of Faith"—not merely assembly rooms or prison houses. They should be bound together by kindly sympathy and affection. He exhorted them to do all the good they could, but, above all, to abound in those things which had their home "Eternal in the Heavens."

The Rev. J. CROPPER, of Wareham, adverted to the excellent sermon preached by Mr. Beard, and proceeded to speak of the infinite goodness and justice of the Great Creator, and the duty of man to his fellow man.

Several other addresses were given, and a very pleasant and profitable evening was spent. Several ladies and gentlemen, among them Mrs. Sedgfield, Mrs. H. B. Sedgfield, Mrs. Balston, Mr. Sedgfield, Mr. Balston, Mr. Darby, and Mr. Gillard—contributed to the vocal department, Mrs. Joseph Darby ably presiding at the pianoforte.

The Rev. R. B. Aspland, M.A., of Hackney, London, preached in the new church on Sunday last, when collections were made in aid of the building fund; and the Revised Book of Common Prayer, and Mr. Martineau's Collection of Hymns, were introduced.

INTELLIGENCE.

ARBROATH.—A lecture was given in this town on the 8th inst., by the Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee. There was an audience of about fifty present. The sympathisers with Unitarian Christianity are very unwilling to come out in Arbroath, which is to be regretted.

BIRMINGHAM: DOMESTIC MISSION CHAPEL, LAWRENCE-STREET.—The children of the day and Sunday-schools were entertained to tea on Tuesday night. Upwards of 600 were present. After tea the children, parents, and several of the subscribers to the mission assembled in the chapel for the distribution of the Sunday-school prizes: these were gained by 90 girls and 79 boys. Addresses were given by the Rev. John Wilson, Mr. W. R. Wills, Mr. Miles, and Mr. Chamberlain. The proceedings were enlivened by vocal and instrumental music. The proceedings closed with a hymn and the national anthem.

BRIDPORT.—Another of those pleasant evenings, devoted to readings, &c., took place at the School-room, on Monday evening, the 7th inst., when the proceedings were invested with special interest, in consequence of the presence of the Rev. J. L. Short, the former minister. The chair was occupied by the Rev. R. L. Carpenter, B.A., and the room was crowded to excess. In the course of the evening Mr. Short was called upon and very warmly received, and, labouring under evident emotion, delivered a short address, in which he expressed his thanks to Mr. Carpenter for thus affording him an opportunity of once again addressing his old friends. He had not been strong of late, but was thankful that the enemy seemed driven back—thankful for numerous reasons, not the least among which was, because he felt that there was some important work left for him to do, and that there were the elements of power in him to do it. When he felt he might be near death's door, he had one ardent wish, which he was very thankful had now been realised—to look once more into the old faces of his Bridport friends, with whom he had spent many pleasant years. He concluded by saying that when he left them before, he told them that he should always be happy to do what he could to forward their interests, and he wished them now to remember that the old bond still existed. At a later period of the evening, the mayor of Bridport (Thomas Colfox, Esq.) expressed great pleasure in welcoming their old friend and pastor among them. He was sure all would join heartily in the resolution:—"That this meeting desires to express its joy and satisfaction in again welcoming their old friend, the Rev. J. L. Short, whose past services would ever be fresh to the memory of each, and to record their regret at his illness, and their united hopes that he may speedily be restored to renewed health and vigour." And to Mrs. and Miss Short the rev. gentleman was requested to carry the kindly greetings and regards of those present. Mr. T. Maie, in seconding the resolution, said that he did so most heartily, and was sure he should be but echoing the sentiments of the meeting, if he supplemented the resolution by adding their thanks to Mr. Short for the eloquent discourse he preached to them the preceding day.

BRISTOL: LEWIN'S MEAD DOMESTIC MISSION.—The annual tea-meetings of this institution were held in the Mission Chapel, which was beautifully decorated with evergreens and pictures, on Thursday and Friday last. On Thursday evening, a large number of persons connected with the mission sat down to tea, at which many of the friends and supporters of the mission were also present. The Rev. Wm. James took the chair, and in the course of an interesting address, referred to the added responsibility as well as power now laid upon the working classes, and urged the necessity of a thorough system of national education. The missionary, Mr. Wm. Andrews, also welcomed his friends there, and stated the principles on which he endeavoured to work among them. Readings and music and recitations made the evening pass quickly and pleasantly, and soon after half-past nine the meeting closed with singing and prayer.—On Friday evening, upwards of 120 of the children of the Sunday schools assembled, and after tea, and a magic lantern exhibition, the regular and attentive scholars of the past year received their usual rewards. These consisted chiefly of warm clothing, made by the young ladies of the Lewin's Mead and Oakfield-road congregations. Many friends were present, and contributed much by their interest in the proceedings to encourage the teachers, who have to deal with children of a very low class. The improvement, however, in the attendance and discipline of the school during the past year, is a proof that their labours are by no means useless, and some interesting cases occasionally disclose the indirect influences of the school, by means of the children, upon the parents in their homes.

CRANBROOK, KENT.—This chapel was re-opened last Sunday (13th inst.) after being closed for nearly three years. The service was conducted in the morning and the evening by the Rev. Robert Spears, of London. At the close of the evening service a meeting of the friends was convened, and it was agreed that, with the help of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, another effort should be made to sustain public worship and instruction in this chapel. We may add that Cranbrook is said to be the most Calvinistic town in the world, and there are in it no less than five Calvinistic meeting-houses, though it contains only 4,000 inhabitants.

DUNDEE.—On Sunday evening, a lecture on the loss of the Hibernia was given by the Rev. H. Williamson, in the Thistle Hall, which was completely filled, many being unable to find seats. He condemned the prevailing idea of a capricious and partial Providence, which conferred its favours specially upon some, and, therefore, inferentially, neglected others; and ably combated the orthodox idea that those who were lost in the wreck must have gone to a life of endless torture, unless they were believers in the doctrines of a particular creed.

LONDON UNITARIAN LAY PREACHERS' UNION.—During the last two months this society has been holding week-evening meetings, in eight different places in and around London, expository of the Unitarian position and doctrines. Interesting discussions have been held at all these meetings, and a large number of tracts circulated. After the Christmas holidays these lectures will again be resumed.

MONTROSE.—Mr. Williamson lectured in Montrose for the first time, without invitation, last Monday. The night was very stormy. There were fifty adults present, and they entered very heartily into the conversation which followed the address upon Unitarianism. A very decided feeling was manifested that Mr. Williamson should return, as he intends to do, next Monday night.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—FAREWELL MEETING.—On Tuesday evening last, a tea meeting was held in the Girls' Schoolroom in connection with the Church of the Divine Unity, to take leave of Mr. B. J. Williamson, master of the boys' day school, who is removing to Gee Cross, to be master of the day school there. The chairman, the Rev. J. C. Street, in presenting to Mr. Williamson a testimonial, consisting of several valuable books, expressed his own and the Church's deep sense of indebtedness to Mr. Williamson for the important services which he had rendered, not only as master of the school, but as financial and minute secretary of the Northumberland and Durham District Unitarian Association. He had been indefatigable in his labours in both of these capacities; and they all wished him God-speed.

OLDHAM: GLODWIN.—About two years ago an effort to raise a Sunday school and, it is hoped in time, a preaching room was made in Glodwin, an outlying district of the borough of Oldham. The attempt was begun, and has been carried on, by a few young persons of both sexes who felt desirous of helping in the good work. The teachers and congregation belonging to the older place looking upon the project favourably, and furnishing assistance in books and other ways, a room was engaged in the Mutual Improvement Buildings, Glodwin, and the school quietly opened in the beginning of 1867. Already progress has been made, and the school now numbers about sixty scholars and ten teachers, who attend well. A children's service is conducted on the Sunday morning by the superintendent or one of the teachers; and on the first Sunday afternoon in the month a regular service is held, conducted by either the Rev. C. W. Robberds, one of the teachers, or other friends who feel disposed to offer their services. Hopes are entertained that a regular weekly service may be commenced at no distant period.—On Saturday evening last, the second annual gathering of the teachers and friends was held in the school-room, when about 100 persons were present. After this a social meeting was held, when addresses were delivered by the chairman (Rev. C. W. Robberds), Messrs. Grandridge, McFarlane, P. Wild, and others. The whole passed off very pleasantly.

PERTH.—The weekly meetings in Perth have been exceedingly well attended, but the ball has been taken from Mr. Williamson, and, in consequence, the lectures will be suspended until another arrangement can be made. The local committee seem to be thoroughly in earnest.

STALYBRIDGE.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday, December 13th, by the Rev.

John Page Hopps and Rev. Francis Revitt. The collections and donations already received amount to £35. 5s. There are upwards of 350 scholars and teachers connected with the school, and the applicants for admission have always hitherto been more numerous than could possibly be accommodated, but the recent erection of a new wing to the school building, by John and William Leech, Esqrs., will enable the committee in future to admit a greater number of scholars than at any former period.

STOKES NEWINGTON GREEN.—The Rev. J. K. Applebee has been invited to undertake the duties of minister, vacant by the death of the Rev. W. Barringer. A meeting of the congregation was held at the residence of the treasurer last Monday, at which Mr. Applebee received a hearty welcome.

THE COMING WEEK.

Gorton.—On Sunday evening, a lecture by the Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., on "The Object of the Gospel."

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8, Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Beard.

OWING to the Ravages of the Vine Disease, the Production, and, consequently, the Importation into this country of WINE from the island of MADEIRA, for a number of years all but completely ceased. The ground formerly devoted to the Vine plant was turned into Sugar Plantations, Sugar being a less precarious crop, and sooner available for the market than Wine.

Since the disappearance of the disease, the Culture of the VINE has again attracted attention, and for a few years past the quantity of WINE made has increased. Thinking there might be a trade done if a good WINE, at a moderate price, were offered, we have been at considerable pains to PROCURE SAMPLES FROM THE ISLAND, and have selected one which we can offer at 42s. PER DOZEN.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

From an account which the Florence Opinione gives of the interview between the Papal delegates and the Patriarch of Constantinople, the Pope seems to have had a smartish rap on the knuckles for his coquetting with the Greek Church. After being informed that the Pope had not changed his principles and could not do so, the Patriarch expressed his belief that it would but embitter still more existing dissensions, to open again wounds of long standing. "Besides," he went on to say, "we believe that the best solution of these dissensions ought to be sought from the pages of history. In fact, ten centuries ago there was a Church which, as in the East so in the West, as in the ancient so in the new Rome, did profess the same doctrines. Let us go up to that time, let us find out who it is that has added, who it is that has taken away. Let us remove innovations, if some are to be found, and then we shall arrive, all of us, almost without perceiving, at the same point of Catholic orthodoxy—at that point from which the Church of Rome of the first century, by going more and more astray, seems to take pleasure in yet widening the abyss which is between us with her new dogmas and decrees altogether contrary to sacred tradition." The reply to this, of course, was that Rome could not alter her principles.

The fifteenth report of Bishop Gobat's fund for missions in Abyssinia, Egypt, Syria, and Chaldea directs attention to a Protestant movement in the Armenian branch of the Eastern Church, where "from deep conviction of its errors, brought about by comparing its liturgy with ours, and both with the Bible, one of the highest ecclesiastical dignitaries, Archbishop Makerditch, has left the Church, and is now, under episcopal licence of Bishop Gobat, labouring as a Protestant clergyman at Aintab (Tarsus), the 'no mean city of Cilicia,' of which province the Armenian patriarch had made him archbishop."

The Pope held a secret Consistory at the Vatican, on Monday, at which his Holiness nominated ten archbishops and bishops, six of them in partibus infidelium. The Pope afterwards spoke upon the events in Spain, and deplored the many evils suffered there by the Church, mentioning particularly the danger threatening the unity of the Faith, which had ever formed the chief glory of that Catholic nation.

A curious incident occurred the other day in the Upper House at Munich. The celebrated Catholic historian and high Church dignitary, Dr. von Dollinger, having been made a senator by the King, was introduced into the Chamber and took the usual oaths, but on being required to produce some evidence of his baptism it appeared he had no baptismal certificate. He knew when he was born, but when or where he had been christened he was utterly unable to say. This caused no little amusement in the House, but as it was taken for granted that so eminent a member of the Catholic hierarchy must have been baptized, he was allowed to take his seat without further difficulty.

It is said that St. Aidan's College, Birkenhead, which has been under the charge of Dr. Baylis, and is to be closed very shortly, will probably be reconstructed at some future time, under the direction of the Bishop of Chester and Dean Howson.

At a meeting, last week, of the congregation at Hackney, to which the Rev. W. Kirkus, known for his liberal tendencies, has for a long time ministered, the following resolution was unanimously passed:

"That the members of the congregation of St. Thomas's-square Chapel, having heard the address of the Rev. W. Kirkus, on the occasion of his leaving them to take the pastorate of Long-sight Chapel, Manchester, beg to express the very deep and personal regret they feel at his departure from among them, and while profoundly sensible of the valuable and zealous and independent teaching they are about to lose and would gladly retain, earnestly desire for him, in his new sphere of ministration, the utmost personal and public success, and assure him and his family of their continued sympathy and regard." It is stated that a further recognition of Mr. Kirkus's services is to be made, and in a more substantial form, before he leaves Hackney.

At a dinner given to the Rev. Dr. Scott, who has recently resigned his pastoral charge in Manchester, and the office of clerk to the Lancashire Presbytery, it was mentioned that fourteen years ago, when he received the appointment, there were only ten congregations in the Presbytery, with 749 members, who contributed annually £5,865; but that when he left the other day to enter upon his new duties in Glasgow, the Presbytery had increased by twelve congregations and one station, the membership being 2,019, with 3,014 adherents, 333 Sabbath-school teachers, 2,749 scholars; and that the annual income was now upwards of £10,712. He said he was convinced that great as had been the increase of the United Presbyterian Church in the bounds of the Presbytery of Lancashire, it was destined to be still greater.

Heresy has again made its appearance in a quarter where it was little to be expected. Dr. Payne Smith, Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, has actually dared to teach that no mystical virtue is communicated by Ordination. This, as will be seen, does away at once with the virtue of apostolical succession, and what a clerical friend of ours calls the "humbug" of "holy orders," and reduces priests, bishops, and archbishops to the level of Dissenting ministers and laymen in general. No wonder that teaching which has such issues should have led to a movement with the object of inducing the bishops not to require of Oxford candidates for "orders" any certificates of attendance on the professor's lectures.

The Weekly Register, a Roman Catholic organ, is pretty sure that the list of the new Scotch Catholic hierarchy in the Church News is not correct; and, indeed, takes for granted that the High Church editor has been made the victim of an elaborate hoax. The Register has no doubt about the establishment of the hierarchy in Scotland, but questions whether this important measure will be adopted immediately. The Catholic Church is not strong in Scotland. It has, however, had some influential converts lately.

At the Store-street Music Hall, on Friday night, "Father Ignatius" began a course of lectures with one on "The Christianity of the Low Church Party." After attempting to show that Christians of all sects hold the same fundamental tenets, and stating his views of the doctrines of the Trinity, original sin, and the atonement, he contended, in reference to the latter, that there was no Popery in acknowledging that Mary was the mother of God, and that the most Primitive Methodist believed it as much as any Roman Catholic. With great earnestness he pronounced that the sacrifice of the mass was a necessary sequence of the atonement. A simultaneous shout of approval from one part of the room was met by marks of dissent from others; amidst which he went on to say that it was for holding these doctrines, in the most primitive and unritualistic Church, that he had been mobbed and bullied in Lombard-street by persons who disliked the shape of his coat, and called him a monk, meaning a kind of monk which he hated as much as they did. When he came to the subject of adoration of the Host, and the question of the "real presence" in the Sacrament, to which he gave his unqualified adhesion, there was palpably a stir among the decided Protestants. Interruptions, perfectly courteous, though controversial, became frequent; questions were asked and replied to with singular readiness and skill; but so much time was taken up by this, that the lecturer, having granted permission to a gentleman, who stated himself to be a clergyman of the Low Church party, to reply to his arguments, signified that he would defer the rest of his subject to another evening, and concluded abruptly.

As we mentioned at the time, the question of "Church tests" came up for discussion at the last meeting of the Congregational Union, and we feel no doubt will have to be discussed again. The same subject is now being mooted in regard to Methodism. In the various societies which come under this head, attendance at the class-meeting is the principal test of membership, the only requirement in order to admission to such meetings being, in Wesley's own phraseology, the profession of "a desire to flee from the wrath to come." The usual practice is for the several members of the class to give some statement as to their religious experience, in order that the leader may administer suitable encouragement or exhortation. The reluctance of many persons, especially females, to speak on such directly personal and delicate matters has, no doubt, lost Methodism very many members, and efforts have on various occasions been made to introduce some modification of the rule. Such an alteration is again suggested. No one proposes the abolition of class-meetings; it is merely urged that the speaking should be optional.

To a controversy in the local newspapers as to the part played by the clergy in the recent contest of South Shropshire, Mr. Thomas Allen, a well-to-do farmer, has added an interesting account of an interview which the rector of his parish, the Rev. H. R. Lay, had with him a fortnight previous to the election. The rector visited Mr. Allen in the interest of the Conservative candidates, General Herbert and Colonel Corbett. and after exhausting all the ordinary arguments to induce Mr. Allen to withdraw from his engagement to vote for Mr. Jasper More, the Liberal candidate, told him, inter alia, that Mr. More, being supported by Sir John Acton, must be a Roman Catholic; that Mr. Allen might as well commit suicide as vote for him; that if he did vote for him, he must no longer consider himself a member of the reverend canvasser's church; that Mr. More was a supporter of Mr. Gladstone; that if Mr. Gladstone had his way Roman Catholics would come into power; that they would confiscate his (the rector's) living; that they would put a pile of wood round him (the farmer) and roast him; that even if he escaped this unpleasant end, and was permitted to die a natural death, there would be no Protestant clergyman left to bury him, and he would have to call in a Roman Catholic priest. Mr. Allen's wife and son, who were present at the interview, ventured to smile at these forecastings, but were sternly rebuked by the rector, who warned them that it was "no laughing matter."

At the burial of Dr. Cooke, of Belfast, whose death we mentioned last week, a large number of the clergy of the Established Church, several Catholic priests, many Methodist ministers, the leading Unitarians, and ecclesiastics of other denominations walked in the funeral procession.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS

In answer to a statement which appeared in the Christian World that "the Methodists are very weakly represented" in Germany, a correspondent of the same paper gives the following particulars:

"About the year 1849 the American Germans started a mission to their own countrymen in the northern part of their Fatherland. The Wesleyans had been labouring much earlier, with marked success, in part of the south. Now there are 'circuits' formed and regular native ordained ministers labouring in most of the principal cities and districts in those parts of Germany and Switzerland where liberty of worship was allowed prior to 1866. There are three branches of the Methodist family to be found there. The Methodist Episcopal, the Wesleyan, and the Evangelical, or 'Albrecht Brethren.' The first have their annual Conference, consisting of upwards of forty ministers, all Germans—all but some four or five, who are from America—being men the fruits of the mission, and educated and trained by it for their special work. These are men well fitted to defend their views and privileges, in the pulpit and in the press, against the unjust attacks of opposing Government officials, the antagonistic clergy, and ungodly multitude. Besides churches and mission-halls which have been built, a book and tract establishment exists in Bremen, which is using the press for the publication of translations of most of our useful religious literature, and distributing thousands of evangelical tracts and periodicals throughout the land. At Frankfurt-on-Main a theological college is now building for the better training of German Methodist ministers. But it is in Wurtemberg that Methodism has been more than usually successful in gaining a firm footing. In this country there are hundreds of preaching-places. The plans showing the appointments in the various towns and villages, and the number of travelling and local preachers, will bear comparison with many of our best English agricultural circuits. I have myself attended some of these meetings, which were crowded to excess. It is true that most of the preaching is held in the large roomy farmhouses, the people being not yet rich enough to erect places of worship; but this is no more than it was in the early days of Methodism in England. Nor is the system opposed to the genius of the people, further than it is ungenial to ungodliness, superstition, and unbelief. The social element which so strongly appertains to Methodism is quite in harmony with the German feeling. As a proof of this we may not only point to the present success which has been obtained in so short a time in the fatherland, north and south; but also refer to the German element in the United States, where there are some 300 German ministers, and some 30,000 members—that is counting those meeting in 'class' only."

The Times having asked "What is the Church of England?" Professor Bonamy Price, of Oxford, replies:

"No more important or critical question can be put at the present hour. I hold that the answer to it is plain and certain. The Church of England is an institution created by the law, and it is nothing else whatever. Everything which constitutes it a society, every relation between man and man which belongs to it as a society, is law-made. If the laws enacted respecting it are repealed, the society is at an end—the Church of England will have ceased to exist. This is no new theory. Hooker, some three centuries ago, pointed out the fact, for he said that the Church was not allied with the State, but was identical with the State. Some have tried to parry this fact by pointing to the triple order of the Episcopal ministry as the essence of the Church of England. But this is not so. Other Churches have the Episcopal succession, and are not the same society as the Church of England. No one pretends that the Church of Rome is one and the same society with the Church of England. I am stating a fact, not a theory. It may be said that this is to take an Erastian view of the Church of England. If it is so, it cannot be helped; a fact cannot be got rid of by applying an epithet to it. I am not giving an opinion whether the Church of England is rightly constructed or not; I am only saying what it actually is. It necessarily follows from this fact that to disestablish the Church of England—that is, to repeal all laws made by the State respecting it, is to dissolve it. If the State places itself in the same relation to Church of England Christians as it stands in towards Roman Catholics, they will be simply reduced to units, to unassociated and unconnected individuals. They may reconstruct themselves, no doubt, as a voluntary society or Church, but it will be a new Church altogether, even if it were composed of the same persons, for every social element will be different from what it is now. But they may reorganise themselves into several societies as well as one. This is a matter of transcendent importance, and it is one which every single member of the disestablished and dissolved Church will have to determine for themselves."

On the controversy respecting Wesley's relation to the Establishment, the Freeman writes:

"It is certain that Wesley, with the weakness of an able man mastered by the prepossessions of childhood, never saw clearly what an imposture, from the New Testament standpoint, a State Church claiming authority to be the Church is; and he enfeebled his religious action through life by a puerile clinging to the skirts of Anglicanism, when he ought to have boldly taught his followers the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free. Hence in great part the maudlin language on Church subjects of so many Wesleyan leaders to this day. The Wesleyans, however, finding that their founder's new patches rent the old garment, kept stitching on one new patch after another, till the garment is now almost wholly new, a few Church rags only remaining. Wesley always predicted that the people would not obey his preachers as they had obeyed him; but a clever politician, Wesley's superior in cunning and shrewdness, but immeasurably his inferior in evangelical zeal, adroitly, and by successive steps, completely subjugated the Wesleyan laity, and made the preachers supreme. They are now a kind of Presbyterian clerical hierarchy, and no religious body in the kingdom, on account of the position of its clergy, can be more incapable of amalgamation with the Church of England, or with any other body. It would be the gratuitous sacrifice by a self-elected corporation of absolute power over the second sect in England."

The London correspondent of the Bury and Norwich Post says, we believe with some truth:

"Her Majesty has no sympathy with the High Church nor with the Low Church; her opinions are now, as they were when she published the selections from Zschokke, extremely Broad Church, approaching what is usually termed Rationalism. Her type is Dean Stanley, and I believe it is perfectly true that she asked Mr. Disraeli if it would not be possible to make the Dean Archbishop of Canterbury."

In an article on the great S.P.C.K. fight, the Christian World takes this view of the result:

"We can only rejoice that the grant is not to be handed to Dr. Gray and his suffragans, as the Ritualists wished. But they were right in their principle, in this instance, notwithstanding. It was not State money, and the African Church is not a State Church. Why should the vote not have been regular? Dr. Gray is the proper authority, beyond question, in his own district, which, as Metropolitan, includes Natal. There was no question of law to hinder the making the grant to Dr. Gray, and the respect due to his office required that he should be the distributor. Under ordinary circumstances, Dr. Colenso could not have objected to his being the channel of distribution. To put him aside was to ignore the Episcopal system. But the committee and those whom they represent, by the final vote were in a dilemma. Dr. Gray is a Ritualist; he claims the power, and asserts that he has applied it, to dethrone a State-made Bishop; and this the majority could not allow without coming into conflict with the Erastian constitution of the Church in this country. They must pass by Dr. Gray, not for his Popery, indeed—though that would have weighed, it may be, at another time—but for his having acted as a true bishop, by setting aside one whom all parties alike agree in holding as only bishop because the State has made him one, and whom all, but for that, would unite to depose. The Broad Church, as well as the Evangelicals, had a special ground of opposition to the High Churchmen. Their theory that the Church has no opinions of its own, but is an asylum of all; that the face must look every way, not to the light in particular; that it is not a many-toned harmony, but a grating conflict of Divine snatches, fiddle-tuning, and devil's music, mixed—was rudely threatened by action which proscribed the Bishop of Natal. From their point of view their vote was consistent; fortunately for liberty and truth it turned this time against the sacerdotalism of Dr. Gray."

On the work to be done with the Irish Church, the Christian World, which thinks there is no reason whatever that the decree of disestablishment should wait till the details of disendowment are arranged, says:

"It is absolutely necessary, in order that justice may be done to Ireland, to pass an act declaring that there is no established and endowed Church in Ireland. This will not imply that the disendowed Church is to retain none of the property it now enjoys, but merely that the property so enjoyed will not be what the nation originally bestowed. To draw the line between the national endowment, which England will no longer appropriate to the Episcopalian Church in Ireland, and endowment by private individuals, will be a work of time. But the principle to be applied is perfectly clear, and in the enunciation of that principle there need be not an hour's delay. It is agreed on all hands that every Irish incumbent will enjoy his present income while he lives. This, we think, is a great boon. We admire—to some extent we wonder at—the magnanimity of the majority of the Irish people in making no murmur against such a provision. But we earnestly maintain that, beyond this, the Anglican Church in Ireland ought to get very little. Every one can understand that the Irish clergy now living have a peculiar claim to their incomes. No Irishman would be perplexed by their continuing to enjoy them. But if you leave the Anglican Church in Ireland still visibly in possession of lands or buildings which have been associated by Irishmen from their infancy with the ecclesiastical establishment, do you not run the risk of their asking what change has taken place? It is necessary to the effect of this great act of national separation that it should be palpable to the Irish people. England makes a demonstration of her good-will to Ireland. This demonstration must on no account be neutralised."

The Times holds that the Irish Church can be reduced to the condition of a colonial Church, that is to say, can be disestablished and yet retain its existing standards of doctrine and practice. The representation by bishops in the House of Lords must, of course, be taken away by express enactment; and a social regulation, rather than a law, would provide that Anglican and Roman Catholic clergymen in Ireland should rank side by side, as they do in Australia and Canada. The Ecclesiastical Courts would disappear; the administration of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Ireland would then become subject to the Courts of Equity, just as the administration of all the voluntary religious bodies of England possessing any property, however slight, has always been controlled by the Lord Chancellor. The majority of Irish livings are in the gift of the bishops, and this arrangement would be continued and might be extended; but how shall the bishops themselves be nominated? The overwhelming majority of Irish Churchmen would, were it possible, prefer to maintain the existing system of nomination by the responsible advisers of the crown; and the fact that the Crown has always undertaken such nomination would be a reason for requiring that the Ministers of the Crown should continue to undertake the task even when the Church is disestablished, in the absence of an alternative proposal commanding approval. There is no reason why such a nomination should excite jealousy, nor is it likely it would.

In remarking on the Times' scheme, thus to place the Irish Church in the position in which the colonial bishops stand at present, an "experiment which has not succeeded so brilliantly that we need be anxious to repeat it," the Pall Mall would recommend the Government "to face the difficulty of organising a voluntary religious association, specially identical with the Established Church, but clothed, so to speak, with a new body, to take over the reserved funds of the Established Church," and offers the following heads of a Bill for this purpose:

"1. Enact that after a given day the existing ecclesiastical corporations in Ireland shall be dissolved, the existing ecclesiastical courts abolished, and the Irish bishops excluded from the House of Lords. 2. Vest the Church property in commissioners, to be held by them upon the trusts subsequently declared. 3. Recite that it is desirable to appropriate certain parts of the said property to Divine worship according to the forms of the Church of England, and enact accordingly that if any body of persons who shall appear to the Queen in Council to represent fairly the bishops and clergy of the Established Church, and such parts of the laity as have been in the habit of attending its services, shall, within a fixed time (say two years), submit to the Queen in Council a scheme for the constitution of a voluntary religious association in Ireland upon the principles of the church of England, it shall be lawful for her Majesty to approve of such scheme and by her letters patent to incorporate such persons as she shall think fit by the name of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Ireland upon the terms expressed in the said scheme, and that the said letters patent shall be laid before Parliament, and shall become valid and binding to all intents unless Parliament rejects them within a given time, and that if such letters patent are issued and become valid, the commissioners in whom the reserved property is vested shall stand possessed of it in trust for the purposes of the corporation so established. The rest of the bill might provide for compensation and other purposes, and it might be provided that if no such scheme as aforesaid could be decided upon, the reserved property should be disposed of and the proceeds applied to the same purposes as the other parts of the surplus, after making compensation for vested interests. The effect of this would be, that if the members of the Irish Church could agree upon a constitution which was inoffensive to the public, they would get the reserved property—the plant, so to speak—of the existing Church. If not, they would lose it. We are fully sensible of the difficulties which would attend such an undertaking as this. Questions of all sorts would be raised and debated with much warmth, but still, with the precedents of the Scotch Episcopal Church and the American Episcopal Church to guide them, it appears to us that if the members of the Irish Church are reasonable men, they ought to be prepared to make an offer which the Government would not refuse, and there is no doubt that they might find means to summon a congress which any one would say was a fair representation of the whole body. If, on the contrary, the intestine divisions of the Irish Church are such that no such constitution could be adopted, how can the State help it? What is the good of trying to daub a broken wall with untempered mortar? In a few words, if the Irish Church is substantially a Church, if it is a society animated by a spirit of its own, capable of giving it coherency apart from State aid, let it stand forth and take what morally and fairly belongs to it. If it is not such a body, if it is united merely by artificial bonds and cannot organise itself when it is so much for its advantage to do so, so much the worse for it. But the course of the State is plain, and the justice, and, indeed, the necessity, of disestablishment and disendowment is made clearer than ever."

On a suit to enforce payment of a Church-rate at Mortlake, which came on for hearing last week in the Bishop of London's Court, the English Independent observes:

"The proctor, for the defendant, appealed to the prosecutors to stay proceedings now that the law had been altered, and compulsory Church rates abolished. But no; the plaintiffs would go on, and the Chancellor ordered the defendant to be prepared with his pleadings. Perhaps we ought not to be surprised. It takes a long time for those who have leant upon the law to learn the principles of the Gospel. In some parishes it is at present found almost impossible to collect a voluntary subscription for the repair and services of the Church. The Church congregations have been so diligently taught that the especial advantage of an established church is that it provides a gratuitous Christianity for the whole nation, that they do not at all understand being called upon to pay for their privileges."

The same paper has the following:

"The supporters of the Establishment seem to be marvellously elated by the result of the recent elections. From the most opposite quarters come the same notes of congratulation as to the proof that has been given of the power of the clergy and the hold which the Church retains upon the attachment of the people. The John Bull is so delighted with the political wisdom and energy displayed by the country clergy, and with the victories they have won for the Conservatives in the counties, that it writes as if the Establishment were only a machinery for the special benefit of the Carlton Club, and advises that every parsonage should become a Conservative recruiting-office, and every school a Conservative drill-shed. The Spectator is more moderate, but, despite its Liberal proclivities, hardly less jubilant in relation to the triumph of the Church. The elections have proved that Dean Alford, and others who think with him that 'the day of disestablishment for the English Church is nigh at hand,' have been labouring under a strange illusion, and that our contemporary has only shown its usual political sagacity in the confidence which it has always cherished in the 'moral vitality of the National Church.' Indeed, so distinct have been the indications of popular opinion on this point that 'sensible politicians will accept as final for their generation this indication that the English Church is not likely to be broken up into voluntary sects and cut aloof by the State.' We should say that, looking at the marvellous rapidity with which great changes have been effected of late years, and especially at the remarkable growth of public opinion relative to the Irish Church within the last nine months, 'sensible' writers would do wisely to abstain from uttering any predictions at all as to what may or may not be done within a generation. In the present case such prophecy is peculiarly unwise. A political seer, seeing in 1841 a majority of ninety returned to support the principle of Protection, might have been excused for saying that all question of the repeal of the Corn Laws destined to be accomplished within six years was, in the judgment of all 'sensible politicians,' settled for a generation. But it requires no little hardihood to assert that the election of a Parliament with a majority of 110 pledged to disestablish the Irish Church affords a guarantee that the English Church is safe for at least a generation."

If we may judge by the remarks upon him which appear from week to week in the Methodist Times, Mr. Joseph Baker has hardly yet re-established himself in the good opinion of the religious body to which he originally belonged, and which he rejoined some time ago. In the last issue of the Times, a quotation is given from the Toronto Evangelical Witness respecting some of Mr. Barker's utterances in which the following passage occurs:

"He holds these views now—he has held the direct contrary, and written strongly on that side years ago, but he has spent his life in publishing opinions religious and political, and then answering himself. If it were not too grave a subject for a little humour, one might say that in the final account it will be difficult to decide on a man's case who has affirmed and contradicted everything."

REVIEW.

Can it be True? An Inquiry as to the Endlessness of Future Punishment. By William Miall. London: Stock. 1868. Pp. 94.

THIS able, well-written pamphlet, by a highly-respected Baptist minister (which is but one out of several that have been sent us on the same subject), furnishes a pleasing proof, among many others, that the old, hard, cruel teachings of orthodoxy, which have done so much to hide the beauty and impair the efficacy of the Gospel, are losing ground, and that a religion of fear is giving place to a religion of love. Mr. Miall treats his important subject in a thoroughly reverent and earnest spirit, and though there may not, perhaps, be anything in his arguments which is new to thoughtful Unitarians, they are put in a manner that is well fitted to give them impression; and we can scarcely understand how anyone, after a fair and candid consideration of them, can, to say nothing more, be forward in pronouncing the truth of the least merciful side of the question which he discusses, namely, "Is the condition of those of our race who live and die impenitent, one of not only intensest but of absolutely unending misery?"

That he may not misrepresent the opinions he has to examine, he gives extracts from the Assembly's Catechism, President Edwards, Dr. Richard Winter Hamilton, and Dr. Pusey, which may almost be said to contain in themselves a refutation of the doctrine they set forth. This is part of what the great American divine says of the doom of the wicked:

"They will dwell in a fire that never shall be quenched, and here they must wear out eternity. There is no reckoning up the millions of years or millions of ages; all arithmetic here fails, no rules of multiplication can reach the amount, for there is no end. They shall have nothing to do to pass away their eternity but to conflict with these torments; this will be their work for ever and ever; God shall have no other use or employment for them; this is the way that they must answer the end of their being. And they never shall have any rest nor any atonement, but their torments will hold up to their height, and shall never grow any easier by their being accustomed to them. . . . Imagine yourself to be cast into a fiery oven, or a great furnace, where your pain would be as much greater than that occasioned by accidentally touching a coal of fire, as the heat is greater. Imagine, also, that your body were to lie there for a quarter of an hour, full of fire, and all the while full of quick sense, what horror would you feel at the endurance of such a furnace? and how long would that quarter of an hour seem to you? And after you had endured it for one minute, how overbearing would it be to you to think that you had to endure the other fourteen! But what would be the effect, if you knew you must lie there enduring the torment to the full for twenty-four hours! And how much greater would be the effect, if you knew you must endure it for a whole year; and how vastly greater still, if you knew you must endure it for a thousand years! O then, how would your hearts sink if you knew you must bear it for ever and ever; that there would be no end! that after millions of millions of ages your torment would be no near to an end, and that you never, never should be delivered! But your torment in hell will be immensely greater than this illustration represents."

Before entering on his subject, Mr. Miall guards himself from the suspicion of irreverence, or any quality inconsistent with piety, by adverting to the fact that a great number of justly eminent men, among whom he names Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Didymus of Alexandria, Gregory of Nyssa, Archbishop Tillotson, Dr. Arnold, and Rev. John Foster, have been unable to reconcile the orthodox belief on this point with the admitted character of God and the spirit and scope of the New Testament. The Church of England, too, if not antagonistic to the current doctrine, is at least neutral with respect to it; a very large proportion of the clergy, including among them not a few of the ablest and most exemplary, are among its determined opponents. And in every communion are to be found men, by no means inferior to their brethren in ability, or culture, or piety, who regard it as untenable, and, indeed, though often at great cost, denounce it as false.

After touching on the personal interest which we all have in the doctrine, Mr. Miall very justly observes that the examination of it is rendered imperative by the fact that modern scepticism finds its chief warrant in it. The number of the educated who reject the teachings of Christianity is large; but, he says, and we can confirm his remark:

"More numerous is the class of deep-thinking though unfutured men, who avow themselves dissatisfied with its pretensions and opposed to its claims. . . . Both parties agree in arguing—and surely the argument is cogent—that any system, one of the fundamental doctrines of which is irreconcilable, alike with its elementary truths, and with the scope of the whole, supplies evidence of its own unworthiness, and cannot be Divine in its origin. This doctrine they understand from the teachers of Christianity to be thus fundamental, they feel it to be thus irreconcilable, and so nothing remains for them but to reject the whole."

Adverting next to the argument so often drawn from the supposed effect of the common belief in deterring from sin, Mr. Miall says, "as well argue that the water which turns the wheel that grinds the corn, must be therefore wholesome, as that a doctrine, because promotive of certain valuable ends, is therefore true;" and he then enters into an examination of the alleged uses of the one in question, and places them in their proper light. Our space will not allow us to follow him at length through the various objections which he takes to the orthodox view, some of which are put with great force; but his line of argument may be gathered from the following summing up:

"That we should be mirthful is the will of God, proclaimed in our own constitution; but it is impossible, on the supposition that those whom our religion teaches us to love as ourselves are in remorseless and unending woe. It is unquestionably the will of our Creator that we should be of sound mind; but if the doctrine in question be true, its realisation must be right: in proportion, however, to the distinctness with which we realise it, madness cannot fail to be imminent. Heaven is the abode of happy human spirits; but unless we suppose them to have undergone a transformation inconsistent with identity, or to be the subjects of an indifference about others inconsistent with their perfect God-likeness, such happiness must be impossible. The multiplication of our race is the appointment of Providence; but the more that are born, the more are consigned to endless perdition; therefore, the fewer that are born the better. The claims of Christianity on men are indubitable, so that its rejection involves guilt, and is without excuse; but this doctrine, presuming it to be essential to Christianity, brings doubt on the whole, and furnishes, if not a valid, a specious excuse for infidelity. The subjection of any intelligent creature to suffering is in itself an evil, and only to be justified when the means of accomplishing his greater good; but the popular theory represents the will of God concerning the condemned as being satisfied in the mere fact of their helpless, endless agony. Love to God is the sum of excellence, and the grace for which he holds men responsible; but the circumstance just described, if distinctly apprehended, is an inseparable obstacle to such love. God is boundlessly benevolent; then it comports with boundless benevolence to will the existence of creatures whose existence it cannot but be foreseen will be an immortality of woe. God is necessarily and infinitely happy; then happiness, and that in the case of the God who 'is Love,' is consistent with the contemplation of woe perceived to be not only the most extreme, but of infinite duration. The character of God pledges Him to opposition to all evil; but, inasmuch as evil is never to cease to riot in the experience and character of the lost, that opposition is eternally unavailing."

The remainder of the pamphlet is devoted to an examination of the various passages of Scripture which are commonly supposed to teach the awful doctrine of never-ending torment; and concludes with asking, whether, "viewed in the light of these various considerations, the doctrine can be true? Is it not a relic of the teaching of the Church once bearing undisputed sway in these realms, and whose characteristic appeals have always been to the low fears and interests of men? What if it be the key-stone of an arch? If it must be so, let the whole topple and fall. Out of its ruins another may be constructed more suited to the requirements of man's conscience and heart, and more in harmony with the character and truth of God." Firmly believing that this will be the case, we have no hesitation in recommending Mr. Miall's publication to those of our readers whose minds are at all unsettled in regard to the momentous subject of which it treats, or that have orthodox friends who are disposed to examine it freely and fairly, and whose minds it may serve to disburden of a crushing load of fear.

THE NAME OF GOD IN FORTY-EIGHT LANGUAGES.

As Louis Burger, the well-known author and philologist, was walking in the Avenue des Champs Elysées, during the late Paris Exposition, he heard a familiar voice exclaiming, "Buy some nuts from a poor man, sir; twenty for a sous!" He looked up and recognised his old barber.

"What! are you selling nuts?" said he.

"Ah, sir, I've been unfortunate."

"But this is no business for a man like you."

"Oh, sir, if you could only tell me of something better to do," returned the barber, with a sigh.

Burger was touched. He reflected a moment; then tearing a leaf from his memorandum book, he wrote for a few moments and handed it to the man, saying, "Take this to a printing office and have a hundred copies struck off; here is the money to pay for it. Get a license from the prefecture of the police, and sell them at two centimes a copy, and you will have bread on the spot. The strangers who visit Paris cannot refuse this tribute to the name of God, printed in so many different ways."

The barber did as he was bid, and was always seen in the entrance to the Exposition selling the following hand-bill:—

THE NAME OF GOD IN FORTY-EIGHT LANGUAGES.

Hebrew, Elohim or Eloah .	Olala tongue, Deu .
Chaldiac, Elah .	German and Swiss, Gott .

A few days after, Burger met the Barber.

"Well," said he, "has the holy name of God brought you good luck?"

"Yes, indeed, sir; I sell on an average a hundred copies a day, at two centimes each, or two francs; but the strangers are generous; some give ten centimes and others twenty. I have received half a franc for a copy; so that, all told, I am making five francs a day."

"Five francs a day!"

"Yes, sir, thanks to your kindness."

"Well!" thought Burger, as he walked away, "if I were not a literary man I would turn pedlar or publisher; there is nothing so profitable as selling the learning or wit of others."

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1868.

CHRISTMAS.

CHRISTMAS has come again. Let us rejoice and be glad. Let none of the joyous associations with the genial season be allowed to die. Though the festival be the oldest of our Christian festivals, we do not perpetuate old superstitions in retaining it. On the contrary, the idea which it enshrines becomes the brighter and the fairer the more the superstitions which have gathered around it fade away. Christmas has been hallowed through the ages of the church as the Nativity of the world's Redeemer. Men rejoiced because then was born he who by his life and death redeemed them from the hell of eternal flames. But these superstitious notions are falling away. And still we see him who was born at this season a Redeemer, but a Redeemer from another and a truer hell, that of the sin which is in itself misery, degradation, and ruin.

And we see that there is still infinite reason for rejoicing at this dear season. Our eyes are opening to see the true hell in all its horrors; to feel what glory and greatness human nature is capable of, and how it is dimmed and defaced and trodden down in the mire of iniquity. There rises in our hearts a feeling of inexpressible pity and sorrow for our captive and lost humanity, and we hail Jesus as the great being who comes as its deliverer. Yes, there is the same old reason for rejoicing—"This day is born to us a Saviour, who is CHRIST the LORD." That is the ground for rejoicing. It is a Saviour who has been born—not a mere Teacher. It is a "strong Deliverer." It is one who has the power to burst open the prison gates and let the prisoners free. It is a mighty conqueror, who has the strength to prevail over the evil powers that guard the portals of the soul and hold it in bondage. The glory of Christianity is not the new truth it teaches, for, in reality, it teaches no new truth, except by the prominence and distinctness it gives to a few grand but old truths. The glory of Christianity is the power it brings to free the human soul from the bondage of sin and enable it to live by the truth which has been given it. Men need a power to help them to do and be the right, infinitely more than one to teach them what is right. They are in the condition which PAUL describes. They know the law—the law of right, but feel no power in it to inspire them with force to keep it. They want something to give them that power. It is here we think that CHRIST comes in. He is the "Power of God unto salvation." It is not alone that he tells us what to do or what to believe by the power over us of his own divine life; he kindles in us the love of doing and the love of believing which draws us into harmony with himself. CHRIST is then a real Saviour to us, and we may well rejoice at the anniversary of his birth. There is a grand hope for the world in the thoughts which this season brings. The birth of JESUS was the birth, or rather re-birth, of a grand hope. For ages the Hebrew prophets had handed from one to another wondrous dreams of future blessedness and glory—dreams, in some form or other, of the kingdom of God on earth. That dream was born anew in CHRIST in a fairer and more spiritual form. The primitive Christian imagination pictured it as sung by angels over him at the hour of his nativity. 'Peace on earth and goodwill towards men.' JESUS, no doubt, took up the dream and said, "The kingdom of God has come near." But he added a mighty hope of the realization of the dream by showing how it was to be realised, by becoming himself the power by which it was to be realised. Surely the great dream has been already partly fulfilled through the power of JESUS. Surely the power of God has in some degree come on this earth—surely it has in some degree come in millions of souls through his influence. And as that influence is brought to bear more and more in all its purity on human hearts, when all the clouds of subtilty and false doctrine that have obscured it have vanished away and left the life of JESUS to shine out in all its beauty—then we may well believe the great dream shall be more and more accomplished and the Kingdom of God shall be established at last.

This is the great hope for our race that should inspire us at this season. It should make us rejoice in the event it celebrates, and it should open our sympathies towards our fellow-creatures. It should hallow all our social feelings, and make us tender to the young, the poor, the aged. It should breathe a purer, warmer love into the intercourse of our own homes, and make us desire to do something to bring Christmas joy into the homes of others. It should make us altogether full of love, alike for JESUS and for those whom JESUS loved.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The Rev. W. M. Punshon, in the Methodist Recorder, thus gives his impressions of Niagara:

"On my way from Buffalo to Toronto I caught the first sight of that wonderful vision, which it is worth a pilgrimage from England to see. I have since had an opportunity of making it a study, and my conviction is that if there is anything in the world which defies at once description and analysis, and which excites in the beholder by turns ideas of grandeur, beauty, terror, power, sublimity, it is expressed in that one word, 'Niagara.' I have seen it in most of its summer aspects. I have gazed upon the marvellous panorama from the Rapids above, to the 'whirlpool' three miles below. I have looked up to it from the river, and down upon it from the Terrapin Tower. I have bathed in its light, and been drenched with its spray. I have dreamed over it through the hot afternoon, and have heard it thunder in the watches of the night. On all the headlands and on all the islands I have stood entranced and wondering, while the mist has shrouded it, and while the sun has broken it into rainbows. I have seen it fleecy as the snow-flake, deepening into the brightest emerald, dark and leaden as the angriest November sky, but in all its moods there is instruction, solemnity, delight. Stable in its perpetual instability; changeless in its everlasting change; a thing to be 'pondered in the heart,' like the Revelation by the meek Virgin of old; with no pride in the brilliant hues which are woven in its eternal loom; with no haste in the majestic roll of its waters; with no weariness in its endless psalm; it remains through the eventful years an embodiment of unconscious power, a lively inspiration of thought and poetry and worship—a magnificent apocalypse of God. One wonderful thing about Niagara is that it survives all attempts to make it common. Like all show places it has its Arab hordes—Bedouins of the road, of the caravansary, of the river. All along the line, from the burning spring to the negro touters, who press upon you that there is "no charge for the charming view," and down to the spot where, with sublime contempt of nature, and indifference to truth, a notice-board announces that "the whirlpool is closed on Sunday," Niagara is a grand institution for making people pay. Of course, also, it is the excursion terminus for all the country round, and during the season attracts crowds that would make Wordsworth as angry as when he denounced the railway which was to profane his own sylph-haunted Rydal. But these cannot vulgarise it—rather, it ennobles them, kindling in the most insensate breast an awe and a rapture of which they had hardly thought themselves capable before. I have yet to see it by moonlight and in winter. Under the combined influence of these two conditions it must be grand indeed. I cannot even confess to the disappointment which so many affirm to be the first feeling of the mind on the sight of it. I was deeply impressed with it at the first, and all after-experience has but deepened my delight and wonder."

The American Episcopalians, in their Convention, have been discussing the question of more bishops, but do not seem to have come to the conclusion which would have been anticipated from the belief they profess to hold, that these functionaries are able to bestow the Holy Ghost, and empower others to forgive sins. One would have been disposed to think that a Church could not well have too many such blessings. Yet the Rev. Mr. Hancok reasoned thus: "Multiply miracles and you unmake miracles; the stopping of the sun by Joshua is not a greater miracle than the rotation of the earth on its axis, which yet is not regarded as a miracle; so, multiply bishops, and you unmake bishops." And he added:

"You lower the dignity of the office, and you diminish its influence; and instead of those wondrous effects which we are told will result from the multiplication of bishops, you will find you have shorn yourself of your strength; for the fact that the bishop's visit is a very unusual thing is what attracts the multitude to hear him. Make the visit a matter of frequent occurrence, daily, or even once in three months, and it becomes an ordinary occurrence and his influence in that respect is gone."

Rev. Dr. Andrews, who spoke next, asked:

"What is it that gives such superior influence to Episcopal presence and counsel? Is it the superior talents of the bishop? Not necessarily. Is it his superior piety? Not necessarily. Is it the conviction on the part of the people that he holds under Divine authority? So does the Presbyterian. No, sir, never. It is the jurisdiction. It is the office, and the influence of that office will be in proportion to the singularity of its functions and to the size and importance of territory over which it extends. Suppose the bishop visits each parish every month or every three months. He will only divide his power with the rector, and we shall have gained nothing."

Judged by their parishes and communicants, some of the bishops seem to have but small dioceses. Kansas, for instance, reported only 171 communicants; Delaware only about sixteen parishes; Florida only three rectors; but Arkansas was the climax, it had one rector, who was also bishop and officiated. A motion was made, but it was "tabled" without remark, to erase, in the "ordination service for priests," the authorization to retain or forgive sins. It was mentioned, in urging attention to education, that among seven millions of people between the Gulf of Mexico on the south and Tennessee and North Carolina on the north, the Episcopalians had only 1,982 school children. The grandiloquent talk of this relatively small American sect, however, is very amusing. One of the chief speakers, for instance seemed to look forward to the day when the Anglican Church embracing its English mother, but resting on America as its centre of action, should comprehend the Christendom of the world.

It appears that the Philadelphia school-officers have resolved to discard all reading books from the public schools, and substitute daily newspapers instead. By this means they think the rising generation will be made acquainted with "Congressional debates, State affairs, wars, and their causes, accidents, floods and fires, great public improvements, &c., subjects upon which the youthful mind will feed much more profitably than upon beautiful orations or pathetic fancy writings." We very much doubt it.

In an article which appeared in the Nation a short time since, and from which we give an extract, the statement was made that "mere intellectual sympathy, or sympathy of any kind, is too subtle a thing to hold a religious organization together." On this, Professor Gardner, of Chicago University, writes:

"We should agree substantially with the main idea advanced, that some creed was necessary to a proper church organization, but differ very materially in regard to its relative importance in the same. We think that the great mistake of the Christian Church, from the Papal degeneracy down to our own day, has been this very elevation of creed, so-called, to an importance Christ and his apostles never taught, nor intended it should have, in the Christian ἐκκλησία. You say that a school of philosophy, or a society of speculative inquiry, may be founded upon sympathy, but not a 'church militant, a growing and aggressive church.' We believe that just the opposite of this is true, and this conviction we apprehend to be the only true exponent of Christ's life and teachings. We believe that if Christ had intended to found his church upon a creed, he would have stated it so explicitly that there could have been one, instead of the many there are now. It seems to us plainly taught throughout the whole Gospel that Christ intended his church should be a brotherhood, united by a bond of divine as well as human sympathy, not an organisation shut in by the narrow bonds of an intellectual 'credo.' Protestantism made as great a mistake when it founded its hopes upon belief as Catholicism did when it rested in works. We are told that the devils believe; and we apprehend that a person may assent to any creed with just as little of the spirit of Christianity as the devil himself. . . . Πίστις has too long been translated belief. Trust is an attitude as different from belief as light from darkness. I may believe without sympathy, but I cannot trust without sympathy."

MISSION WORK IN THE BUSH.

The Christian World gives an interesting account of the bush missionary in Australia, from which we extract the following particulars:

The bush in Australia is something like the jungle in India. It signifies the vast tracts of primeval country where, for thousands of years, Nature has reigned supreme. But the restless energy of the Englishman has led him to open up paths in the once trackless wilds, and to build log huts and cultivate fields of maize where formerly the dusky aborigines hunted the timid kangaroo. These settlements, however, are often far apart, and the inhabitants are frequently for months at a time deprived of the pleasure of gazing on a fresh face. We, the busy inhabitants of a densely populated country, cannot form any adequate idea of the dull monotony of life in the bush, especially when unaccompanied by any trace of religious influence. There is often no place of worship within a distance of several miles, and, shut out from all civilising influences, from all religious associations, the settlers are frequently found sinking into a state of religious indifference, if not of absolute heathenism. But the watchfulness and foresight of the religious world have proved equal to the occasion. In more than one Australian colony bush missionary associations have been formed by earnest-minded Christians, and with the happiest results. As a rule, the labours of the missionaries are confined principally to the more accessible portions of the bush districts; but even these are sometimes more than sufficient to test the physical strength of the hardest constitution. The Missionary Society of New South Wales, alluding to the labours performed by their persevering missionary during the nine or ten months that he has been in their employ, informs us that "it was frequently necessary for him to proceed on horseback with bags of books by a rugged mountain pass or perilous bridle track to some solitary shepherd's hut or lonely farmhouse, where the feet of those that bring good tidings scarcely ever before trod. And still more frequently, in fulfilling his mission among the numerous islands and creeks of the Manning and other rivers, he had to make use of boats kindly lent him for the purpose, and pull from one homestead to another, bearing with him as freight the precious Bible, and delivering the message of salvation. The journeys by boat involved great toil, in which he was assisted by his son, whose help was very valuable." The amount of work done personally by the missionary is illustrated by the following tabular statement of the results of his nine months' exertions:

Bibles and Testaments sold	258
Other books sold	1,985
Value realised from same	£161. 4s. 9d.
Books given away	34
Tracts distributed, about	10,600
Distance travelled	2,073 miles.
Families visited	1,083
Services held	71
Number of new agents appointed by the committee on his recommendation	18

The need for missionary labour in many parts of the Australian bush is forcibly shown by the reports from the different agents of the association, as well as by such extracts from the missionary's journal as these:

"Visited the families on the mountain to-day. I believe that most had not attended service for four years, the nearest place of worship being seven miles away."

"In one family of orphans, a girl thirteen years of age, in answer to a question, said she had never been in a place of worship, and never heard the name of Jesus till she heard me speak of Him. The people expressed their thanks for the visit, hoping to see me soon again."

FATHER IGNATIUS AT HOME.

We abridge from the Christian World the following account of a service, held on a Saturday evening at the residence of this religious notoriety, which presents him in a somewhat more favourable light than that in which we have generally been led to regard him.

Knocking at the door as we would when making a morning call, it was opened by a "sister" in a dark dress, and we at once walked up-stairs to the first floor, where we could not at first obtain a seat. Two rooms were thrown into one, and presented a rather novel aspect. In the inner and smaller was a kind of high altar, on which were a vase of flowers, four lighted candles in lofty candlesticks, and a figure of Christ on the cross. Over the altar were the words, "The night is far spent; the day is at hand." The altar itself was adorned with red, white, and blue coverings, and had a somewhat imposing appearance. As we entered, we saw on the side wall several small bills, such as are common in Roman Catholic chapels, asking all present to pray for the final repose of souls of certain persons who had recently passed away from this world. "In your charity pray for the soul of," &c., was the form employed. Those present were principally females of a respectable class, and many of them wore jet beads and crucifixes. There were also three young gentlemen, a foreigner, and one or two men who looked like artisans. Many of the females were young, and, we thought, somewhat nervous in their temperament. Flitting about were some "sisters" in white caps and dark dresses, and "brothers of the order" in long, soft, sombre gowns. Altogether the scene reminded us of a Roman Catholic chapel. It was now time, but Father Ignatius had not come. A bell rang, and one of the young monks went upstairs, came down again, passed to the ground floor, reappeared with a glass of wine on a tray, took it upstairs, returned to his place, sat still for a moment, and then went upstairs again. There was now a hush of expectation. Presently the young monk came, followed by the Rev. "Father," whose head was shrouded in his ample hood. He is rather above the middle size; his face is pale, closely shaven, and almost feminine in its cast. He moves with a quick, light step, and all his gestures betoken authority blended with love. He is evidently a gentleman—a man far removed from coarseness, vulgarity, and ostentation. As soon as he entered the congregation rose to their feet, and then, as he prostrated himself before the altar, knelt down in silent prayer. It was all very impressive, and adapted to attract persons of susceptible minds. On the Father rising to his feet, began a series of chants, prayers, doxologies, ascriptions to the Virgin, bowings, crossings, genu-flections, posturings, ringings, kneelings, and obeisances to the figure of Christ, lighting of candles, and strange exclamations, which reminded us alternately of services in St. Paul's, Roman Catholic cathedrals, and Methodist chapels. The Father was never idle. He knelt before the altar, led the singing, arranged the chairs for the congregation, found a seat for "the Infant Samuel," played the harmonium, intoned the prayers, and preached the sermon.

Taking his stand in the doorway of the two rooms, he opened the Book of Common Prayer, and in a clear, soft, musical, and full-toned voice read the words: "Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. Moreover, it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful. But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of men's judgment; yea, I judge not mine own self. For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified; but He that judgeth me is the Lord. Therefore, judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then shall every man have praise of God." From such a text we expected to hear a sermon surcharged with priestly assumption. Not so. Father Ignatius made no claims to priestly power, or anything of the sort. We are all stewards; all Christians are priests—"God's clergy"—and we are all to be faithful. Simply, earnestly, and attractively did he preach, and we did not wonder at his influence over others. Having dilated on the text he, suddenly, in substance, said, "You will doubtless expect me to say something about the last trial that has befallen us. You know that the Bishop of London has inhibited me from preaching in St. Edmund's. I have been forbidden to preach—not because I deny the infallibility of God's book, like Dr. Colenso; not because I deny the divinity of Christ, like Mr. Voysey; but because I have endeavoured to do what was my duty. I did not threaten to excommunicate a lady from the Church of England or the Church of Christ, but simply to expel her from the order whose vows she had broken. Do not be discouraged by our difficulties. Do not leave. One has left us. Sister Margarita sent in her resignation yesterday. Glorify God in trouble—do not leave us. We shall meet in the Music Hall, Store-street, on Sunday. Come there. We cannot go to St. Edmund's. On Monday I saw the bishop, and he inhibited me from preaching there. Before retiring to rest that evening, I asked the Lord for a text, and I then opened my Bible, and my eye fell directly on the words—"I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered." Well, come to Store-street, and who knows but special unction may be given to us. There is a side room there into which you may take penitents, that you may pray with them. Oh! if you see any who are convinced—any who are struck down by the Holy Ghost—take them into the side room and plead with them and pray with them. Mind you do this. Let us break down the detestable formality of the Church of England, and plead with them." He then invited anyone present to offer prayer, and kneeling down, poured forth one of the most simple, earnest, evangelical, and edifying prayers we ever heard. He was followed by two persons, who prayed very much like Methodist class-leaders, and during their spiritual exercises the Father responded aloud in a most Methodistical fashion. "Amen," "Help us to pray, Lord," "Bless the Lord, O my soul," and "Hallelujah to the Lamb," were some of the responses which burst from his lips. Then came a pause, after which he said, "Let us repeat ten times 'Blessed be the name of Jesus,'" and, as he led the chorus, all present were instantly exclaiming, "Blessed be the name of Jesus." We then sang a hymn, the Father pronounced the benediction, and said, "Let us all now depart in peace." This extraordinary service thus came to an end, and we left the room, feeling convinced that we had seen and heard a fearless, holy, sincere, and heroic man of God. Father Ignatius stood on the stairs shaking hands most pleasantly with all who wished to do so; and a young monk, who was nursing a pretty kitten with a pink ribbon round its neck, opened the door, and we departed to our home musing deeply on this strange development of religious life in the Church of England—Methodism, Ritualism, and Monasticism combined.

THE LICENSING SYSTEM.

THERE can be no doubt that one of the things which will come up for revision in the new Parliament is the licensing system, and that something must be done to remedy the evils of the increasing traffic in intoxicating drinks. In the Methodist Times, Mr. Henry Pitman gives the following history of the system down to the reign of Charles I., reserving its subsequent history for another article:—

Before the reign of Henry VII., the apothecary, I believe, was the sole dispenser of ardent spirit; and as alcohol is a poison, it is right that its sale should be regulated as strictly as the sale of opium or arsenic. Judged by its effects, alcohol is the deadliest of poisons, for tens of thousands of human beings are by its use and abuse destroyed annually, the majority of whom are victims of a delusive belief or custom, and a legalised system of temptation, for which the State and those who make the laws are responsible. Hence the importance of examining this question in its legislative aspect.

For nearly a thousand years the laws of England have endeavoured to curb this traffic. As early as the reign of Edgar (A.D. 959) it was enacted that no village should contain more than one alehouse. A curious precaution was taken against drunkenness. Measuring pegs were fixed in the drinking cups, and no one was to drink more than the moderate draught of liquor between two of these pegs! We may be sure that such a law was evaded and abused, and it actually led to wagers as to who could swallow the most at a breath. This bibulous emulation disgraces Eton College to the present day.

During the Middle Ages, the sale of liquor was not greatly restricted. Brewers were allowed to retail their ale—after it had been inspected—(a precaution required still more in these days of adulteration); and the sale was prohibited after curfew—eight o'clock. If modern tipping-shops were closed at that hour, there would not be half so much drunkenness.

In the reign of Henry VII., in order to check inebriety, a surety was required from ale-sellers for their good behaviour. This was the beginning of the present licensing system. It was already apparent that the free sale and general consumption of fermented liquors was dangerous to the common weal; for in the words of a trustworthy chronicler (Hoveden) the land was "filled with tipplers," and the alehouses had become "nurseries of intemperance."

Fifty years later (1552) an attempt was made to lessen these evils by requiring a licence for the sale of ale; no person being permitted to open a drinking house without the consent of the justices. This celebrated Act (5 and 6 Ed. VI.) had for its preamble these suggestive words:—"Forasmuch as intolerable hurts and troubles to the commonwealth of this realm doth daily grow and increase through such abuses and disorders as are had and used in common ale-houses called tipping-houses," &c.; and justices were empowered "to remove, discharge, and put away common selling of ale and beer in the said common ale-houses and tipping-houses in such town or towns and places where they shall think most meet and convenient."

In the following year another act was passed to avoid "excess of wines," by limiting the number of inns in the larger towns. The increase of taverns and the evil practices of their frequenters were assigned as the reasons for prohibiting the retail sale of wine except under magisterial licence. This act recited that not more than two wine licences should be granted in any town, with the exception of London and about twenty other places. Queen Elizabeth's Government acted with commendable vigour, and hundreds of ale-houses were closed. Lord Keeper Egerton charged the judges to ascertain "how many ale-houses the justices of the peace had pulled down, so that the good justices might be rewarded, and the evil removed."

In 1597 the Justices were directed by Parliament to diminish the number of maltsters, and to prevent, according to their discretion, the converting of barley into malt. Fines were also imposed upon disorderly houses.

In the reign of James I., Acts were passed to "restrain the inordinate haunting and tipping in inns," and for preventing the "odious and loathsome sin drunkenness." It is on record that a Member of Parliament stated that the people of Bath, who desired that the inns of that city might be limited to six, complained that fourteen others had been thrust upon them.

MAHOMMEDANISM IN INDIA.

In an interesting article on the secret societies of India, the Spectator says that of all these societies the most powerful and widely diffused is the Mahomedan population. Everywhere it has villages, towns, temples, serais, places within which no infidel foot ever is or can be set. Its missionaries wander everywhere, keeping up the flame of Islam, the hope that the day is coming when the white curs shall pass away, and the splendid throne which Timour won for the Faithful shall be once more theirs. They have their own papers, their own messengers, their own post, and they trust no other. Repeatedly, before the telegraph was established, their agents outstripped the fastest messengers Government could employ, till the vexed and puzzled officials invented theories about carrier pigeons, dromedaries, a "voice telegraph," and we know not what. The simple explanation was that the Government express was carried by Mussulmans, who carried the private news also, and allowed the private messengers to get on a few hours ahead. The news of our defeat at Chillianwallah was carried by Government servants straight to a native palace in Calcutta, twelve hours before it reached the Viceroy's desk. Every temple is as sacred from search as a harem. Every dervish, moollah, or missionary is a secret agent. Every Mussulman Court is a treasury to be drawn on if Islam is in need. All this organisation, which has always existed, has of late years been drawn closer, partly by the mutiny, which taught the priests their hold over the soldiery, partly by the expiration of the "century of expiation," by which Mussulman doctors explain the infidel rule, partly by the marvellous revival of the Puritan element in Mahomedanism itself. The old hereditary purpose to expel the infidel when possible has become a definite plan of insurrection at the first favourable chance, which chance it is settled, is to be the descent of the green flag from beyond the Suleiman. This may happen any day, should a momentary defeat of our power in the hills tempt the Affghan Emir to proclaim a holy war, as the recently defeated pretender, Azhim Khan had solemnly promised to do. With such a promise before them, we do not wonder that the Mussulmans of Bengal are subscribing, or even that they are paying in Behar a sixpenny income tax to the temples, under a pledge of receiving their lands rent free when the day of triumph arrives. Intermediately they have little or nothing to fear. The Government of India wisely abstains from any attempt to regulate the social life of two hundred millions of men. And in a district like Dacca, where Mahomed gains thousands of converts every year, a holy war might be preached every Sunday in every mosque, and a "sacred rent" be accumulated for years, without any official ever hearing of such occurrences. Even when warned, Government can do very little. It cannot arrest Mussulman missionaries while Christians are preaching at will; and the body of the conspirators could not be reached except by a crusade against Mahomedanism as a creed—an impossible wickedness, which would involve a religious war proclaimed by Christians on behalf of Pagans against a monotheistic faith. The conspiracy must go on, and the Government of India can only, as it has just done, warn its foes that while it respects their temples, and refrains from interfering with their sermons, and does not consider subscriptions as acts of treason, it is, nevertheless, thoroughly aware of all that is intended.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

CHRISTMAS MORN.

O, SWEET angelic strains
That sang the Saviour's birth,
And unto man God's will proclaimed
Of peace to all the earth;
Again to us descend
Upon this holy morn,
And to our inmost hearts this day
Be Christ again new born:

By us the song be heard,
Of glory and of peace,
To fill our souls with pure desires,
And bid our follies cease.

O, beautiful star of light,
That first with radiance sweet,
Unto the infant Jesus led
The Gentiles' wand'ring feet;

This day into our souls
Thy rays of glory shed;
And, with glad willing hearts, may we
To Christ, our Lord, be led;

And may his holy light,
Great God, to us be given,
To guide us on our way through earth,
Unto our home in heaven!

J. A.

A TRUE SISTER.

THE house felt like a tomb.

Oh, what a miserable, lonely day it was! Dark, too; for it had rained and rained until it seemed as if it never would stop. The younger children were fretful—they hardly knew why, for they were not old enough to feel their loss. Charley and Albert—one twelve, the other fourteen—wandered disconsolately here and there, their hair awry, their hands in their pockets, sometimes trying to whistle, at others looking straight ahead, in that strange, absent way that indicates deep mental anguish. Mattie, a girl of sixteen, very small for her age, but with a face that told of latent energy and strong good sense, was in the chamber—the sad room that had been tenanted so long, and was now so sorrowfully empty! She had been sitting in her mother's rocking-chair; now she came blindly forward, fell upon her knees by the side of the deserted bed, and cried in a voice broken by tears, "Oh, what shall I do? what shall I do?"

Not all the evidences of recent illness were yet removed from the darkened room. There stood the little table, placed now against the wall, half filled with phials, cups, and glasses. There stood the sick chair; sacred now, because her loving head had lain against it for the last time. The footstool yet remained where her feet had last pressed it. Oh, how desolate! how desolate! those alone know who have lost a mother.

"Pray," a voice seemed to whisper to the disconsolate girl. "No, I can't pray; I can't feel right; I can't feel reconciled!" sobbed the young creature, almost convulsively. "I can't feel it was right for her to be taken when we all needed her so. What can we do without you, mother?" and lifting her hands, and with streaming eyes, she seemed indeed inconsolable.

A few moments after the bell rang for breakfast. The poor girl, feeling that much devolved upon her now, wiped her eyes, arranged the folds of her hair hastily, and composing her feelings as best she could, went slowly down stairs. The nurse met her, a babe in her arms, a little child clinging to her disengaged hand.

"Try to be as cheerful as possible, for your poor father's sake," she whispered. This had nearly upset the little calmness the young girl had acquired; but she managed to keep down the tears, and returning her father's "good morning," took the place that had not long been vacant. She tried, sitting opposite her father there to drink her coffee, to taste her bread, but she could do neither. Strive against it as she might, the tears would come, and when she saw her brother's lips tremble with emotion, she broke down, and burst into tears.

Almost instantaneously the table was deserted. Mr. Mansfield hurried from the room; so did the boys, and Mattie was left alone.

"Poor man! he hasn't ate anything," said the sympathising girl who had been waiting at the table; "what with his walking about all night, and then going without his meals so, it's enough to break him down, and I shouldn't wonder if it did."

"How can we eat," murmured Mattie, "when we know where poor mother is? My food chokes me."

"But it's bad for him who has to go to his business, and work on as if nothing had happened," continued the girl; "it's a pity but that he'd eat something. Besides, isn't the soul of your mother at home, and at rest? It don't signify anything that the body's in the grave, you know; for that wasn't all of her. No, no, Miss Mattie; I expect to see my blessed mistress in heaven."

Mattie was silent. She was not sure but she was selfish in thus intruding her grief upon her father. She did not remember him then, but thought only of herself. However, during the day her grief was uppermost. The house looked not only desolate, but everything was in disorder. Mattie could not see to do anything but weep and sigh. At dinner she scarcely restrained her tears, and the supper was still more wretched and uncomfortable.

Usually there had been a fire made in the large and handsome sitting-room; but to-night Mattie said there was no need of it. Where was the use of sitting in gloomy silence, alone? for without the mother, whose cheerful face had always smiled upon them, from her accustomed seat, though there were four of them, there seemed no life, no movement. Mr. Mansfield arose from the supper-table, walked listlessly into the sitting-room, looked sadly around, and feeling the pressure of that unearthly stillness, he returned as moodily, and hurrying to his chamber, began to pace the floor again. The boys, after whispering a moment, took their hats. This roused Mattie.

"Where are you going?" she asked.

"Only into cousin Will's," was the reply.

As their cousin lived in the house adjoining, the children were often allowed to visit there, but seldom of an evening. Mattie, however, was too listless and too sorrowful to hinder them, so they hurried off, glad to be out of the gloom. And there was the elder daughter alone, still asking of her heart the bitter question, "Oh! what shall I do?"

Tired of weeping, it suddenly occurred to her that she should go into the nursery and see the babe, the helpless creature whose lot was even more to be pitied than her own. She went slowly up the stairs, and summoning up her fortitude, entered. For a moment her heart stood still. In the dimness she saw a form bending over the babe's cradle, so like her mother, that she dared scarcely breathe.

"It's Miss Matherson; come in," whispered the nurse. "I told her I thought you couldn't see anyone, but made bold to take her up here, that she might look at baby."

Mattie hesitated for a moment, then went forward, and put out her hand. The lady took it in silence. A minute after she said, "The dear little cherub! how sweetly he sleeps!"

"Oh! to think he is motherless!" sobbed Mattie.

"You are in her stead, now," whispered Miss Matherson, who was Mattie's Sunday-school teacher.

"I can never do as she would," cried the young girl, half choked by her grief.

"No, but you can do your best, my dear; you have her example before you; you may be a second mother to these two dear children."

"Home will never seem to me like home again," murmured the young girl.

"It depends upon you, my love, very much, whether this pleasant place may be restored to the harmony and beauty of a family home," replied Miss Matherson. "Oh, how much depends upon you! how your father and your elder brothers will learn to lean upon you."

"But I am of no earthly use," sobbed Mattie.

"You think so, because you have given yourself utterly to grief. Suppose now you think and plan for the comfort of others. Study how best you can fill your mother's place by making everything cheerful for those she loved. Your father needs great and kind attention. He was used to seeing her smile, to receiving her little offices of love. You can do much towards cheating his sorrow of its bitterness, by doing what she has done hitherto. Besides, you are a Christian, Mattie; you believe your mother has not wholly gone; only the poor clay that suffered here. She is not lost; you may think of her as bright and beautiful in the kingdom of our Father. Why mourn, then, as those without hope?"

Mattie was silent; but she was thinking. As she gazed on the babe, her heart yearned to love and teach it as her mother would. The thought of her father, alone in his desolate chamber, feeling almost, perhaps, as if he had no one to love him. Could she not sacrifice something more for him than merely her feelings? She would try; and first, after the resolve was made, after the good Christian teacher was gone, she went to God to know what to do. It was the first time that prayer seemed sweet in trouble, and she rose from her knees calm and more resigned to prepare for her duties.

The next morning the sun shone goldenly, and Mattie, having risen betimes, had taken care to secure some of its brightest beams. Softly they lay across the dining-room floor, which with the furniture, had been carefully attended to, till both shone again. Late flowers were still blooming, and Mattie had cut a few, and arranged them in a bouquet for the breakfast-table. Wisely discarding her sombre garments, she made herself attractive, in a neat, light morning dress; and when her pale father entered, instead of greeting him with a tearful "good morning," she went to his side, and busied herself about him in little tender offices of love. The breakfast-table was cheerful; the boys felt the difference, and for the first time spoke of matters pertaining to their studies and their sports. Mattie joined them, and soon beguiled her father into a few words of quiet chat. She saw that the change affected him pleasantly, though he perhaps was unconscious of the fact—saw also that he was induced to sit longer, and that he seemed more refreshed by the meal.

Both at dinner and tea, Mr. Mansfield perceived the something different; that something seemed to make his home pleasant; and when Mattie, after the latter meal, said, "Father, you'll sit with us to-night, won't you?" and he went into the cheerful apartment, where the lamps were bright, and the blaze on the hearth reddened the room; where the green study-table was drawn up near the little work-table where she had sat, and where Mattie now reverently took her seat—though the tears blinded him, and his heart ached with intensity of pain, yet he felt the thoughtfulness of his noble daughter, and thanked God who had left her to fill the cherished place.

Ever after, Mattie worked on the hint thrown out by her Sunday-school teacher. The boys felt that she made home attractive for them, and repaid her thoughtful kindness, her patience, her motherly gentleness, by striving in all ways to be worthy of her love. They came to consult her on all matters; she was, as her father often expressed it, his right arm. Especially did he feel grateful that his little children had not been left to the mercy of servants. She it was who taught them to pray—who guarded them from rude companions, and led them in the way of wisdom. And so judicious was her conduct, that she was the admiration of all who knew her. While other young girls possessed of her opportunities and attraction were wasting their time in worse than useless idleness, giving their minds to frivolous pleasures, considering for weeks over the purchase of some perishable luxury, weeping over imaginary sorrows, and sometimes feeling that life was only a sham and a burden, she was doing her part towards rightly training immortal souls, finding more true happiness in sowing good seed in the minds committed to her charge than adorning herself for the admiration of a thoughtless world.

A SERMON SPOILED, YET IMPROVED.

ACCORDING to the Clerical Journal, there was a minister who had obtained no small reputation among his brethren for his eloquence generally, and more particularly for the logical sequence and the "impressive conclusions" of his sermons, who on some great occasion was appointed to preach in the open air, and deeply interested his auditors through a long discourse. Just before the conclusion, however, he was observed to hesitate, and then in a rambling manner he recapitulated part of what had been already said until he reached a very lame and impotent finale. At the subsequent dinner, when the preacher's health was proposed, "Brother," said one of the ministers present, "we must all, I am sure, have been charmed with your discourse; but, if I may hazard the observation, I thought at the conclusion you lost the thread of your argument, and hardly equalled your ordinary eloquence." "If I must tell you the reason," was the reply, "thus it was: Just as I was about to conclude, I saw a poor man running up to the place, hot and dusty, and eager to hear. 'Speak a word to him,' said conscience. 'You will spoil your sermon if you do,' said pride. And I did spoil it, I know; but I have done him good."

TURKMAN CUSTOMS.

IN his "Travels in Central Asia," M. Vámbéry mentions some singular customs of the Turkomans, from which we take the following:

One is the marriage ceremonial, where the young maiden, attired in bridal costume, mounts a high-bred courser, taking on her lap the carcass of a lamb or goat, and setting off at full gallop, is followed by the bridegroom and other young men of the party, also on horseback; but she is always to avoid her pursuers, that no one of them approach near enough to snatch from her the burden on her lap. This game, called Kökbüri (green wolf), is in use amongst all the nomads of Central Asia.

Another singular custom has reference to the mourning for the decease of a beloved member of the family. It is the practice, in the tent of the departed one, each day for a whole year, without exception, at the same hour that he drew his last breath, for female mourners to chant the customary dirges, in which the members of the family present are expected to join. In doing so, the latter proceed with their ordinary daily employments and occupations, and it is quite ridiculous to see how the Turkoman polishes his arms and smokes his pipe, or devours his meal, to the accompaniment of these frightful yells of sorrow. A similar thing occurs with the women, who, seated in the smaller circumference of the tent itself, are wont to join in the chant, to cry and weep in the most plaintive manner, whilst they are at the same time cleaning wool, spinning, or performing some other duty of household industry. The friends and acquaintances of the deceased are also expected to pay a visit of lamentation, and that even when the first intelligence of the misfortune does not reach them until after months have elapsed. The visitor seats himself before the tent, often at night, and by a thrilling yell of fifteen minutes' duration, gives notice that he has thus performed his last duty towards the defunct. When a chief of distinction, one who has really well earned the title of Baton (valiant), perishes, it is the practice to throw up over his grave a Jozka (large mound); to this every good Turkoman is bound to contribute at least seven shovelfuls of earth, so that these elevations often have a circumference of sixty feet, and a height of from twenty to thirty feet. In the great plains these mounds are very conspicuous objects; the Turkoman knows them all, and calls them by their names—that is to say, by the names of those that rest below.

THE TRUE THING THE BEST.

Two young masons were building a brick wall—the front wall of a high house. One of the masons, in placing a brick, discovered that it was a little thicker on one side than on the other.

His fellow-workman advised him to throw it out. "It will make your wall untrue, Ben," said he. "Pooh!" answered Ben, "what difference will such a trifle as that make? You're too particular."

"My mother," replied his companion, "taught me that 'truth is truth,' and ever so little an untruth is a lie, and a lie is no trifle."

"Oh," said Ben, "that's all very well; but I am not lying, and have no intention of doing so."

"Very true; but you make your wall tell a lie; and I have somewhere read that a lie in one's work, like a lie in one's character, will show itself sooner or later, and bring harm, if not ruin."

"I'll risk it in this case," answered Ben, and he worked away, laying more bricks, and carrying the wall up higher, till the close of the day, when they left off work and went home.

The next morning they went to resume their work, when behold, the lie had wrought out the result of all lies! The wall getting a little slant from the untrue brick, had become more and more untrue as it rose higher, and at last in the night had toppled over, obliging the masons to do all their work over again.

Just so with ever so little an untruth in your character—it grows more and more untrue if you permit it to remain till it brings sorrow and ruin.

Tell, act, and live the exact truth always, whether in bricklaying or anything else. "For," as our earliest tragedy well says,

"Right will always live, and rise at length,
But wrong can never take deep root to last."

A CHRISTMAS HYMN.

"GLORY to God and peace on earth,"
The angels sang at Jesus' birth;
We mortals join the heavenly throng,
And loud repeat the Christmas song.

And who is he of lowly state,
On whom both men and angels wait;
What is his name? what his abode,
Why sounds the cry "Glory to God?"

In swaddling clothes, wrapped softly round,
The babe is in a manger found,
No room for him in Bethlehem's inn,
Who came to save from death and sin.

Though of a lowly virgin born,
Bearing in meekness taunt and scorn;
Bless'd Jesus, shining forth in thee
God's brightest image here we see.

The Prince of life, the Saviour, Thou,
In whose high name each knee shall bow;
Joyful we catch anew the strain—
"Glory to God, goodwill to men!" B. P.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. A. Rush-ton has received and accepted a cordial and unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Hindley Unitarian congregation, and will enter on his ministry there at the end of February next.

DUNDEE.—Desirous of taking advantage of every favourable opportunity for getting the attention of persons likely to accept of Unitarian principles, Mr. Williamson secured a room in a densely populated district of Dundee, in which he has given week evening lectures for several months. Last Thursday night, Mr. Charles Dand, a recent convert to Unitarianism, gave an essay, in which he stated his reasons for leaving the Presbyterian body and joining the Unitarians. Discussion was invited; a few questions were put and well answered; a hearty vote of thanks was given to the essayist. The audience was composed chiefly of strangers.

HASTINGS.—Last week, the Rev. R. Spears delivered three lectures at the Unitarian Chapel, explanatory of Unitarianism. They had been well advertised throughout the town, with notice that after each questions might be asked. The weather was very unfavourable. On Tuesday, the hearers were thirty-five in number; the orthodox strangers were not many. On Wednesday, the hearers were sixty, and on Thursday, seventy-five, as the interest of the discussion increased each evening. On the last evening, there may have been fifty strangers, of whom about seven were Wesleyan or Independent Scripture readers, who kept up the discussion for about an hour and a half. The whole created considerable excitement throughout the town.

LONDON.—On Tuesday evening last, the Rev. B. Glover, of Crewe, lectured in the Mission-room on "What do Unitarian Christians Believe?" and at the conclusion of the lecture tracts containing the substance of the discourse were given to the strangers present.

MONTROSE.—The Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee, lectured here again on Monday night to a much larger audience than on the previous occasion. The lecture was intended to set forth the application of Unitarian principles to the real problems of human life. The deepest interest was manifested, and a vote of thanks was awarded to the lecturer.

PRIZE BOOKS AND PRESENTS.

To the Editors,—I should be glad if you would allow me to suggest to the friends of our Sunday schools, and others, the desirability of exercising great caution in the selection of books which have the appearance of being moral and religious in their character, and which books they might be disposed to regard as suitable for pre-ents to children. I have reason to believe that books of a very objectionable type of theology have been given to Sunday scholars. It is, perhaps, too much to expect a parent or teacher to read all the books he or she may give away. Still something may be done in the selection of the publisher. Avoid the Religious Tract Society's books, for in them you'll find the orthodox element insinuated wherever it be possible. The same may be said with respect to Nelson, of Edinburgh. W. and R. Chambers' books may almost always be relied upon. I doubt if our own books are sufficiently used in this way. There is Mr. Spears' "Unitarian Handbook," which ought to be put into the hands of all our elder scholars. "Mr. Sharpe's New Testament" is another of our own books which does not get a fair chance with the booksellers, and possibly not with Unitarians. "The Life of Travers Madge," I notice, is advertised for 1s. 6d. The new volume of "The Sunday School Penny Magazine," besides others published by reliable houses, offer no excuse to professed Unitarians for circulating with their sanction principles of the religious life which they themselves have given up as false.—Yours faithfully,
H. WILLIAMSON.
Dundee, Dec. 21, 1868.

THE COMING WEEK.

Gorton.—On Sunday evening, a lecture by the Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., on "The Faith of the Gospel."

Kendal.—On Sunday, induction of Rev. John Russell. Preachers: Morning, Rev. W. Gaskell, M.A.; evening, Rev. H. W. Croxkey.

London: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CLARENCE-ROAD, KENTISH TOWN.—On Sunday morning, a discourse by the Rev. P. W. Claydon on "The Angel Voices;" he will also preach in the evening.

London: STAMFORD-STREET.—Watch night service on New Year's Eve.

Penmaenmawr: PENDYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. W. B. Hughes. Service at eleven a.m.

Birth.

DENDY.—On the 19th inst., at Tower Hill, Worsley, the wife of Mr. John Dendy, of a son.

Marriage.

SMITH—LEACH.—On the 23rd inst., at Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., Mr. John Smith, of Collyhurst, Manchester, to Miss Selina Leach, of Middleton.

Death.

WESTLAKE.—On the 17th inst., at Moretonhamstead, Mary, daughter of the late Mr. John Westlake, aged 84.

OWING to the Ravages of the Vine Disease, the Production, and, consequently, the Importation into this country of WINE from the island of MADEIRA, for a number of years all but completely ceased. The ground formerly devoted to the Vine plant was turned into Sugar Plantations, Sugar being a less precarious crop, and sooner available for the market than Wine.

Since the disappearance of the disease, the Culture of the VINE has again attracted attention, and for a few years past the quantity of WINE made has increased. Thinking there might be a trade done if a good WINE, at a moderate price, were offered, we have been at considerable pains to PROCURE SAMPLES FROM THE ISLAND, and have selected one which we can offer at 4s. PER DOZEN.

Commenting on Mr. Morley's observat- ilt lettered.

"the circumstances and conditions of the of religious of Ireland are different from those of the CHUNDAYof England," while admitting that they are, y of their

Bayne thinks that the arguments for the disest-lishment and disendowment of the latter, though Y.

somewhat different, are not a whit less powerful than those for the disestablishment and disendowment of the former. He says:

"They are too numerous to recount, and each would in itself be conclusive. Take one or two. The national legislature and the courts of law ought to do the nation's work, which cannot be to adjust theological disputes or to perfect the theory and practice of ecclesiastical millinery. The Free Churches have proved that clergymen can be maintained without appropriation of the public money, and Episcopalians ought to have no ascendancy in this respect over other denominations. The ecclesiastical condition of England is one of frightful anarchy, which can be abated only by letting Episcopalianism, like other religionists, manage their own affairs, and pay their own clergy. The stupendous public burdens cannot, with effective maintenance of the services, be materially reduced without the application of a considerable sum of money; and this application, required by a grand necessity, the nation is bound to make of its ecclesiastical revenues. Why should

I run on? The fact is, if you will only consider it calmly, that the arguments in favour of the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of England are absolutely overwhelming, and that not one argument can be adduced on the other side which will hold water. Even those facts which are adduced by the advocates of establishment and endowment of the Church of England weigh in the opposite balance. We are told, for example, that the people of England like their Church. I know that very many of them do. I infer from the fact that they ought to pay for it, and that paying for it will be to them a pleasure."

While agreeing with him that it is "unwise to originate schemes which are practically useless," Mr. Bayne thinks,

"Mr. Morley has a poor apprehension of 'what main currents draw the years' if he does not perceive that the proposal for simple and universal disestablishment and disendowment of ecclesiastical bodies throughout the United Kingdom is rapidly becoming a practical proposal in these days. Does Mr. Morley think that Dean Alford is alone among Churchmen in believing that the day draws nigh when the Episcopalian Church also will be content to strike her roots into the rich depths of England's soil, and to spread abroad her branches to that soft blue of England's sky which canopies her like the smile of God? Tens of thousands of Churchmen, loving their Church with a perfect love, convinced that she is no more incapable than other Churches of freedom and self-government, vexed to behold her doctrines flung to the winds by the committee of Privy Council, and her battlements honey-combed with Popish rats, feel that the hour of her emancipation must soon strike. No one now, unless he is uncandid or a dunce, has the effrontery to deny that those who demand the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of England may be animated with sentiments of the most cordial amity towards her. And does Mr. Morley find no practical meaning in that sign on the Scottish horizon which even Blackwood deems a presage of great ecclesiastical change? The Scotch, it appears, are boldly declaring for universal disestablishment and disendowment. And will the Welsh be far behind them? . . . The Church of England in Wales, which most assuredly is not the Church of Wales, will not have five words to say for herself when summoned to the bar of justice."

THE ST. ALBAN'S RITUAL CASE

As our readers, no doubt, are aware, judgment has been given against Mr. Mackonochie by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council upon all the four offences with which he had been charged in the Court of Arches, viz., 1, Elevation of the paten and cup, and kneeling; 2, using lighted candles; 3, using incense; and 4, mixing water with the wine in the solemnisation of the Holy Communion. The Pall Mall Gazette, in considering the decision, says:

"It raises one point of considerable interest, and for those whom it concerns of a good deal of difficulty. What will the Ritualists do under the circumstances? Will they stay, or will they go? and if they go, will they go in the same direction as their predecessors went five-and-twenty years ago, or will they try the experiment of setting up a free Church of England? . . . If they stay where they are, they will surely find themselves in a peculiarly unpleasant position. If we contrast their pretension as priests with their condition as clergymen of the Church of England, their position is perfectly ludicrous. They can, if we believe them, perform all manner of stupendous inviolable miracles, they are the channels to mankind of ineffable benefits, and yet they are prevented from making a single gesture or adding a single ceremony to their work which a few highly respectable, but perfectly prosaic and unmiraculous lawyers decide to be beyond a line imposed by Parliament about two centuries ago. There is no accounting for tastes, but the position certainly must be very unpleasant. Perhaps, after all, it is not so unexampled as it looks at first sight. Genuine belief in the existence of all manner of semi-miraculous qualities is consistent, as experience shows, with very rough treatment of its possessor. Charles V. and Philip II. implicitly believed in the supernatural pretensions of various Popes, whom they treated, as occasion required, with the utmost personal harshness, and with the most distinct manifestations of personal contempt and dislike. The Ritualist clergy may perhaps flatter themselves that, though restrained as to the circumstances under which their powers are to be exercised, the bulk of their congregations believe in the existence of the powers themselves as much as Charles and Philip believed in the powers of the Pope. This would, we think, be a fond delusion, but it is the only one, as far as we can see, which would render their position tolerable. Let us suppose that they were to go. In what direction would they depart? If they became Roman Catholics, they would add a little to the force of the Church of Rome, though that little would consist rather in the stir excited by a batch of conversions than in any accession either to the numbers of the Roman Catholic Church or to the ability of its leading men. Such converts as Rome could get by the intellectual attractions of the system have been obtained long ago. There is no Newman or Manning amongst the Ritualists. They are emphatically a feeble folk, and if they become Roman Catholics they individually would never be heard of again. That they would be able to take their congregations with them, at least in any considerable number, appears to us utterly unlikely. They have certainly contrived to make an amount of noise in the world disproportionate to their real importance: but we are greatly mistaken if they have obtained any real intellectual hold upon any appreciable proportion of the population. The spirit which led hundreds of thousands of Scotch people to support their pastors in their secession from the Establishment is not roused by the feeble-minded man millinery which becomes serious only when it degenerates into gross superstition and deliberate priestcraft. We should estimate the chances of a free Church established by the Ritualists at an even lower figure than the chances of a secession to Rome under their guidance. The whole theory of Ritualism is essentially sacerdotal. It is all for the priest and very little for the people, and it is a rule almost, if not quite, without exception, that those who pay the piper call the tune. Free Churches, with hardly any exception, must be governed by the laity, because they are paid by the laity. In course of time, no doubt, the clergy may accumulate permanent endowments which will render them independent; and a highly organised body like the Roman Catholic Church, which has always claimed spiritual powers of the most tremendous kind, and which claims them now in as peremptory a manner as ever, and with no intention of withdrawing or modifying its claim, is able to exercise real compulsion over those who believe in the reality of the claim put forward in proportion to the vividness of their belief. It is, however, very difficult to suppose that any one can be so weak as really to attribute to the Ritualists powers of this sort. They are at best like the bats, neither birds nor beasts. The Roman Catholics tell them that they are not priests at all, and the Church of England reduces them to the necessity of setting up for themselves. The number of people who under these circumstances will really believe that they keep the keys of the next world, and who will accordingly fall down and worship and support them, must, we should think, be very small indeed—too small to keep a voluntary association alive."

AMERICAN NOTES.

THE following lines are taken from an American publication called the Plain Speaker:

We grope in dimness of light, seeing not ourselves;
We sleep, and dreams come to us of something better;
We wake, and find that our life is not of Truth.
We strive, and the powers of darkness contend with our hope;
We pray, and the availance is great in our own souls;
We trust, and the light breaks, promising the day;
We act, the day dawns, how beautifully bright!
We love in faith—casting out fear; so we live.
We see God, and our eyes are no more closed;
God is in us—our souls are life—our bodies die;
We ascend to the Father, and are one with Deity.

Our readers may remember the account which we gave some time since of the so-called "conversion" of one Allen, known as "the wickedest man in New York," and of the religious uses to which his infamous "dance-house" had been turned. This Water-street "revival" appears to have come to an end, and it is stated that the researches of the City Mission have shown that very few, if any, of the class for whose benefit the movement was set on foot, and among whom it was said to be "sweetly and quietly" making its way, have profited by it, or even attended any of its meetings.

The Monthly Journal of the American U. A., having been charged with misrepresenting orthodoxy in some statements with regard to its teaching, has in an article, since printed as a pamphlet, incontestibly shown that the statements in question were not only warranted, but might have been made much stronger. In the number for December, the Journal confirms them by extracts from "A Short Catechism for Young Children," published in Philadelphia. These are a specimen of the Questions and Answers to be committed to memory by the "little ones," and which seem to us as direct a contradiction of the Saviour's teaching as well could be, and something very like blasphemy against Him who made us:

Q. Does your wicked heart make all your thoughts, words, and actions sinful?
A. Yes: I do nothing but sin.
Q. What is original sin?
A. It is that sin in which I was conceived and born.
Q. Both original sin wholly defile you, and is it sufficient to send you to hell, though you had no other sin?
A. Yes.
Q. What are you then by nature?

A. I am an enemy to God, a child of Satan, and an heir of hell.

Q. Why could none but Christ satisfy for your sin?
A. Because none but he could bear infinite wrath.

Q. How long will the wicked continue in hell, and the saints in heaven?

A. For ever and ever.

Q. What will the wicked for ever do in hell?

A. They will roar, curse, and blaspheme God.

The Wilberforce University in Ohio, the leading educational institution of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, being within easy reach of Antioch College, arrangements have been made by which, at the expense of the Unitarian Association, the professors of the latter institution are to give a certain amount of instruction regularly in the former. This is as it should be; and Bishop Payne, in a letter acknowledging the kindness thus shown and the "incalculable blessings" it was likely to confer, "fraternally" writes to the Secretary of the Association:

"I must stop, and thank you, thank our good Brother Hale, thank all our Unitarian friends, who are to us more than brothers, for their noble, unselfish charity—charity like that which Christ himself has manifested. We are the man the Jew robbed, bruised, bleeding, fainting on the open roadside; the Priest, the Levite, passing by, both looking on, pitying, hastening away. You are the good Samaritan. God the Father bless you for it; God the Son bless you for it; God the Holy Spirit bless you for it. I speak as a Trinitarian; you will allow me that liberty. I know you only as a Christian brother. Let us both love Jesus, obey Jesus; and when we meet him in heaven, he will tell us who took the right view of himself, the Father, and the Spirit."

In answering the objections of a correspondent, the Editor of the Journal well expresses what we earnestly wish to see the great object of all our Associations. "Our interest," he says, "in the National Conference, both individually and officially, centres in what is declared in its first article to be its leading purpose; viz., to 'energise and stimulate the denomination with which it is connected in the cause of Christian faith and work.' We believe it has already, in this direction, more than justified the expectation of its founders. And our own work in it, and discussion upon it, shall be to help its usefulness and efficiency, in this its great purpose, as much as we can."

At a conference of Illinois clergy and laity, to which there were 500 delegates, the plan was tried of limiting each speaker to three minutes; and the result seems to have been regarded as satisfactory. On the question, "How can people in rural districts, remote from churches, be reached by Gospel influences?" these are a few of the three-minute speeches:

Rev. Mr. Longley: "We want to have this sort of feeling—'Who will go if I don't?' The Church needs to feel that it is her duty to preach the Gospel: 'Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel.' Members who do not feel that ought to go out of it. 'What makes you, my boy,' said a gentleman, 'so successful in catching fish?' 'Cause I just want to catch them,' replied the boy. That's the way we ought to feel toward the unconverted."

Rev. Mr. Wynn: "You must preach truth as though it were truth. We must throw aside our manuscripts. The gift at Pentecost was a gift of tongues, and not of pens. I heard of a man once who was asked by his wife to scold the hired girl. He said he would write out a scold. He wrote it out, and the wife read it, but it did not produce any perceptible effect. She threw the manuscript aside, and went at it in the good old-fashioned way. And then the cook began to think she meant something. In the pulpit we ought to take heed of the example of our political brethren. What effect would a political speech have if it were read?"

Rev. Mr. Beggs: "A Methodist minister was once asked in a drought to pray for rain. No sooner had he departed from the house than it began to pour in torrents, and the old lady remarked: 'These Methodist fellows always overdo it.' It may be that we have overdone it, but I am sorry to say that even a good many Methodist ministers are confining themselves to the manuscript."

William Reynolds: "When Paul was cast upon the island of Melita he lost for a time his influence with the barbarians because a viper came out of the fire and clung to his hand. We have a good many in the Church whose influence is killed because they have vipers clinging to them. The first thing that we should do is to rid ourselves of them. We are not in earnest enough. The day is past when one can pay his pew-rent and feel that that is all that he should do. The time now is when it is necessary to be converted down into the pocket. I don't like times of revival, where people set about getting up a revival. We have got to pray down a revival, and not get one up. Let us do our part, and God will do His. 'Open wide your mouth, and I will fill it.'"

THE NEW YEAR FOR THE RITUALISTS.

THE year does not open very auspiciously for the Ritualists. In spite of all that they have done to make this a festive season in their churches, they can hardly help feeling difficulties and misgivings. Up to the present time it has been a pretty equal contest between them and the rest of the Church of England, for, though they have been few in numbers, and though it has been palpable to all dispassionate observers that they are glaringly violating the conditions of the Church of England on any fair interpretation, yet the ecclesiastical courts are so slow, expensive, and uncertain, that hitherto there has been no authoritative judgment which could really interfere with them. But the recent decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has completely changed their position. A decisive judgment, against which there is no appeal, has not only affirmed their most cherished bits of ritualism to be absolutely illegal, but has laid down a principle which no slight or technical alteration in the particular obnoxious practices will enable them to evade; and England waits, not indeed anxiously but somewhat curiously, to see what they will do.

It will be interesting to some of our readers to recapitulate briefly the features of this remarkable case. Nominally a suit by Mr. MARTIN against the Rev. Mr. MACKONCHIE, the incumbent of St. Alban's, Holborn, it was in fact the test suit against the whole Ritualist clergy, the real prosecutor being the Bishop of London. The four alleged offences against ecclesiastical law were,—the elevation of the cup at the communion, and prostration before the consecrated elements; the use of lighted candles on the altar; the mixing of water with wine in the communion cup, and the use of incense. The case was first tried in the Court of Arches, and after many weary months a judgment was given by the Dean of Arches, Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE, who condemned the mixing of water, the use of incense, and the elevation of the communion cup. He, however, distinctly allowed the use of lighted candles, and gave no decision on the question of prostration before the elements. The cardinal feature of his judgment, however, was the virtual laying down of the principle that any ancient and primitive rites were allowable, unless actually disallowed by the rubric, and—the point which perhaps tended most distinctly to leave matters where they were—he condemned each side to pay its own costs. It was against the points thus conceded to Ritualism that an appeal was carried to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The result is a judgment which not only condemns alike lighted candles, and prostration before the sacramental elements, but condemns the defendant to pay the entire cost of both suit and the appeal, and lays down the broad and simple principle, directly conflicting with that of Dr. PHILLIMORE, that all ceremonies are abolished which are not expressly retained. This seems the true view of the matter, from the fact that the Prayer-book mentions specifically the rites which were permitted to be retained at the Reformation, whereas it does not specify those that were abolished, and the Act of Uniformity of Queen ELIZABETH definitely excludes "any other rite, ceremony, form, or order of celebrating the Lord's supper" except that which is laid down in the Prayer-book.

The law is thus declared against the Ritualists. From the Privy Council there is no appeal except to Parliament, and Mr. MACKONCHIE and his party know well enough that they would not be likely to find much favour there. Nor is there any hope for them in the remissness of their opponents to take legal proceedings. Had Dr. PHILLIMORE's decision been sustained that each party should pay its own costs, it is likely indeed that this judgment, or any other, would have remained practically a dead letter. With the certainty, however, not only of an adverse decision in each case at last, but also of having, however much they might protract their defence, themselves to pay the costs thus proportionately increased, Ritualism will become so expensive a luxury that its votaries are likely to come to a conclusion, in their case expressed with peculiar appropriateness by the motto that "the play is not worth the candle."

We candidly own that we rejoice at the decision on more accounts than one. We fully appreciate the personal excellence of many of these men whose ritualistic zeal has been accompanied with singular devotion to pastoral work among the poor, but it is palpable that they are in a false position, and when that is the case, anything that shows this unmistakably is a benefit. We rejoice in everything which puts the Establishment in its true light. For some generations its old lines of demarcation have become so obsolete, and its old locks and fetters so rusty, that it has been easy for all who chose to ignore any moral obligation in its creeds and forms, to keep within its sacred enclosure while doing what was right in their own eyes. The consequence has been not only a false appearance of catholicity and breadth, upon which various parties have indulged in great glorification, but also a seeming independence of state control which has deluded numbers into unconsciousness of the essential wrong involved in a religious society directed as to its praying and preaching and believing by a careless and heterogeneous parliament.

We cannot but rejoice, too, at the emphatic answer which this judgment gives to the anti-Protestant ravings of a certain party in the Church. Facts are stubborn things, and Englishmen have hardly known whether to frown or smile at the repudiation of the Reformation, and the wholesale abuse heaped on the noble band who carried it out, by some of the leading Ritualists. And inasmuch as the Anglican Church does yet in some historical fashion, however imperfectly de facto, represent the life of England, we are glad to see the substantial reality of the Reformation unmistakably affirmed.

After all, in its deepest aspect, the whole affair is to us a storm in a tea-cup, or a quarrel among—let us say, relations. What is it to us whether this and that congregation and their ministers like to have candles in the day time, or to take their sacramental elements 'a little mixed.' What to us is it whether, at St. Alban's, the parsons wear curious phylacteries, and do a little more genuflexion than common? No; but it is much to us, and to all men, that it should be made plain, as it is made plain by all this bitter and indecent litigation, that freedom and independence, the relation of people and minister formed by voluntary consent, and worked out in form and doctrine by mutual agreement, constitute the only true position for thoughtful, honest, and religious men, and for any church worthy of its great founder's name.

HOW CHRISTMAS DAWNS IN LONDON STREETS.

THE following "over true" description of scenes which are a disgrace to our civilisation and a reproach to our Christianity, forms part of an article in the Christian World :—

The shops are nearly all shut up, for grocers, butchers, bakers, and all are pretty much like other people, and want to enjoy Christmas as much as do their customers; and if they were to prolong the shop hours until the early part of Christmas morning, they would have to keep in bed until Boxing Day. In the poorer neighbourhoods, however, the tide of business is at its height; but the police have commenced ordering the street dealers to remove their stalls, for it is past twelve, and time enough for decent people to be at home. The public-houses are the most difficult to deal with. All through the evening they have been densely crowded, and the publicans' tills are filled with silver and copper coins procured in exchange for beer and gin. But now the potent liquors have taken effect, and neither the expostulations of pot-boys and barmen, nor the peremptory commands of the police, can induce the drinkers to quit their places in front of the public-house bars. What a noise! It is a perfect Babel. Celebrating Christmas! Indeed, it is more like participating in a heathen saturnalia. But look at this poor little thing crying so bitterly at the public-house door. Why is the child weeping? Its father is drunk, and will not come home. Heaven help you, little one. To have a drunken parent is indeed a misfortune. How the poor thing gazes with envy on the rosy-looking urchin—allowed to be up late for once—who gaily trudges along by the side of his father. They are taking home a piece of beef intended for the Christmas dinner, and in the basket, beside the beef, there are apples, oranges, nuts, and other nice things. But what is there for the drunkard's family? Nothing. To them Christmas Day will bring the old familiar and painful experience of a drunken father, a foodless cupboard, a fireless grate, and a weeping mother. In mercy's sake, why will men make such monsters of themselves? Why will they so often ruin not merely themselves, but those connected with them? Everywhere the drink-fiend seems to gloat over the power exercised by him. Yet we continue to meekly tolerate his sway, and calmly accept his dominion as a thing against which there can be no resistance. How much happier would Christmas Day be could its associations not be mixed up in the minds of many with ideas of copious libations of beer and gin? Such is not the true Christmas. Nor will it ever be.

As we gaze down the street we behold a poor, wretched, and miserable object sitting, or rather crouching, on a doorstep. We approach more closely. It is one of those "unfortunates" who, to our lasting shame and disgrace, are allowed to haunt our gas-lit streets. What is it to her that the Christmas chimes are pealing forth their notes of peace and goodwill? Homeless, penniless, and abandoned, shivering with cold and eaten up with disease, she prays that death may speedily end her sufferings. Oh! Christian men and women, in your happy homes, surrounded by your domestic comforts, and ever tasting of the sweetest joys of earthly life, forget not the bitter fate of these lost wretches, these miserable victims of ignorance, intemperance, and sensuality. There are thousands such. You may find them in almost every street. Never mind if some of them flaunt the hideous finery of shame and sin. Beneath the silks and velvets there are despairing hearts, upon whose corroded surface the Christmas chimes fall like drops of molten lead. Let us pray for them, and let us clasp our little daughters more fondly, more tenderly to our breasts, and fervently resolve that it shall not be our fault if, in after life, they depart from the paths of virtue and rectitude.

BIRMINGHAM: LAWRENCE-STREET MISSION.—The annual Christmas party was held on Monday night. Although the admission was limited as much as possible to the members of the institution, upwards of 300 sat down to tea. After tea, the chair was taken by Timothy Kenrick, Esq., the president of the mission. In the course of his speech, he spoke in terms of high satisfaction at the progress and condition of the mission. Addresses were given by the Rev. John Wilson, Messrs. Guy, Gray, Niblett, Worley, Dr. Russell, W. R. Wills, Angilly, R. F. Martineau, Brooke Smith, Heaton, and Lawrence, varied by musical performances by ladies and gentlemen, subscribers to the mission, and also by the string band, the school saxhorn and drum and fife bands, and the chapel choir.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

JANUARY 1st.

FAREWELL to another year!
Now it lies upon its bier,
Sealed from touch of human hand
Changeless must its record stand.

Vain as masses for the dead,
To unsay what it has said,
To undo what it has done,
Are our efforts, every one.

Yet though dead it speaketh still,
Warning us to shun the ill,
Bidding us be wise of heart,
Firm to choose the better part.

Welcome to another year!
Half in hope, and half in fear;
Whether joy, or whether woe,
It shall bring us, none can know.

Father, trusting in Thy care,
All its trials may we bear,
All its happiness improve,
As the children of Thy love.

Walking evermore with Thee,
All things then our own will be;
Life or death, or ease or pain,
All to us will then be gain. I. A.

CHRISTMAS IN NAPLES.

THE Times correspondent furnishes us with the following account of the Neapolitan manner of keeping the great festival just passed:

"Every country has its characteristic mode of observing Christmas, and that of Naples is very marked, for where the influence of sacerdotalism has been so long felt, the impress of religion, however superficial, is universally present. Not a house or a shop which has not had during the whole of the novena its little lamps of oil burning, day and night, before a highly-coloured picture of the Madonna. It is true that a vast deal of conventional pilfering is carried on beneath that light; still it is there, and its rays remind one that the anniversary of an event fraught with good will to man is approaching. Every house, too, and every church has its 'presepe' [stable], especially so in country places, and the artistic skill displayed in them varies according to the district, or the taste and ability of the proprietor, but every one must have his 'presepe.' Some of these structures are very ambitious; others are simple and pretty enough. There is a deep recess for the stable, in which lies the 'Bambino' [infant]; cows, and asses, and goats are standing around; while over shepherds, and kings, and saints hang poised seraphim, and cherubim and angels without number. The whole is thatched with moss, and the holly and the wild clematis surround it and convert it into a very shrubbery. There are no more important characters at this season than the Zampognari, shepherds from the Abruzzi, who, half-covered with skins, come as the representatives of the shepherds of old to play their bagpipes before the Bambino. Like the heralds of kings they are received, and as heralds from the King of kings they are almost revered by the poor and ignorant, who uncup and kneel when they commence their wild music. A kind of silent agreement is entered into between the Zampognari and the people at the beginning of the novena; the former present two wooden spoons to the household, and from that time they daily lead the devotions of the members of it at a certain hour until the Feste di Natale are over. Our Christmas, however, has another phase somewhat less picturesque. Go through the Toledo any day this week, and what a mad and animated scene does it present! All the carriages of Naples are out, and were it not for the skill of our unrivalled drivers all would be locked in one embrace. There are handsome equipages, and wagons, and donkey-carts apparently wedged together, but moving as regularly as if directed by machinery. And the occupants of these carriages, how joyous they look! There is Paterfamilias with his entire family for at least once in the year, and Materfamilias with her cooling brood, like a hen and chickens, all come out to see whatever there is to be seen. And there is a great deal to be seen in that densely populated thoroughfare. Splendidly decorated are the dolce shops, which are full of children, and be it known that our 500,000 Neapolitans are all children in the presence of sweets. Not a man who does not struggle into one of those tempting shops to get his quota of the rich and varied, and often graceful or fantastic, objects which the art of the confectioner has constructed. How much love, maden's or child's love, will be gained by those Cupids disguised in sugar; and how Materfamilias and her brood outside in their carriage peer into this earthly paradise with eager eyes, and clap their hands for the 'Padrone,' busily occupied with a crowd of purchasers! Christmas is the annual Bacchanalia, and for a time liberty is turned into licence. The footpaths, usually guarded free from every obstruction, are now covered with hundreds of stalls, to wind through which will require all the agility of an eel, and every article of raw produce or manufactured goods is exposed there for sale. More material articles, too, are there—every fish of the sea or fresh water is to be met with, and, not least, the capitone, a kind of greasy conger eel, which must appear de rigueur on every table, and for which many would almost sell the bed beneath them. In presence of all this plenty, one of our journals counsels the Syndic to look after the quality of the articles exposed at a season when the 'volgo' are given to commit excess in eating and drinking—a caution not unnecessary where every kind of trickery is played, and when the bills of mortality are rather increased. One would not, however, be too critical with so much joy and happiness overflowing about him.

PRAYING AND DOING.

"Bless the poor little children who haven't any beds to-night," prayed a little boy, just before he lay down in his nice warm cot of a cold wintry night.

As he rose from his knees, his mother said to him: "You have just asked God to bless the poor children; what will you do to bless them?"

The boy thought a moment, and said: "Why, if I had a hundred cakes, enough for ourselves, I'd give them some."

"But you have no cakes."

"Well, when I get money enough to buy all the things that I want, and have some over; I'll give them some."

"But you haven't half money enough to buy all you want, and perhaps never will have. I want to know what you will do to bless the poor now?"

"I'll give them some bread."

"You have no bread, the bread is mine."

"Then I could earn money, and buy a loaf myself."

"Take things as they now are, you know what you have that is your own. What are you willing to give to help the poor?"

The boy thought again, and said "I'll give them half my money. I have eight pennies, and I'll give them four. Wouldn't that be right?"

"Four pennies wouldn't go very far in making a child, so poor that it has no bed, as comfortable and well provided for as you are. Fourpence toward food and clothes, and books and bed for such a one, and fourpence just for pencils or candy for yourself, doesn't seem fair."

"Then, mother, I'll give all my money; and I wish I had more to give," said the little boy, as he took his good-night kiss.

Now, don't you think his bed was made softer that night by his pity for the poor and shelterless? Don't you think he slept the more sweetly for it?

A great many children pity the poor a little, and wish God would be kind to them and take care of them. Perhaps they even pray to him to do it, like this little boy; but I am afraid too many of them would have God do all the work. Remember that you must not ask Him to do what you can and ought to do yourself. He will help us to do any good thing; but he wants hands to do with.

THE DANDELION.

THE daisy has its poets; all have striven
Its world-wide reputation to prolong;
But here's its yellow neighbour—who has given
The dandelion a song?

Come, little sunflower, patient in neglect,
Will ne'er a one of them assert thy claim,
But, passing by, contemptuously connect
Thee and thy Scottish name?

Whence the neglect? The daisy is as homely,
Its very homeliness has been extolled:
Less beautiful thou art, yet not uncomely,
Thou star of shining gold!

And great thy virtue; root and stem and flower
Yield to the man of herbs their potent juice:
Not all an outward tinsel is thy dower—
It serves a deeper use.

Most human-like the fortune of thy species;
Some struggle hard along the dusty roads,
While some upon the meads, and lawns delicious,
Are blest with pure abodes.

Thou art transfigured too, like the immortals;
The sleep of death usurps thine earthly post;
And then outcomes from thy re-opening portals,
A beautiful white ghost.

Familiar to the children in the meadows,
They pluck the apparition frail, and blow;
And by the flittings of its spectral shadows
They wise conclusions know.

Beautiful spirit, this thy highest being Passes away like sighs into the air:
Not to be lost, although beyond our seeing,
But breathing elsewhere.

Thine is the efflorescence of the poet,
Whose winged thoughts speed on to unknown parts,

Take root and are, though he may never know it,
The joy of thankful hearts.

R. L.

LDZ.—The annual Christmas party was held at this place on Saturday, the 20th inst. It was a very successful one, the schoolroom after tea being crowded to excess by an audience highly delighted by the excellent entertainment provided. Rev. J. Smith presided.

LIVERPOOL.—RECEPTION OF THE REV. JAMES MARTINEAU.

On Friday evening, December 18th, a soirée was held in the Hope-street schoolrooms, which were very beautifully decorated, to give his many friends an opportunity of welcoming the Rev. James Martineau. The attendance was very large, including SAMUEL BULLEY, Esq., in the chair; the Revs. W. A. Tattersall, M.A. vicar of Oxtou, J. S. Jones, incumbent of Christ Church, R. Goldsack, New Jerusalem Church, C. Beard, B.A., G. Beaumont, J. Cuckson, A. Gordon, M.A., T. Holland, B.A., T. Jones, W. A. Pope, W. Oates, C. B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc., C. Wicksteed, B.A.; and Messrs. L. M. Aspland, LL.D., T. Avison, F. Boulton, F. H. Boulton, J. Campbell, T. Chapman, H. J. Cook, L. B. Cooke, E. Fletcher, T. Gair, Holbrook Gaskell, R. C. Hall, E. Harvey, J. Harvey, A. Higginson, Dr. Hitchman, J. Hulley, E. Johnson, W. J. Lampont, H. Lee, H. W. Meade-King, F. E. Millson (Southport), A. J. Mott, R. Nicholson (Manchester), T. E. Paget, C. E. Rawlins, junr., W. P. Rowe, M.D., J. Samuelson, H. D. Thew, J. Thornely, S. Thornely.

In response to the very warm welcome which was given by the Chairman, the Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, who was received with loud applause, said: Mr. Chairman, and I must add my old friend, with the friends whom I see around me—from my heart I thank you—from my lips I cannot thank you—for the words of welcome and reception with which I have been received amongst you. When I look around me at this splendid room, decorated as for a festival, and when I see the many old faces it is such a delight to behold, I feel that nothing perhaps but a festival tone ought to prevail here this evening. And yet the commemoration which you give to me is inevitably a commemoration which I in my turn must give to those whom I have seen here upon former occasions, and whom I see here no longer. Indeed, I should be false, sir, to the memories to which you have so touchingly alluded, and I should be false to the motto to which you have given such prominence here this evening—"For Auld Lang Syne"—if I did not, before I pass on to give my more joyous greeting to the younger and rising generation, suffer a few words to pass from me in order to regain for an instant the old links of thought, and to connect the present with the past. [After an affectionate tribute to the memory of Mr. Greene and several other old and dear friends, Mr. Martineau continued:] These and other recollections, if I dwell upon them, would detain me only too long. But I cannot pass by without one short mention, the recollection of that venerable man, who has not only been taken from us and from our particular community, but who has left behind him a feeling of bereavement in the whole community of Liverpool. Only a year ago I had the privilege of seeing that venerable man, William Rathbone, and I remember the feeling with which I came away from a long interview with him. I thought, when I heard the story which he told of the men whom he had honoured, of the wrongs which had excited his indignation, of the liberties he had helped to win—I thought that never did the graces of high character and of personal dignity more perfectly surround old age. He has gone from us; and the only regret we can have, at the close of a life so honoured and so useful, is that it was not continued long enough to see the honour which has been bestowed upon his son, and which ought many years ago to have been bestowed upon himself. (Applause.) And, sir, since this church and these schools were built, many others there have been whose names occur to me—the names of Blackburn, and Bolton and Booth—of Cox, Holt, Harvey, Jevons, Rawdon, Thornely, Yates, all now inscribed on the silent tablet of memory, attest the waste of years. When we remember the various forms of Christian worth and excellence which were connected with them, we must say they are names which leave to us a noble inheritance and a noble trust, and should consecrate both our fields of labour and our places of devotion. However, sir, I must not longer dwell upon these memories. There is nothing that is really sad or melancholy to those who take a large view of human life, in this Providential succession, so long as whatever is noble and strenuous in the past is taken up and carried on into the future. And, indeed, those who are about to retire from the field may well take up the song of Simeon, when they see that the work for which they have so long toiled and waited is taken up by successors such as I have left behind me here. But when I speak of successors, sir, I must include amongst them my friend Mr. Wicksteed, my younger successor as well as my old friend—"hear," and applause)—with Mr. Beard and Mr. Gordon—(applause); for somehow or other I never am able to look upon my friend Mr. Wicksteed as anything but a young man. (Cheers.) I remember very well one of my children—at the time of life when children pop out things very simply, and sometimes very impudently—making the remark, when Mr. Wicksteed first called at my house, "Papa, is that a little man or is it a great boy?" (Loud laughter.) Well, it was a difficult question to answer; for somehow or other, he has always rolled up in himself the best qualities of the man and of the boy; for a wiser and more discreet head upon young shoulders I certainly never knew than his when he was young; and I must say, now that he is getting further on into years, there is a kind of eternal youth about him which makes me still remember the freshness of his more boyish days. Therefore I class Mr. Wicksteed with Mr. Beard and Mr. Gordon as my younger successors in this place.—(Hear, hear.) However, I must say to these young men—(laughter)—that they must not, after all, though I speak in this tone of the old man, be in a hurry to bow us out of the door, and to suppose that they are going yet to have all the work to themselves—to take it entirely out of our hands. It was a saying, if I remember right, of William the Conqueror, when his sons wanted him to retire from the throne and divide his prerogatives amongst them, that he was not going to undress till he went to bed.”—(Laughter.) And I think it is a good maxim, for old men, so long as the work is in them, to keep in the field, and see if they cannot find some function fitted to their diminished powers. With that reserve, I say, let them be ready at any time to deliver over the standard to the grasp of the firmer and younger hand, and let the younger hand be ready to take it and carry it on to fresh and nobler victories.—(Hear, hear, and applause.) When I remember the time that first placed me in Liverpool, and contrast it with the present day, I cannot but be conscious of the enormous change that has taken place in the spirit of society, in the institutions by which we are surrounded, and in the prospects which we entertain. I came to Liverpool from Ireland, and I came because I could not induce a Protestant congregation in Ireland even to entertain the question of relinquishing a state endowment for the support of their religious worship. It was a poor, petty affair, that Parliamentary Regium Donum. It was nothing but a wretched sop, flung to the Presbyterian Lazarus. That question, however, it was at that time impossible to induce a Protestant congregation even to consider. They would not discuss it. Well, now what do we see? We see the great Establishment itself is being broken up, to which this little Presbyterian provision was nothing but the beggar's outhouse; and this with apparently no reluctance on the part of the Presbyterian population, and apparently with much less reluctance on the part of the Church population than was at first anticipated. That is an enormous change in the public mind and feeling. When I first settled in Ireland, and saw what the spirit of Protestant ascendancy was, it produced upon me a shock perfectly indescribable. I remember very well, during the agitation in the early part of O'Connell's career for Catholic emancipation, signing with my colleague, the father of the late Dr. Hutton, a petition in favour of Catholic emancipation; and how two or three of the elders of our congregation came to us and remonstrated with us for daring to sign such a petition in the capacity of ministers. And I remember their concluding sentence was: “Gentlemen, we have been credibly informed that it is very improper for ministers to meddle with politics,” and I very well remember the quiet dignity with which Mr. Hutton replied:—“Well, gentlemen, if you have been so informed, you have been misinformed.”—(Laughter.) I remember, also, as a slight indication of the feeling that was maintained in Ireland by the Protestant ascendancy, the first election to fill a vacancy in a certain school which depended upon my congregation. The election took place in the open vestry of the congregation; and a venerable gentleman, Governor of the Bank of Ireland, was in the chair. The various candidates were called in, and the children and their nearest relations—for they were generally orphans—were examined. There was one very interesting child, who seemed to engage the prepossessions of all present, and after the children had been removed and the matter discussed, it was moved that this boy should be admitted. But one inquiry had, somehow, not been made of the guardians who had brought the child; and that was, whether the child was of Catholic or Protestant parents? The child and the guardian were recalled, and the chairman put the question. The man seemed to know what fate awaited him, and he said: “Well, sir, to tell the truth, one of them was a Catholic and the other a Protestant.” And this old gentleman, generally one of the mildest of men, a very pattern of Christian courtesy—burst into a sudden passion, and stamping his foot on the floor, said, “You dog! how dare you show your face here?” That kindled my indignation, and I ventured to remonstrate against such language, and to suggest that the selection of this child would in all probability prevent his falling into Catholic hands, and give him the very Protestant education which, I supposed, this zealous Protestant gentleman would most desire. However, the only effect was the expression of extreme astonishment at my youthful simplicity and my ignorance of Ireland, to suppose that any suggestion of the kind could meet with the slightest attention. The spirit prevailed everywhere, not only in the Established Church, but amongst Presbyterians and all the Protestants of Ireland; and from that moment I made up my mind that there never could be the least hope for this country until the blot of Protestant ascendancy should be utterly and entirely erased. (Loud applause.) Well, besides this ecclesiastical change, I cannot look around me without being conscious also that there have been even deeper theological changes taking place since first I began my duties among you here. The very presence here this evening of a clergyman of the Established Church is itself significant of the nature of the change that has come over the spirit of our times, and that phenomenon, honourable as it is to the Catholic spirit of Mr. Tattersall, is as we all know, nothing so rare as it was thirty years ago. (Applause.) Now, sir, what does this mean? Is there any visible change in the classification of religious bodies? No, we find just the same set of churches that prevailed thirty years ago. If you look into the charters, as it were, and the professions of faith, the documents which declare the distinctive characteristics of each, you find them the same as before. The constitution of the Church of England has not changed. The constitution of the Catholic Church never changes. The same is true in the main of the Independents and of the Baptists; so that if you look superficially, merely, at documents and records and all the evidence that you can produce which is not living evidence, we stand exactly as we did before. But is it so in reality? No. We have, somehow or other, approximated to one another. With regard to ourselves, those of us who hold Unitarian convictions, we have been brought up you may say, under a comparatively cold discipline and training; but we have grown up into a sympathy which certainly was not common forty or fifty years ago, with the more fervid expressions of Christian life; and, on the other hand, those brought up in orthodox persuasion though they have not consciously changed their convictions, have learnt to read our books, as we have learnt to read their books, and we find there is a common atmosphere of thought and of feeling—some deeper ground of mutual recognition than we had supposed. The classification which exists of religions, according to the churches that cover the land, is no longer true to nature; and through our fresh classifications there are now cropping out new sympathies and new arrangements, arising out of natural and spontaneous and living causes, that disturb these arrangements. We have become aware that too much doctrinal belief has been insisted on for Christian communion. We are sure that the new sympathies have a deep and Divine root, as well as a root in the mere social side of human nature. We know well how these approximations of persons, apparently different, are treated, according as they are looked at by a merely ecclesiastical or party spirit, or by a large and catholic spirit. On the one hand, if a person of orthodox persuasion and profession, and particularly one who is pledged, as it were, by his profession to teach in conformity with that profession, is seen to be in intimate association with one of ourselves, if this becomes a public fact, what is the way in which it is treated? His religious newspaper points at him at once as an incipient heretic, insinuates that the man must be more or less unsound in the faith. On the other hand, if one of ourselves shows decided and strong sympathies with those of orthodox persuasion, in like manner, even many of our persons and our journals also might point to him as in all probability shaky in his Unitarianism, and tending towards orthodoxy. Thus, both parties presume that truth is necessarily exclusive. But look, on the other hand, how the catholic mind would contemplate this. A person with such a mind, looking at such an approximation, would come to the conclusion that these two opposite individuals were gradually shaking themselves free from some of their errors and their delusions; and he would do so upon the ground that unity is the fruit of truth. I avow myself a deep believer in the latter doctrine. More, I am persuaded that actual experiments in religious unity are necessary to the attainment of any just and full amount of religious truth—(applause)—and that so long as we are all of us shut up within our several lines, and manning our theological batteries with arguments against one another, and endeavouring as much as possible to define our distinctions, and vindicate them by mere intellectual methods, we shall never get to the inner depth of religion. I am persuaded, therefore, that the practical and moral union of men in life is the great means by which our narrowness will be corrected. I am far from depreciating the importance of doctrinal and dogmatic theology. I believe in it profoundly; and, what is more, I fully believe that when we go the right way to work we shall find approximation in this also. But we never shall do so unless we learn to live together, to feel together, and, so far as the impulses of a common nature carry us, to act together in an earnest and serious spirit in every cause that is the cause of righteousness—(applause). The fact is, we have got into a kind of morbid, half-superstitious horror of one another, which must be broken down. Suppose that a community, or part of it, were seized by the idea that only people that had blue eyes were the children of God, and that the people with black eyes and hazel eyes and grey eyes belonged to a different race, that they had a lower order of hopes, and that, though they looked much like the others, they were a kind of sham immortals, that their very eyes were, as it were, tinted from the hues of the Pit, whilst the others were tinted with the hues of Heaven, and carried upon themselves the mark of the great destiny to which they were reserved. Suppose a superstition of that kind to seize hold upon a community. I suppose there can be no doubt that the classes would be entirely separated from one another—that in all the functions of life the blue-eyed people would reserve the seats for themselves, and that they only would congregate together; and that there would be in fact two communities living apart on one spot. Suppose that in the rough highways of life these opposites were thrown together and compelled for awhile to be companions. Suppose that through the stratagem of some benevolent genius, a number of them were brought together in a ship to go upon some night voyage—that some one of catholic spirit like our friend Mr. Lampart should embark them upon one of his ships upon a night voyage—that there were no lights on board, and that they were shut up together in the dark. I suppose they would soon get into genial converse to beguile the time. And let us suppose that in the midst of this converse a cry were to be raised that the ship had struck, that at midnight it were to be found upon a reef, and these comrades were to band themselves together to keep order in the ship, to save the women and children, to lift the spirits of all to a high composure, and to relinquish for themselves every chance except the last—I apprehend that, if they were to survive till sunrise enabled them to look one another in the face, they would have unlearned their superstition by a better lesson than if they had conducted hours or years of discussion upon their blue eyes and their black eyes, and that they would from that time have been taught how foolish was the superstition which had kept them apart. They would at least have found that eyes with the most objectionable tint could gleam with pity and could be suffused with tears and be uplifted in prayer. And that, I say, is something. I believe that our separating creeds are to a great extent of the same character; and that the lesson which we have been learning by being shaken together upon the highways of life during the last generation or two is unteaching us the narrowness in which we were brought up. No doubt there are dangers in the present movements of opinion—dangers which it were foolish to disguise. There are dangers from that extreme development of scepticism which we find in a young—but I fear at present a rising—school amongst us, a school which is driven by reaction from the ecclesiastical government of so many ages to deny altogether, or to ignore, any principle of religious union amongst men; and though they do not absolutely proclaim the doctrine of Atheism, nevertheless, they pass by religion as an influence that is no longer to rule mankind or determine its future. I say there is in my opinion danger arising from this source. There is also danger arising from the opposite pole—danger from the extreme development of sacerdotalism. Both these are dangers; but to my mind there is a danger greater even than either of these—a danger arising from the spirit of compromise and uncertainty which everywhere is prevailing now, and which keeps so many minds in an indeterminate condition, floating between one of these extremes and another, and always at the disposal of accident. (Applause.) A circumstance was related to me the other day which struck me. I must say, with profound melancholy. A ritualistic clergyman of the very highest type was asked by a friend of mine whether he had read my friend Mr. Tayler's essay upon the Fourth Gospel, which, as many of my hearers know, endeavours to establish that the Fourth Gospel is not the production of an Apostle, and that it is a production of a much later date. This ritualistic clergyman replied, “Yes, I have read it.” “What do you think of it?” he was asked. “It is perfectly unanswerable,” he said, “but how will the English public deal with it?” That was all he had to say. It was perfectly unanswerable; but how would the English public deal with it? “What will Mrs. Grundy say?” That was all that a clergyman had to say upon this subject. Well, now, I must say that so long as questions of the most vital importance are treated in this way, and those who profess themselves to be leaders of religion in the country retire from their position and wait, as sometimes our statesmen do, till the voice of the public shall tell them which way to go—if this be the condition of our religion, I must say that, rather than sink into such hollowness and insincerity as this, rather than have continually thrust upon me the dreadful and fatal suspicion that in religion, the most sacred and holy of human interests, every man who teaches it may be playing a part and pretending to that which he does not hold; rather than this, I say, let every church be uprooted; and let us begin afresh from the basis of nature. If in England, which has always been remarkable, as I understand it, for its adherence to reality and truth, for its determination to keep its foot upon the solid ground of reality, if, in this country, we are to have these abominable shams and pretences, and even religion itself, the very expression of the supremest truth, is to be the hollowest element of our civilisation; if we are to sink into the condition into which France has sunk (and many other foreign countries) in this respect—then, I say, I would rather part with all our religious institutions and begin anew, and see whether the Spirit of God will lead us by the workings of our own nature. But I do not believe yet that this is the case. I think that whatever becomes of England so far as it depends upon the clergy, the honest spirit of the laity will save us from this fatal result. No doubt we are gradually dividing into two camps. We see a disposition everywhere to greater unity amongst us in matters of religion; but it is a unity which will gradually draw off into two opposite camps. It is a battle between authority on the one hand and the human reason and conscience on the other. We see all those who throw themselves entirely upon the external authority trying to keep up an artificial union between churches that have been considered hostile to each other. We find our Pan-Anglican Synods trying to unite even with the Greek church, as well as the Roman Catholic church, and to band together with churches abroad that hitherto have never seemed to have the least alliance with ourselves. What is the principle which unites them? Nothing but this—every one of them has a priesthood between man and God. Every one of them has a sacerdotalism, and the salvation of man is made to depend upon the interposition of a priest between the human soul and God, in every instance it is the expression of a profound cowardice and unwillingness to leave the soul free in its direct and immediate relations with the Spirit of God. This is the union which is formed in favour of authority. And upon the other hand, I believe that all the tendencies to union which exist elsewhere are founded at bottom upon the determination to rest upon nothing but the ultimate apprehensions of the human reason and the human conscience; using, no doubt, the sacred inheritance of the past, but using it for what it may be worth—using it, if you please, as an authority, but still as an authority which is not imposed from without, but as an authority which is to weigh exclusively upon the conscience and to be approved by the individual reason—that this is the ultimate standard to which it is to be brought. I believe that all Protestants will more and more work out this principle in opposition to the Sacerdotalism of the other side. These are the great divisions into which I believe our spiritual concerns are gradually separating, and, for my own part, I have no fear of the result. Whatever may become of our inherited and historical beliefs, whatever havoc honest criticism may make in that which has been handed down to us, I have the deepest and firmest persuasion that the human spirit and the Divine spirit will for ever find each other out by ways which probably we are unable to apprehend at present. As God is an infinite reality, and as man is gifted, notwithstanding the finite nature of his powers, with the means of apprehending this infinite reality, I believe that whatever be taken away from us the human spirit and the Divine spirit will find each other out. (Applause.) In this view, then, I must say that in my old age I look upon the future happily and brightly. I think the days to which our younger generations are born are happier than those into which we were born. I have no fear for the permanent and the deeper interests of society. I believe that we shall more and more understand one another in these matters, and I believe that our social life will draw more and more deeply from the religious inspiration which many persons imagine to be passing from us. For my own part, therefore, I go with the new time, though belonging myself to the older time. I am persuaded that the fountain at which in early life I drank so eagerly—the fountain at which I sought for truth—that that fountain is inexhaustible; and I shall never cease to apply myself to it, even when the cup may tremble in my hand, and when I may see myself surrounded by faces that are entirely strange. (Loud applause.)

Rev. C. WICKSTEED then introduced to the meeting the Rev. W. A. TATTERSALL, who made a brief speech, which was frequently applauded for its bold and vigorous utterance.

Rev. C. BEARD, on behalf of the Renshaw-street and other neighbouring congregations, expressed the pleasure which Mr. Martineau's visit had called forth among all.

Rev. A. GORDON introduced the Revs. T. S. Jones and R. Goldsack.

Mr. JONES, who spoke with great good feeling, much grace of expression, and no small sense of humour, was very cordially received; and Mr. GOLDSACK's frank and outspoken words were warmly cheered.

INTELLIGENCE.

BALLYMONEY.—A Sunday-school and congregational soirée was held on Christmas-eve, which was also attended by friends holding different religious views. The room was gaily and tastefully decorated with suitable devices, pictures, and evergreens, presenting a most lively appearance. After tea an address was given by the Rev. D. Matts, on "The work that lay before them as a Christian Church;" after which Mr. John Pinkerton, jun., on behalf of the singing class and congregation, presented Mr. and Mrs. Matts with a silver tea-cake basket, a dozen silver spoons, a handsome volume entitled "Roses and Holly," and an album, accompanied with a very cordial and appreciative address. The proceedings were afterwards enlivened by music, readings, and recitations.

BURNLEY.—The annual festive meeting of the congregation, teachers, scholars, and friends was held on Christmas-day. The attendance was larger than on any previous occasion. After tea the Rev. J. W. Rogers took the chair, and distributed a considerable number of prizes to the Sunday scholars, who gave sundry recitations in the course of the evening. The meeting was briefly addressed by the Chairman and Messrs. Mackie, Bibby, Blezzard, and Sagar. Land, in a very suitable part of the town, has been secured for a chapel, but the form, character, size, and cost of the building have not yet been determined.

DUNDEE.—The annual soirée of the Sunday-school scholars and their friends was held last Monday night. There were 200 present, and the whole affair passed off well.

FORFAR.—The Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee, visited Forfar on Tuesday week, and lectured upon Unitarianism. There was a good attendance, and the interest excited offers reason for encouragement. A local committee was formed.

GLASGOW.—The seventh annual soirée of the Sunday school took place on Monday evening last, 28th ult., in the Merchants' Hall, about 450 children and friends being present; Rev. Henry W. Crosskey, minister of the church, presided. After tea the chairman, in his address, briefly referred to the history of the Sunday school, and congratulated the company upon its satisfactory progress during the past seven years. A concert followed, in which the Glasgow Solo and Glee Union and members of the church choir took part. After this an interesting exhibition of dissolving views was shown by means of oxy-hydrogen light, the rest of the evening being pleasantly spent in games and other amusements.

KENDAL.—The congregation here, who, to their great regret, have had to part with the Rev. J. E. Odgers, who has accepted the charge of that at Bridgewater, have been fortunate in at once securing as his successor the Rev. J. Russell, late of Manchester New College; and on Saturday evening, when both young and old gathered to meet him, they gave him an informal, but right cheerful Christmas welcome. On Sunday morning an Induction Service was held. Mr. Odgers read the Scripture lesson and offered up a solemn prayer; after this, and one from the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, of Glasgow, under whose pastoral care Mr. Russell has been brought up, gave him the right hand of fellowship, and welcomed him with earnest and affectionate words to the arduous work in which he was about to engage. Mr. Russell made a suitable reply, expressive of the aims and hopes with which he entered on his labours; and Mr. Gaskell then delivered an address to the young minister and his congregation, in which he set forth the duties of both, arising out of the connection which had been voluntarily formed, and exhorted them to make it as fruitful in spiritual profiting as they could. The services of the day were fitly concluded in the evening by an eloquent discourse from Mr. Crosskey; and we trust they will prove to have left an abiding impression behind them.

LIVERPOOL: BEAUFORT-STREET DOMESTIC MISSION.—The Tuesday evening fortnightly entertainments in connection with this mission, consisting of instructive and amusing readings and music, were resumed in November, will be continued throughout the winter, and promise to be successful as heretofore.

LIVERPOOL.—The public examination of the pupils of the Beaufort-street Day Schools took place on Wednesday evening, the 23rd inst. About 250 children and 150 parents and visitors (including many members of the committee) were present. The examination was satisfactory, and reflected credit on Mr. Roberts, and the Misses Robinson and Canavan, the teachers. The Rev. C. Beard presided, and addressed a few appropriate observations to the children and their parents; after which he distributed prizes (consisting of articles of clothing and books) to about 50 boys and girls who had been most regular and punctual in their attendance during the year. A nice teapet, filled with tea, was presented to each of the mothers of three girls who had not been once absent or late during the year, and the material of a dress to each of the mothers of two boys who had not been once absent. The children were regaled with buns and oranges before leaving.

OLDHAM.—The annual congregational tea party was held on Christmas Day, upwards of 200 being present. After tea the Christmas hymn was sung, followed by addresses from the chairman, the Rev. C. W. Robberds, and Messrs. John Taylor, Ashton, Wrigley, Brierley, Wild, and James Macdonald. Glee, songs, recitations, and pianoforte performances were interspersed.

PADIHAM.—The annual winter festival of this congregation was held on Christmas-day, nearly 400 persons being present. After tea Mr. J. C. Farn, of Burnley, was called to the chair, and, in a brief address, spoke of the value of well-selected recitations in teaching children the main elements of moral and religious philosophy. The scholars gave nearly thirty recitations in the course of the evening. The choir gave a considerable number of sacred pieces, with great spirit, affording much satisfaction to those who heard them. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. W. Pollard, J. Anderton, and T. Holland. Mr. C. Anderton read the report of the past year, which was very satisfactory. The meeting closed by the choir giving the Hallelujah chorus.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All letters, articles of intelligence, &c., should be addressed to the Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Market-street, and not to the private addresses of the Editors.

By an unfortunate accident, several paragraphs of intelligence which were marked for insertion this week have been lost.

A friend, in sending us a school tea-party report in which the names of fifteen ladies and gentlemen who took part in the musical performances is given, writes pleading for their insertion on the ground that we a few weeks ago "gave the list of musical contributors at a party at Bridport," and adds "we like to acknowledge these services, and to encourage others to render similar help." If our correspondent will refer again to the Bridport meeting, p. 410, he will see he is mistaken. Such items may occasionally be inadvertently passed, but we do not profess to make our "Intelligence" column the vehicle of "acknowledgments" of mere local interest, but of the intelligence most interesting to our body at large. It is no pleasure to us to cut such things out, but the interest in these Christmas parties is so exclusively local that we are obliged to confine ourselves to the very briefest mention of them.

THE COMING WEEK.

Gorton.—On Sunday evening, a lecture by the Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., on "The Progressive Character of the Gospel."

Manchester: STRANGEWAYS FREE CHURCH.—On Sunday morning next, the Communion. Evening, special subject: "Free Churches or State Churches; a discourse on the religious aspect of the great question of the day."

Manchester: UPPER BROOK-STREET.—On Sunday, the Rev. John James Taylor, B.A., will preach.

Penmaenmawr: PENIDYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. W. B. Hughes. Service at eleven a.m.

Births.

BURROUGHS.—On Christmas Day, 1868, at 43, Bedford-street South, Liverpool, the wife of B. M. Burroughs, Esq., of a daughter.

BURGESS.—On the 18th ult., at Battle, the wife of Mr. C. P. Burgess, of a daughter.

EVELEIGH.—On the 24th ult., at Peterborough, the wife of Mr. Thomas Eveleigh, of a son.

HIBBERT.—On the 29th ult., at Sunnyside, Hyde, Mrs. Charles Hibbert, of a son.

Marriages.

FOSTER-BROWN.—On the 22nd ult., at the Flowergate Old Chapel, Whitby, by the Rev. John Owen, Mr. H. G. Foster, late of Stockton-on-Tees, to Emma, youngest daughter of Mr. R. Brown, Whitby. This is the first marriage solemnised in the above chapel, a very handsome Family Bible was presented to the bride by the minister and congregation.

HURD-SIMPSON.—On the 31st ult., by special licence, by the Rev. R. J. Orr, William Hurd, of Derby, to Elizabeth Hannah Simpson, at the Unitarian Chapel, Preston.

MATHEWS-OSLER.—On the 30th ult., at the Old Meeting House, Birmingham, by the Rev. Charles Clarke, George Spencer, son of J. Mathews, of Birmingham, to Annette Mary, elder daughter of Clarke & Osler, of the same town.

TAYLOR-LUCAS.—On the 29th ult., at the Old Meeting House, Birmingham, by the Rev. Charles Clarke, Joseph Taylor to Selina Lucas.

THOMPSON-LINEKER.—On the 27th ult., at the Old Meeting House, Birmingham, by the Rev. Charles Clarke, Thomas Thompson to Eliza Lineker.

Deaths.

BARTRAM.—On the 26th ult., at Great Yarmouth, Elizabeth, the wife of Cubitt Engall Bartram, Esq., in the 56th year of her age.

WALLWORK.—On the 28th ult., aged 49 years, Mr. Henry Wallwork, of Rushmore.

OWING TO THE Ravages of the Vine Disease, the Production, and, consequently, the Importation into this country of WINE from the island of MADEIRA, for a number of years all but completely ceased. The ground formerly devoted to the Vine plant was turned into Sugar Plantations, Sugar being a less precarious crop, and sooner available for the market than Wine.

Since the disappearance of the disease, the Culture of the VINE has again attracted attention, and for a few years past the quantity of WINE made has increased. Thinking there might be a trade done if a good WINE, at a moderate price, were offered, we have been at considerable pains to PROCURE SAMPLES FROM THE ISLAND, and have selected one which we can offer at 42s. PER DOZEN.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A portion of the anti-Ritualist party in Australia have formed what they designate a "Free Church of England," and have elected Dr. W. F. Bailey to be its first bishop. He went through a form of consecration, took the oaths of supremacy, and on the following Sunday held a general ordination.

The Natal correspondent of the Cape Argus, referring to Church matters, says:

"A letter to the Bishop of London has been published, which gives the number of attendants at the three Church of England places of worship in Durban and the vicinity, the clergymen and congregations of which recognise the Episcopal authority of the Bishop of Natal, and also at that frequented by those who refuse to acknowledge him. The returns were taken on the same four Sundays, intended to have been consecutive, but interrupted on the 30th August by the circumstance of the 'Flood' preventing service being held. The average attendance is as follows: in the two suburban churches, 79 and 72½ respectively; at St. Paul's, Durban, 173½ at each service. The average attendance at each service of the congregation who do not recognize Bishop Colenso, was 37½. The total numbers at the four services in each place are 1,298 against 149, or 9 to 1. The figures, solemnly declared to, may serve as an answer to those who represent those who recognise the Bishop's authority as a paltry minority, and I have no reason to doubt that they fairly represent the numerical strength of their respective classes throughout the Colony. Mr. Macrorie will not find so many adherents, probably, as he has been led to expect."

From the same paper we learn that Ritualism has been causing trouble in South Africa as well as here. At a meeting at Malmesbury, called by the members of the English Church to consider certain ceremonies which he had recently introduced, the Rector, the Rev. W. E. Belson, took very high ground, and declared, whatever resolution might be come to, it would not alter his arrangements. That he cared very little whether those dissenting from him came to church or stayed away. That such members as only came to patronise the church had much better stay away. That God did not want people who only came to church once a month, and then lounged about in the easiest position possible. That he refused to be guided by non-communicants or those who seldom or never attend church. That he had done nothing but what the Church teaches and the law allowed, and if he had, they could report him to the Bishop; and that if he was ordered by the Bishop or any of his superiors to remove the cross from the altar, he would never put his foot in St. Thomas' Church again.

Dr. Jenner, whom some of the extreme Ritualists have proposed to make the head of a "Free Church" here, and who lately left to take charge of the bishopric of Dunedin in New Zealand, seems to have anything but a pleasant reception awaiting him there; since, at a meeting of the General Synod, presided over by Bishop Selwyn, some strong resolutions were passed, requesting Dr. Jenner, "for the peace of the Church," to withdraw his claims to the see to which he has been appointed.

The Toronto Globe reports that the Rev. Mr. Wood, of St. John the Evangelist Episcopal Church, in a recent sermon, astonished his congregation by telling them that the main object of his late journey to England was to consult others older than himself as to the propriety of the confessional, but with what result we are not informed.

An American College, established at Rome under Papal auspices, is reported to be in so desperate a condition that an appeal has been made on its behalf, stating that "after struggling on for some years it is now in imminent danger of being closed." It has fewer students than any college except that of the Scotch.

The Bavarian ecclesiastical historian Von Döllinger, who belongs to the more liberal party in the Romish Church, having been made a Senator by his Sovereign, was required, on taking the oath and his seat, to produce evidence of his baptism; when, to the astonishment we should think of the authorities, it appeared that he had no evidence whatever to produce. How was the difficulty to be got over? Only in one way, and that was adopted by the bold assumption that so eminent a Church dignitary must have been baptised, how else could he have become so eminent!

Professor Ewald has been acquitted of the charge of treason against the Prussian Government. The acquittal was based upon the two facts that it had not been proved that the King was personally referred to in the professor's pamphlet, and that no evidence had been brought to show that the author intended his remarks to be defamatory. The students in court received the decision with a loud hurrah. The conviction of such a man would have shaken the faith of the liberal classes all over Germany in the progressive character of Prussian rule. The fact of his trial shows how much such governments have to learn before they become as tolerant as constitutional governments can afford to be. It is, however, the lot of most German scholars to suffer annoyance for political utterances. Thirty years ago the late King of Hanover drove Edward himself into exile with the two Grimms, Gervinus, and Weber, for protesting against the policy of his government. The revolution of 1848 recalled him to his professorship at Göttingen, and he has now repaid the hospitality of the father by a somewhat too out-spoken friendship for the son in his time of dethronement and exile.

The death is announced of the Rev. Dr. F. W. Krummacker, of Berlin, who was Court preacher in the time of the late King, and warmly supported his Majesty in his various schemes for extending Protestant principles. He was the most distinguished clerical member of the religious party called in Germany "Pietists," and in England "Evangelicals," and wrote a number of books, which have been published in England under the sanction of the Religious Tract Society. Among the best known of these are "Elijah the Tishbite" and "Elisha." Had he lived till the 6th of this month he would have completed the fiftieth anniversary of his entrance on the duties of the Christian ministry.

Dr. Cumming gave an address at his church in Crown-court last Friday night on the Pope's invitation to Protestants to attend the approaching General Council. The Doctor said he had written to Archbishop Manning, stating that he was most desirous of attending the council, and asking for full information, but adding that unless certain objections he entertained were removed he could not do so. He pointed out to the Archbishop that he agreed with the whole of the Nicene Creed, as settled in 325, but objected to twelve other articles which were added 1,200 years after, and to a thirteenth (that of the Immaculate Conception) which was added in 1854. If the Roman Catholic Church would adhere to the articles of the Nicene Creed, and throw the thirteen added ones into the sea, he would consent to take part in the council. To that letter the Archbishop very courteously replied, stating that the limits of the conference and the modus agendi must be left to higher authority in the Church than his own. The Archbishop also directed his attention to two volumes which he (the Archbishop) had written on the subject of the differences between Romanists and Protestants, and having read them carefully, he (Dr. Cumming) had come to the conclusion that it was hopeless for him to attend the council. If he had gone, one of the first questions he should have been asked was, "Do you believe that that venerable gentleman (the Pope), who is in the chair, is infallible, and that his word settles all controversies?" To this he would have replied "Certainly not;" and then the officers would have been directed to turn the heretic out of the room. The forthcoming conference was to be neither a free nor a general council, for neither the Protestant nor the Greek Church would attend it, but a mere convective of Roman Catholics. The doctor must have been just as fully aware of this before his correspondence as after.

The statement, which a short time since was contradicted, that the young Marquis of Bute had joined the Church of Rome, is now confirmed. He made his first communion on Christmas Day at Nice. Except in the way of material resources, there is no reason to suppose that the marquis will bring much additional support to his new Church. As the Times says, we have no evidence that he is either very learned or very wise. If a dozen youths of his age were to join the Church of Rome tomorrow, the world would not attach much importance to the event. When the husband of Queen Anne deserted James II. in his peril, the King observed that "after all, a good trooper would have been a greater loss." In the same way the defection of an average curate would have said more for the Roman Catholic religion and might be expected to lead to more lasting results.

The Glasgow Herald is informed that at the Secret Consistory, held at the Vatican Palace, on Monday the 21st ult., the following appointments were formally made:—The Most Rev. Charles Eyring of the diocese of Hexham, in England, to be Archbishop of Anazabias in partibus infidelium, and Visiting Apostolic in Scotland; the Right Rev. John McDonald to be Bishop of Nicopolis in partibus infidelium, likewise, and coadjutor to the Right Rev. Dr. Kyle of the northern district of Scotland. The Herald is also informed that the prelates who have been at the head of the ecclesiastical affairs of the western district of Scotland since the demise of the late lamented Dr. Murdoch, and who laid their resignations before His Holiness the Pope several months ago, both retire from all part in the management of the diocese—the one into private life for the present, the other to the order of which he was a distinguished ornament.

Mr. Baxter Langley, in reply to Dr. Carpenter and Professor Huxley, protests that the managers of the "Sunday Evenings for the People," causing themselves to be registered as a sect of Dissenters under the name of Recreative Religiousists, have not been guilty of "an evasion" or "sham." He thinks that "these eminent men have not clearly understood the exact position" of the managers, "nor the relation of perfect independence in which the lecturer stood towards the association."

Dr. Vaughan, the vicar of Doncaster, bears witness to the benefits in a pecuniary point of view, which in that town have followed the abolition of compulsory church rates. One of the arguments advanced by the supporters of the obnoxious rate was that, if the legal power of enforcing them were removed, no Dissenter would be willing to contribute anything like the amount which the law exacted. At Doncaster, however, the voluntary has exceeded in amount the compulsory rate, and Dr. Vaughan, in congratulating his parishioners on this fact, added that his experience was, that not only Dissenters, but Churchmen, were those who most often refused to contribute. If, he said, the Church tried to live in peace and harmony with the Dissenters she had nothing to fear, but would find from them generous, firm, and Christian support.

A letter from Rome, in the Independence Belge describing the Christmas festivities, says, "Jesus Christ is not a popular hero at Rome; people do not illuminate in His honour as they do for the Madonna; His worship is not celebrated except by enlightened worshippers, who are very rare in the country; and the Son of God is hardly known to the ignorant multitude." Any one who mixes with the Roman populace, or even observes their worship, will be able to confirm this.

The Evangelical Alliance has been observing this week as a season of special prayer. In London, in addition to meetings at various places of worship, there have been daily assemblies for prayer and addresses at the London Tavern and the Freemasons' Hall. Among the chairmen have been Lord Radstock, Mr. Bevan, the banker, Mr. Charles Reed, M.P., and Sir Francis Lycett.

In the evening of the 27th ult., the Pope received a serenade from the Zouaves, who appeared bearing coloured lanterns on the point of their bayonets and executed evolutions in the form of letters representing the Pope's designation, Pio Nono. The ceremony was attended by Cardinals Antonelli and Patrizi, and surrounded by the royal family of Naples, a number of the Roman nobility, while the salons of the Vatican were thronged with ladies. The presence of the latter in the evening is an incident without example, and greatly scandalised the prelates. Even laymen were struck by the novelty, and the Duke Grazioli expressed his astonishment to Patrizi, who, as Cardinal Vicar, is chief of spiritual police of Rome. The Cardinal replied laughing, "My jurisdiction does not extend to the Vatican."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In referring to the attack upon the mission station at Yang-chau, the English Independent says: "The preachers of a new religion in China are not breaking any of the fundamental laws of the empire, or even offending against the prevalent social ideas. The Chinese profess toleration. They are not a nation of one religion; they have an Established Church—that prime cause of persecution. The Abbé Huc reports that when Mandarins dine together they ask one another, 'To what sublime form of religion do you belong?'"

One answers, 'I am a Laou-Tseist; another, I am a Confucian; and a third, I am a Buddhist;' whereupon they join in a complimentary hum, and exclaim, 'Religions are many, but Reason is one.' They cannot, therefore, allege that the preaching of Christianity is an outrage upon the ideas and feelings of the people. The Pekin Gazette of the 20th of October, 1865, declared that 'it is allowed for missionaries to propagate their faith in the empire,' and only last year Mr. Anson Burlingame wrote to the United States:—'The Chinese Government favours toleration, and has repeatedly informed me that it has no objection to Protestant missionaries, for the reason that they have never appeared to be political agents.' Mr. Dilke bears witness that 'the Chinese are not disposed to ill-treat the missionaries of England and America, and the Times correspondent carefully discriminates between the reception which, on a visit to Yang-chau, he, as a foreigner, received from the mass of the people and from the literati, who stirred up the attack on the missionary premises.'

On the position of the Church in Spain, the Madrid correspondent of the Times writes:—

"Although for moral or social purposes any hope of religious reform may have to be abandoned; although the establishment of freedom of creed and worship may turn out mere moonshine, and even the emancipation of the civil law from priestly thralldom may turn out impracticable, it is important to observe that the ecclesiastical question has an economical no less than a political side, and the Church, though she may not die, may have to 'bleed' freely at the hands of the Revolution. Nothing is sacred in the eyes of a distressed financier; and by the time the Cortes comes together the Spanish treasury will be so utterly exhausted, that no legislator could hesitate about helping himself to every penny that luxurious prelates, fat canons, or sleek beneficiaries can be made to spare. Church and State will not be easily divorced, but the stronger partner in the household will not hesitate to lay hands on the dowry of the weaker vessel. The Catholic dogma has not been sensibly impaired, and not even seriously discussed in Italy, yet the spoliation of the Church has been no less searching than thorough. The State in all Catholic countries has always had it in its power to plead the law of necessity; and the Church, however at first obstreperous, has always ended by accepting accomplished facts. The experiment was tried in Spain itself by Mendizabal, and it was crowned with full, though not with permanent success. The work of Mendizabal will have to be resumed under better auspices, and carried to greater length. The revenues of the higher clergy will have to be heavily taxed, even if some of their offices be not abolished and their salaries suppressed. I am not sure whether that hint about substituting pewter for silver chalices and ostensories will not be acted upon, but I tremble for those diamond-studded crowns and diamond-spangled mantles of the Toledo and Atocha virgins, for all the gaudy trappings of those hundred of saints' images, every one of which wears what guide-books value at a king's ransom. . . . Strange to say, the Church seems to be used to such treatment, though, to do her justice, she never liked it. Compromise in mere pecuniary matters is never impossible with the Church, in the first place, because, like Shakespeare's Henry VI., she has always some sneaking doubt as to the validity of her titles, and also because as long as she, and she alone, is the Church, she is at no loss for the means of retrieving her losses, and drawing on the same sources from which her wealth originally sprang. Give her the control over men's consciences, and she will bear with your interference with her purse-strings, because, through men's consciences, she flatters herself that she can always find a sure way to men's purses. Were the Provisional Government, or any other revolutionary set of rulers, to drop, as they have already to a great extent done, all talk about liberty of worship, about the emancipation of the civil law, and all other measures tending to the establishment of free inquiry, the reduction of bishoprics, the suppression of ecclesiastical revenues, and any other deeds of spoliation might be looked upon as minor offences. The Church has been robbed before, but she has continued to survive and even to make up for her spoliation; and there is this immense difference in this respect between Italy and Spain, entirely to the advantage of the latter country, that in Italy all ecclesiastical change is mixed up with that cause of the temporal power about which the court of Rome will listen to no reason, while in Spain the clergy's revenues and possessions are their own concerns—a matter in which the Pope feels called upon to take no interest, except in as much as it may affect his own spiritual supremacy. The lay powers in Spain can, therefore, reckon upon the utmost impunity in any merely financial measure they may think it advisable to adopt to the clergy's detriment, if they take care not to push their liberal policy to a point which may be deemed dangerous to the Roman Catholic bond of union."

The Pall Mall thus justly comments on Dr. Pusey's letter upon the Mackonochie judgment, to which we referred last week:

"It really argues an amount of minute partisanship, which we should have deemed quite unworthy of a mind which has exercised, for good or evil, so great an influence on two generations of contemporaries. 'We who believe in the real objective presence,' he says, 'are bound in all honesty to let the Church know what we do believe.' How? 'Of necessity in our way of celebrating.' That is to say, doctrines of the deepest importance are to be expressed by gestures and postures like signs of freemasonry. Mr. Keble, he says was an example in this respect; 'no one who saw him could doubt as to his belief.' If Mr. Keble was really indicating his belief in the objective presence by gestures, while at the same time he was asserting his distinct disbelief of it in every edition of the Christian Year, published during his lifetime, speaking of Christ in the Eucharist as 'present in the heart, not in the hands,' we can only say that he was guilty, one way or the other, of a deception which, we are sure, Dr. Pusey would not ascribe to him, and we certainly do not. Our present concern, however, is with Dr. Pusey's curious misstatement of the law, not of the sentiments of Keble. He maintains that the Rubric respecting the reception of the sacramental bread and wine is not perfectly clear in its language, and that the Judicial Committee, in interpreting a rubric not perfectly clear in a sense unfavourable to the accused party, were violating the ordinary maxim, that in a 'criminal cause the doubt is to be given in favour of the respondent,' as, he says, was declared by Dr. Lushington, in the proceeding against 'Essays and Reviews.' 'The world,' he says, 'would call this playing fast and loose; loose whenever it is the question of allowing any matter of faith to be disbelieved; fast when it is the question of not allowing anything to be believed which popular prejudice disbelieves.' Dr. Pusey entirely mistakes the bearing of the maxim which he is discussing. In the proceeding against 'Essays and Reviews,' Dr. Lushington was interpreting, if we remember rightly, the doubtful language of an accused party, and in common parlance, 'gave him the benefit of the doubt.' In the case of Mackonochie, the court had to interpret the language of a public document—a rubric. They were laying down a meaning authoritatively, and with a view to general application, the meaning, not of a theological phrase, but of a practical direction to do something. If that language be doubtful, as Dr. Pusey says it is, their business was to explain it as well as they could by the light of grammatical construction, with the aid, if necessary, of precedent and authority; and not to put on it a construction favourable to the defendant, as they might reasonably do if judging only of his own language and acts. The distinction is so very obvious that we can only suppose Dr. Pusey to have unburdened his mind in the first smart of disappointment at the judgment, without weighing the real effect of his criticisms."

The Star, remarking on a passage in the same letter—that "the loss of modes of outward expression of belief only drives pious souls more inward, and the inward devotion shines the more through"—says:

"No doubt; but the loss of the outward expression is Dr. Pusey's own act. He may come out of the Church to-morrow, and have full liberty to kneel, and light candles, and elevate the Host; in short, to teach the truth openly as he believes it in secret. It is scarcely in keeping with the character of a very pious man to be hiding his convictions in deference to the judgment of lawyers, or only giving them obscure expression through occult signs, when it is only the endowments and prestige of a clergyman which prevent him from displaying the truth boldly. To believe in the Real Objective Presence, and yet in deference to the judgment of Lord Cairns to abstain from outward adoration is very like denying Christ before men. It is very unlike the conduct of Daniel when required to bow down to the image which the king had erected; but then we suppose we must not look in these days for all the fiery earnestness of past ages. Our pious souls shine inward, whenever it is not expedient to encounter worldly loss by shining outward."

We mentioned, two or three weeks ago, that the question of retaining the Filioque clause in the Nicene Creed was being earnestly discussed by some of the leaders of the Episcopal Church in America. A correspondent of the Guardian, who considers it to be "a subject of the highest importance both to individual Christians and to the Church in general," after stating the points in which the theologians of the East and the West are agreed, coming to the point of divergence, says that the former, "following the early fathers, use only the ipsissima verba of Holy Writ, and the Nicene fathers" (viz. proceeding from the Father); "but the dogma of the Westerns they reject with horror as blasphemous, because, say they, it is opposed to the doctrine of the unity of the God-head, and involves a denial of the truth that the Father is the only Source of Deity, and introduces the doctrine of a Διὰρχία, or the existence of two First Causes." And the conclusion which he himself arrives at is, "If it do not clearly appear that the doctrine of the 'Double Procession,' is contained in the Holy Scriptures, the retention of the clause in dispute cannot for a moment be defended by any consistent member of the Anglican communion."

In the same paper "an English Churchman" thinks,

"After Dr. Miller's remarks on schism at the memorable meeting of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, it would be interesting to hear some explanation of his own conduct in Scotland. For years he has been an actor and an abettor of schism at Dunoon against an orthodox Church in full communion with the Church of England. The same explanation may be asked of several benefited clergymen in Ireland, the most vehement assailants of the Prime Minister since he has expressed his opinion that the Irish Church should be disestablished. What is schism, if they are not schismatics?"

In this month's number of the Contemporary Review, Dean Alford thus graphically describes the tumult at the meeting just referred to:

"No sooner had the Archbishop of York taken the chair and the prayer been offered (which surely ought to be dispensed with as a hideous mockery on all future occasions), than a riot was raging at and outside the entrance door. Passionate and discordant cries, shouts and screams, drowned the voice of the first speaker, and the writer of these lines saw gestures which he could not otherwise interpret than by inferring that hard blows were being given. The nuisance was finally abated by the forcible closing of the doors by certain stalwart helmeted policemen. . . . It would be futile to attempt a description of the scene when Dr. Miller essayed to address the meeting. Having been in our time somewhat accustomed to handling church bells, I could only compare the din to that in a bell-chamber when a full peal is ringing and when the loudest cry into your friend's ear is inaudible. The 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians' tumult will ever henceforth have for me a reality which it had not before."

"Anglicanus," writing to the Pall Mall on the importance of recognising clearly that the rivalry of the plans proposed for the partial disestablishment and partial disendowment of the Irish Church is not one of principle but of detail, and so brings the question within the range of the progressive and gradual development of the English Constitution, observes:

"The Church of England itself has been partially disestablished and partially disendowed, in whole or in its separate institutions, many times over—as when it lost more than half its spiritual peers and more than half its property under Henry VIII.; as when it lost its exclusive rank in the State under William III. and George IV.; as when Nonconformists were admitted to share in its endowments at the universities, and exempted from paying its church-rates. The other religious communities, on the other hand, have by degrees become partially established and partially endowed, and every year will become more and more so; the Nonconformists by the Toleration Act, the Test and Corporation Act, and many others of like kind; the Scottish Episcopalians by the various acts which have incorporated them more or less into the Church of England; the Irish Presbyterians by the Regium Donum; the Irish Roman Catholics by the Irish Marriage Acts, the Irish Burial Act, the Charitable Bequests Act, the Maynooth Grants, &c., and all of them by the right of appealing to the civil tribunals for the adjudication of their religious disputes. This last privilege, which Dr. Pusey regards as the one chief mark of an Establishment, is the one element which the Church of England and all religious communities holding property in this country have in common, with this sole difference, that in the Church of England the final appeal lies to the mixed tribunal of Judges and Prelates in the Privy Council, in the other Churches to the Lord Chancellor or his deputy alone."

In an interesting speech at Doncaster, the vicar, Dr. Vaughan, said:—

"He believed in free trade in education, as in everything else. He ventured to say that, if the certificated schoolmasters could not hold their own by their intelligence and the higher state of their education, they were not worthy of the positions they occupied. If they were the men he believed them to be, they could command the highest prices for their services. He would go the whole length of saying—let the State have nothing to do with education except to judge of results by an inspection in reference to the secular, but not of the religious training. Let the State look to itself that it had citizens who should know how to be respected and honoured. He trusted that the religious spirit everywhere abroad was sufficient to secure the dissemination of religious principles without the interference of the State. Let the State, therefore, not meddle with that."

In a leader on the Mackonochie judgment the Church News relates the following story:

"In the dark days of last century, when faith in the unseen was principally to be found among Dissenters, there was a certain house in Wales haunted by an evil spirit. The wife of a Dissenting teacher volunteered to encounter the enemy alone at night, with no external aid but her Bible and a candle. Looking up from her book in the course of the night she perceived a hideous and appalling form had seated itself noiselessly opposite to her. She gazed at it unflinchingly and then resumed her reading. "Your trust is in that candle," said the evil being with a malicious sneer. She met his glance once more; and then, blowing out the candle, waited till the dawn of morning revealed that the defeated demon had departed never to return, as silently as he came, and vanquished by faith alone. Does the story need explanation as applicable to our present position? or does anyone need reminding that faith is all we need for final victory over the world?" Further on the Church News declares, in reference to the judgment, that "every tyrannical act of the kind is a nail in the Establishment's coffin."

Punch has the following fair hit at the way in which too many of the clergy treat the creeds and formularies by which they are bound:

"A RUBRIC WELL RULED.—Dr. Pusey complains that the Judicial Committee have not interpreted a certain rubric, relative to the Mackonochie case, grammatically. They will be generally considered to have interpreted it according to its obviously intended meaning. Dr. Pusey must not expect worldly judges to interpret even Church law in a non-natural sense."

REVIEWS.

Quiet Thoughts for the Day of Rest. Published by the Manchester District Sunday-school Association. One Shilling.

We heartily commend to our readers this elegant little book. The idea of it was a happy one, and it is excellently carried into effect. The printing and general appearance betoken the expenditure of no little care and artistic taste, and we hope the sale will be large.

The editor's preface will explain the purpose he had in view—"to bring to the cottage home of the Sunday scholar some few of those gems of English religious poetry which are already household words among those who can afford to buy costly books." * * His hope is "that in times of quiet thoughtfulness it may afford many a holy suggestion, and in those of trial and sorrow it may give that great consolation which is derived from seeing how our own weak and feeble aspirations are expanded and glorified by the insight into divine things which belongs to the true poet."

The collection contains nearly a hundred pieces, selected with much taste from our great English writers, exhibiting lofty thoughts in perfect form, and ranging over a wide field. We will only add that, with this as a manual, any teacher may introduce to his class many of those exquisite religious utterances which are the chief glory of our own literature, and in which, indeed, it is probably unequalled; and if by means of this collection a taste for such high-class reading can be inspired in the minds of his scholars, a great and lasting service will thus be rendered to them. The time has happily gone by when it was considered almost a slight on the Bible to resort to other than the unsurpassed stores of religious inspiration which it contains; and it will be an excellent augury for the future of our Sunday schools if this little book, displaying an enterprise so greatly to be admired, should meet with the wide acceptance that it deserves.

The Theological Review, XXIV. January, 1869.

THE present number of the Theological opens with a "Narrative of a visit to the Unitarian Churches of Transylvania," by the Principal of Manchester New College, who, together with his colleagues, in the spring of last year received a very cordial invitation from the Bishop, speaking in the name of the Consistory over which he presides, to be present at the celebration of the three-hundredth anniversary of the proclamation of Religious Liberty, put forth by the young sovereign, John Sigismund, himself a Unitarian, at Torda, in September, 1568, under which those Churches first acquired a legal existence. It was a right spirited thing in Mr. Tayler, considering that he has over-stepped the "three-score years and ten," to undertake a journey, accompanied only by his daughter, to these distant co-religionists, and most satisfactorily did he carry out his purpose, bearing to them addresses of congratulation and sympathy from the British and Foreign and the West Riding Unitarian Associations, and representing the Unitarians of England on this great occasion in a manner which few else would have been able to do. His account of his visit can hardly fail to give pleasure to any one who reads it, and for those who belong to the same "household of faith," it has a special interest. Mr. Tayler prefixes to his narrative some remarks on the peculiar institutions and mixed population of Hungary generally, which in a short compass give us a good idea of the nature of these. It appears that as yet, though this promises not long to be the case, the Unitarians have not a single church in Hungary proper, but are confined entirely to Transylvania, where the oldest and purest Magyar blood is said to flow in the veins of the people. At present there are 106 congregations, with as many ministers and schoolmasters; for to each church a school is always attached; and there are sometimes smaller congregations in connection with the larger ones. Notwithstanding the simplicity of its doctrine and ritual, Unitarianism in Transylvania has preserved some features of the Episcopal discipline; the churches, under the superintendence of the Bishop, being distributed into eight circles, over which an Archdeacon presides. Though from the reign of John Sigismund it had a distinct place among the four recognised religions of the country, and was professed at one time by men of weight and social position, it was afterwards depressed and discouraged, and its gentry and nobility, like those of the Huguenots in France, were gradually seduced from their faith by the insidious policy of the Court, which never conferred any office or distinction on the professor of Unitarianism. The title of Bishop, too, given to the head of all the other recognised religions, was kept in abeyance among the Unitarians; but the prohibition was a short time since withdrawn, which occasioned great rejoicing, as an indication of recovered position; and as a further expression of the friendly feeling of the present Government, Bishop Kriza has recently been made a Privy Councillor, which, though merely a titular distinction, has a value for the same reason that gave weight to the re-assumption of that of Bishop.—We cannot follow Mr. Tayler into the particulars of the fraternal reception which greeted him in the Consistory, of which he was elected an honorary member, and to which he addressed a most graceful Latin speech, nor of the religious services with which the high festival was accompanied. One portion of Mr. Tayler's description of these, however, is so suffused with his sympathetic and loving spirit that, limited as our space is, we must make room for it:

At the close of the sermon, there was a celebration of the Lord's Supper. I think nearly the whole congregation partook of it; the men first, and afterwards the women. It was a simultaneous expression of rejoicing, that they had survived with faith and hope unbroken, centuries of suffering and persecution, and had come by God's good providence to the quiet safety and freedom of that hour. It was a touching scene. I never before felt, as I did then, the holy beauty and deep spiritual significance of the few simple symbols which universal Christendom has associated with this expressive rite. There I stood in the front row of the communicants, by the side of my countryman, Mr. Paget, unable of course to understand the words that were earnestly uttered by the officiating minister, but attuned to seriousness by the quaint old melody that pealed forth from the organ and was chanted by the choir,—by the cup and the bread that were circulating around me, brought into silent sympathy with that faithful people of God who had clung to their honest convictions in defiance alike of the threats and allurements of the world,—and carried back by reminiscences irresistibly borne in upon me, into a communion of the inmost spirit with that innumerable company of saints and confessors who, in divers ages and widely severed lands, had through these same symbols given up their souls to God and devoted themselves to works of self-sacrificing love. I could not suppress the hope that the time might come in our own country, when the members of different communions, in spite of their doctrinal differences, could meet occasionally to strengthen the bonds of Christian brotherhood, by celebrating in the presence of their common symbol, the Cross, a common feast of holiness and love."

The second article, upon "Liddon and Réville on the Divinity of Christ," by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, bears ample testimony to the excellent training which he has received in Manchester New College, and the sound scholarship which he has acquired. The only fault we can find with his treatment of his subject is, that he seems to us to deal somewhat too leniently with the bold assertions and unwarrantable assumptions which the great Oxford preacher so frequently and so complacently makes, though in several instances these are well pointed out and exposed.

An article by J. Frederick Smith, on "Goethe and Religion," exhibits the illustrious German in a more self-denying and Christian light than that in which we have been wont to view him, with what justice the hasty perusal which we have had to give to the article does not enable us to say. According to Mr. Smith, Goethe was ultimately more attracted to Christianity than repulsed. "In the very period of his heathenism, as he called it, he wrote one of the most Christian poems of his or any age, Die Geheimnisse. The two characters, Humanus and Marcus, which he has there sketched, are truest disciples of Jesus. Indeed, the deepest springs of Goethe's religion and the deepest springs of Christianity mingle, however much the streams may divide upon the surface." "He laboured night and day that men might know, and, knowing, love God. And of such co-workers Jesus said, 'He that is not against us is for us.'"

The Rev. J. Kegan Paul points out at length, what every one who has been in the habit of examining them must have observed, how unwarranted and inappropriate many of the Chapter headings in our Authorized Version of the Bible are; and satisfactorily, or rather, we should say, unsatisfactorily, proves that they are open to these objections: that they have no authority; that they have been altered without authority; that they are careless, insufficient, misleading, and ambiguous; and, it may be added, a violation of the fundamental principle of the Bible Society, which professes to distribute the Book without note or comment.

The number, which, it will be seen, even from this hasty review, is an interesting one, concludes with the usual careful "Notices of Books."

OUR CRIMINAL CLASS.

WE believe the above is the correct phrase by which to designate that large proportion of our population who live by means distinctly recognised as unlawful. We have heard of old of great nations whose swarming populations were divided into the great classes, or castes, of priests, warriors, agriculturalists, &c., but we do not recollect that any of them had advanced to the refinement of having a criminal class. It was reserved for the triumph of modern civilisation and Christianity to permit among its citizens that perfect liberty which should enable them to establish within our great towns colonies of crime, and to develop their peculiar theories of social and economical ethics with almost perfect impunity. We beg pardon, there is a passage in the Indian census which shews that some of the lowest of the Hindoo tribes equal us in toleration of the criminal, and excel us in the frankness with which they confess his presence among them. In the last census of the city of Allahabad 974 people officially described themselves as "low blackguards;" 35 as "men who beg with threats of violence;" and 25 as "hereditary robbers." Alas, we fear that if the tribes of London and Manchester and Liverpool could be thus classified, the return would be only worse.

It is one of the most bitter and revolting facts of our time—that we are by our false and purely sentimental humanity encouraging the growth of hereditary crime amongst us. In times past we peopled some of the fairest portions of the earth with the offscourings of our criminals. We turned Australia into one vast prison, and we made beautiful Tasmania a perfect hell upon earth, till our colonists rose up against us and refused to be perpetually contaminated by the constant influx of all that was vilest in English life. The colonists have done well, for they know how impossible it is for a working population to continue honest, intelligent, and God-fearing, side by side with another class of people, who live better, dress better, and work not at all; supported by a career of open and unblushing crime. The very air is contaminated by the presence of these wretched outcasts of humanity, the quarter of the city in which they live is a hot-bed of infamy, and the children growing up faithfully in the footsteps of their parents, and inevitably mixing with those of the honest labourers, spread the contamination far and wide, till at last, like the ulcer, which seems at first a little speck on the fair skin, it poisons every vein and pore in the whole body, and makes it one stinking mass of corruption. This is what the Australians refused to allow; and as we can no longer ship off our refuse humanity to them, we just shoot it down in the midst of ourselves, and, with the fortitude of philosophers, are calmly awaiting the result.

We call attention to these facts because at the present moment a movement is being commenced in favour of placing our notoriously criminal population under a stricter surveillance. It is not out of any special enmity, far less of revengeful feeling towards these unfortunates, that we are now writing. We feel that the problem is a difficult one, and one that ought to be approached in a calm and even Christian spirit. We have no desire for punishment as punishment, and the greatest wish for the possible reformation of every evil disposed man. But we cannot help seeing that there is another side to this question. There are two entirely distinct classes of criminals. There is the man who has fallen suddenly and almost unwittingly into some act contrary to the law, and whose crime being opposed to the general tenor of his life is not necessarily the index of a very guilty disposition; towards such men let all leniency be shown, there is every hope that a little kindly discipline and advice may bring them back into the ranks of the law-abiding portion of humanity. There is, however, another and far larger number of our criminals who follow an habitual career of vice, who calculate on the amount of punishment they will receive, and on the chances they have of escape, and prefer the risks of their adventurous career to the dull monotony of a life of honest labour. To them the difficulties of their vocation only add a stimulus in its pursuit, and a zest to success. In the midst of a civilised community they lead the lives of utter barbarians; a few hours of danger and risk, followed by days of drunkenness and debauchery is their ideal of existence. It is no kindness to such men to allow them full liberty of action, and it is a terrible injustice to the honest and hard-working to be compelled to have them in their midst. Men of this class have forfeited every claim to citizenship, and it is only right that the laws which they outrage should be called into action to check them in their career of villany.

We do not pretend to lay down any cut and dried plan by which this is to be done, but we ask our readers to give the matter their serious attention; let them be assured that it is one of great importance to them. Almost in vain are missions and schools and good books, whilst the present state of affairs continues. We might as hope-fully place a sanatorium at the mouth of a town's sewer, as a Sunday school or mission station in the midst of these hot-beds of vice and corruption. It is but one in a thousand we can save, whilst tens of thousands are corrupted by the tainted atmosphere in which they live. We are not asking then for vengeance or even retribution on the criminal classes, but earnestly desire that their contaminating career should be put an end to. It is not what they take from the property of the community that is of the most importance, it is what they destroy and corrupt, the evil habits engendered among them which permeate the whole community. It is because they are not only criminal themselves, but have criminal wives, and breed criminal children. Because they create an idle, dissipated, and savage race of beings, who when loose prey upon the industrious, and when confined are fed and clothed at their expense. These are the reasons which make the condition of our criminal class so serious a question, and this is why we ask all to do their utmost to help those who are trying to devise means to prevent the commission of crime, seeing how useless have proved all mere temporary punishment of the criminals.

THE ST. ALBAN'S JUDGMENT.

THE decision of the Privy Council in the St. Alban's case, while filling Evangelicals with delight and making the Record and the Rock quite jubilant, has, of course, fluttered High Churchmen not a little, and thrown them into a state of alarm and perplexity. In reply to a kind letter of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. Mackonochie says the subject is one which deeply concerns not himself alone, but many both of the clergy and laity, and is "the matter of their most serious deliberation;" and one day last week a meeting was held, with Archdeacon Denison in the chair, at which various opinions were expressed, some counselling "moderation," while others, like Mr. Bennett, of Frome, were for opposing the Court "tooth and nail."

Dr. Pusey, as our readers have seen, instead of bravely standing up for a clear and open manifestation of faith in what he and his party regard as a truth of vital importance, in reality merely suggests that the judgment given against them need only have the effect of causing those who believe in the doctrine of the Real Presence to have recourse to other ways of expressing their belief than those which have been condemned; such as will be understood by the initiated, but of too undefinable a nature to come within the reach of the law. In such a course there may be the wisdom of the serpent, but scarcely, as it seems to us, the harmlessness of the dove.

The Rev. R. Brett, an ardent Ritualist, thinks that "had a Chinese Mandarin been selected to adjudicate on some controverted article of the Nicene Creed, it would not have been a more monstrous perversion of truth and justice than for a Scotch Presbyterian Judge to attempt to decide what the ritual of a Church is to which he not only does not belong, but against which he must be most hostile; and the judgment seems to him "so adverse to the principles on which the English Reformation was based, that it is difficult to see how Churchmen can honestly and conscientiously submit to it." If they do, and stand aloof from one another, this will be the result: "legislation and liturgical revision will soon be forced upon us; and there are some of our spiritual rulers who would fain so fetter the Church with the galling chains of a debasing Erastianism, that she dare not condemn the boldest blasphemer of her Lord, unless some worthless Act of Parliament gave her leave. Sad and humiliating indeed, in the eyes of Christendom, is the present condition of England's Church, with her Bishops relentlessly persecuting their clergy for ritual, whilst they are slow, if not indifferent, in vindicating the insulted majesty of Him whose commission they bear. Perish all the kings of the earth and all their decrees, rather than such things should be tolerated for one day."

Some of the same extreme school are for demanding that the case should be re-heard, and the Queen implored not to accept the "advice" of her Privy Council. Among those who urge this course is Dr. Littledale, the clergyman who, at Liverpool, described the English Reformers as such a set of scoundrels, and Edward VI. as "a young tiger cub." Should the appeal fail, he is "for compliance with the judgment—always under protest, and avowedly waiting and working for its reversal;" and he gives distinct notice that, if finally beaten about the candles, he "will take care to be even more definite in preaching the Real Presence than he has been these dozen years." Dr. Littledale shows about as much respect for the prelates of these days as for those of the Reformation period. In uttering a protest against counter-prosecutions, he says:—"If some mitred offender, preferably Archbishop Thomson himself, be criminally prosecuted under Lord Cairns's finding, well and good. He needs a lesson, and no argument save one addressed to his person or his pocket will touch him."

It appears, however, that at least two London incumbents, not content to wait for the result of such an appeal, have boldly resolved to set the judgment at defiance, as regards both the use of candles and genuflections during the communion service. One of these gentlemen—Mr. Richards, of All Saints', Margaret-street—stated, in the course of his sermon, on Sunday, that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was a court which had never been recognised by the Church. He regarded the recent decision "as an invasion of the liberties of Churchmen, and therefore as one to be resisted in every possible way." Hitherto "he had never counselled the adoption of extreme gestures of devotion," but now he asked "that in future his congregation would join with the rest of the faithful in kneeling in the Creed at the words 'and was incarnate and was made man;' and in prostrating themselves during the prayer of consecration in the office of the Holy Eucharist, and especially never to sit down, but to kneel or to stand, while our blessed Lord lies on the altar."

There are various intimations that some of the defeated party intend to have their revenge on "the Puritan party" in a series of counter-prosecutions, feeling well assured that not only their clergy, but some of the bishops likewise, may be convicted of violating the rubric, and glaringly disregarding the rules of the Church. As the Standard admits, there is no apparent reason, if the recent judgment be invoked, why the Archbishop of York and Dean M'Neile, for instance, should not be compelled by force of law henceforth to celebrate Holy Communion "standing before the table;" and Mr. Perry, of Brighton, maintains that all clergymen are, from this time forth, bound by law to wear the "vestments" when celebrating the Communion.

There has been a report in circulation that some of the more decided Ritualists were contemplating the establishment of a "Free Church," with Dr. Jenner, of Dunedin, as their bishop; but we shall not believe this till it becomes an accomplished fact; and we fancy that the clergy who met last week were about right, when, as the John Bull informs us, "no fear of secession, except among ladies, seemed to be entertained."

AMERICAN NOTES.

Dr. Bellows writes to the Liberal Christian:

"Muslim power becomes appalling as we approach the shores where Africa and Asia meet Europe. Here one begins to realise the vast superiority of numbers under which Christianity staggers. There are by the best authorities I have been able to consult, about 260,000,000 of Christians in the world, leaving nearly a thousand millions of heathen, among whom, in Africa and Asia, there may be at least 260,000,000 of Mussulmans. Of the 260,000,000 Christians only 95,000,000 are Protestant, 175,000,000 being Roman Catholic, and 90,000,000 Greek Church. So far as superstition and ignorance are concerned, there is not so much to choose between the peasantry in the Roman and Greek Churches and the common Mussulmans. Indeed, I should think in point of morality and self-respect the Bedouins and Algerines superior to Spanish mendicants, Russian beggars, and Italian lazaroni. What a task Protestantism has to balance and overcome the dead weight of ignorance, fanaticism, priestcraft, and servility, which now loads more than three-quarters of the globe! Roman Catholicism, weak in every member, is prodigious in its total effectiveness, because it is a unit. There is an apathy about the Roman Catholic advances in the United States among American Protestants, which will finally receive a terrible shock. There is no influence at work in America so hostile to our future peace as the Roman Catholic Church. The next American war will, I fear, be a religious war—of all kinds the worst."

A grand Wesleyan church is to be opened at Washington on the Sunday preceding the inauguration of General Grant as President. The preachers on the occasion are to be Bishop Simpson and the Rev. W. M. Punshon. The building is to cost $45,000, by far the greater part of which has already been secured.

The "Reformed Jews" have lately finished and consecrated a magnificent cruciform "Temple of Emanuel," which cost them 800,000 dols., and is the most splendid piece of ecclesiastical architecture in New York. In the course of a few months another synagogue, only second to this in splendour, will be completed, about five minutes' walk from it, belonging to the Orthodox Jews; but this is not cruciform.

The First Positivist Society of New York has just favoured the world with its creed. Of forty articles, it does not feel pledged to more than these: that science is the sole arbiter of truth, and that scientific methods should be extended to all subjects or beliefs hitherto left to theology, metaphysics, or confessed ignorance. But the development of these principles proves that the existence of a God is an imagination; that light, gravity, electricity, heat, thought, will, are all mutually convertible forces; that the mind is but a continuation of thought, that is a succession of cell-growths in the brain; that volition is the result of force-currents in the brain, and is necessitated; that vital organisation is the result of physical forces; in fine, that the superstitious ideas of God, creation, soul, heaven, hell, sin, repentance, resurrection, judgment, ghosts, fairies, all vanish, and that human beings are the only objects of reverence in prayer. What our readers may think of such philosophy we cannot tell; but, for ourselves we say, with Bacon, we "had rather believe all the fables in the Legend, and the Talmud, and the Alcoran, than that this universal frame is without a mind," as we are thus positively taught.

The Jesuit Father De Smet, widely known for his missionary labours among the Indians, is at present in Europe, with the object of inducing a dozen or more religious men and women to return with him, who will establish schools among the Ricarees, Crows, and Sioux inhabiting the region through which flow the main branches of the Upper Missouri. The sisters are to teach the children the rudiments of an English education, and instruct the girls in sewing and embroidery. Father De Smet intends also to bring with him a few blacksmiths, tailors, and carpenters. The condition of the Indians on the western side of the Rocky Mountains is, in his opinion, such as would make good men rejoice. Nearly the whole of the Flatheads, Nezperces, Spokanes, Kalispels, Snakes, and other tribes inhabiting Oregon and Washington are, he says, converted, and have laid aside their predatory habits for the peaceful avocations of agricultural life. The Catholic missionaries have supplied them with seed, and taught them to raise abundant crops. Other tribes, inhabiting the region from North Kansas to British America, and from Minnesota to the Rocky Mountains, fill the Father with great anxiety. Their treatment by the Government agents has been bad, and led to a corresponding feeling. The manners and habits of the Indians are too little studied by the whites. When one of the former is killed, his relatives believe they are disgraced till his death is avenged. If a white person is killed, it is not unusual for the whites to attack and murder all the Indians of a lodge. The butchery of some 600, nearly all of whom were women and children, by the order of Major Chivington, while under his protection, very naturally roused the spirit of vengeance among all the surrounding tribes. In his journeys among the Brules, Blackfeet, Crows, Uckases, and other tribes, many of whom are at present giving evidence of a hostile feeling, the Father was everywhere well received, and the Indians will be kind and docile if treated kindly. During the whole of a twenty-five years' residence among them he never was addressed with an angry word. Messrs. Doolittle and Foster, of the Senate, last year visited the St. Mary's Mission Station, among the Ricarees, and were present at an examination of 150 children in reading, spelling, grammar, arithmetic, United States History, sewing, and embroidery, and were extremely pleased with the good deportment of the children and their progress in learning. Indeed, he says, the Indian boys are the best behaved boys he has ever seen; and the adults are so eager for instruction that they would listen to the teachings of the missionary from dawn till dark. And if the Government will lay aside the sword and exert itself on their behalf, he has no doubt that they will become a useful portion of the American people.

It appears that the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher has been lending his sanction to what, in this country, would be regarded by many as a profanation of the Sabbath—viz., getting an eminent medical man, Dr. W. Parker, to lecture, on Sunday evenings, at the Bethel Mission of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, upon "The House we live in, and the proper use of it." The New York World, while expressing "its warm approbation of this long stride taken by a clergyman in the direction of real liberality," surmises that it is enough to make the bones of Mr. Beecher's father turn in his grave, he having been "after the most straitest sect a Puritan."

The Rev. Edward Talbot, of Tenterden.

MANY of our readers will see with surprise and regret the announcement of the death of this excellent man. Mr. Talbot was a native of Leeds, closely related to the Baines family, and was a pupil of the late Dr. Hutton during his ministry there. Afterwards he went to Manchester College, York, where he was a fellow-student of Revs. James Martineau, William Gaskell, Edward Higginson, and others, whose deep esteem and regard he won, and retained to the end of his life. He settled at Tenterden as minister of the Unitarian chapel in 1828, and for forty years continued there, a faithful and respected pastor, and a sincere and devoted labourer in the cause of religion, education, and civil and religious liberty. It is but two months ago that he spent a brief vacation in visiting his old friends and relatives in the north of England, and he returned to his ministry appearing to be in renewed and vigorous health. Last Sunday he preached in the morning, and it being the first Sunday in the year, administered the communion, and seemed at the time perfectly well. On his return home, however, he was attacked by illness which proved fatal, and in an hour or two removed him from the scene of his earthly labours. He leaves a widow and five children. "Blessed are those servants whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching."

OPEN CHURCH PAPERS.

I.—THE PRINCIPLE OF THE OPEN-CHURCH SYSTEM.

I AM so frequently applied to for information and advice on the open-church system, both as to the grounds on which its probable success rests, and as to the best methods of carrying it out, that I think it may save some trouble both to myself and my correspondents if I give a few short papers on the subject in the columns of the Herald. I shall do so, too, in the hope that they may be earnestly read by many in our churches who have not hitherto given the subject much consideration. Upwards of ten years ago I became convinced that the plan of having our churches and chapels maintained as proprietary places, and let off in reserved pews, is a calamitous mistake, injurious every way to the life and influence of our congregations. Four years ago I was fortunate enough to find a congregation willing to adopt the primitive plan of an open church, to be supported entirely by the offertory, and the results of my four years' experience has been very greatly to intensify my first conviction. Hitherto I have said very little publicly on the matter. While I had only theory to appeal to, I felt that I could hardly hope to make head against the force of a usage which, though an innovation, looking to the whole history of religion, has come to be, in the common thought, part of the established order of things. I have, however, now something besides theory to appeal to, and I feel that I have earned the right to ask a careful and kindly consideration from the members of our congregations for what I have to say on this matter.

I wish, in the first place, to put clearly what seems to me the main principle involved. I constantly hear this question of open, unappropriated churches argued on other and lower grounds.

Some view it as a question of attracting the people to worship, and if they cannot see any likelihood of its doing this they condemn it. Others again argue it on the ground of convenience, or of personal comfort; then I often meet with people who speak as if it depended on personal or local considerations: they think it might answer with certain ministers, or in particular places; and I am bound to say that I find a tendency to put these collateral considerations in the foreground, even on the part of many who are favorable to it. I find people thinking of it here and there as an attractive novelty; they talk of trying the "open church" system as they might of getting a new organ, or changing from free prayer to a liturgy: they don't care for the principle of it—perhaps have never thought of there being any special principle—they regard it as a mere experiment in church organisation or congregational arrangement.

Now, upon any one of these grounds, I believe that it will in the long run be found that the system of having churches open and unappropriated will be found the best. I believe it is in the end the most convenient and the most comfortable plan, provided you look to the comfort of the whole body of worshippers, not of a favoured few. I believe that if a congregation is very large there is no plan which will make their chapel accommodate so many; and that, on the other hand, where the fewest worshippers are holding together without much chance of increase, there is no plan which would make the smallness of their body so little felt or noticed, and so make up for the excitement of numbers by closer, kindlier fellowship. Take it on every ground of mere expediency, I have faith that it will, in the long run, stand its ground. But I cannot put any of these things as its objects. I cannot argue for it merely as a means of attaining any of these things; I see in it an idea which goes much further down into the world's religious life and touches man's whole thought and feeling about worship far more closely than any such considerations as these; and it is to that I wish to call the attention of our churches.

The main central thought or principle then of the movement for "Open Churches" is this: that the place of common worship is essentially a public place, and should be honestly kept so; that all Christian churches ought to be places of perfectly free resort for worship, to all who will; places really dedicated to the public religious use. It does not matter whether a church is erected by the munificence of one, or by the pious offerings of a multitude. Those who build it should regard it, not as their house, but God's; and those who are specially interested in its maintenance by reason of their preferring to worship there, should support it, not as a proprietary worshipping place for themselves, but as a temple of God freely open to all who will.

I may illustrate this position by referring to an institution which happily is becoming well known in all our large towns. I mean our public parks. I would say that what these public parks are to the recreation of the people, all our churches ought to be to their religious life. You know how perfectly open to all these parks are felt to be. They are frequented as they are, for that very reason. But suppose they had been established on a different principle. Suppose a few hundred people living in one quarter of the town had said among themselves—We will establish a public park, a place for public recreation; but as we are going to pay for it, we will reserve all the best walks, all the choicest plots of lawn for ourselves and our families, only admitting outsiders to them on sufferance, and leaving only a few third-rate corners, that no one cares to appropriate, for the really free use of the public. In that case, would the people have thought of them as they do now, or frequented them as they do now? Not they! It would have been felt in that case that it was hardly true to call them public parks, and it would have been impossible, especially for the poor, to feel them to be places of free public resort for recreation. Very wisely, however, a more liberal plan has been followed. No private appropriation of their accommodation is permitted at all. And the consequence is, that universal feeling of their being really open to all alike, places to which the poorest may freely come, into which any casual passer by may turn for a pleasant hour, and where even the raggedest children out of the bye-ways of the city may have a happy time amid the grass and flowers. Now, I repeat, what these parks are o the people's recreation, that churches ought to be to their religious life. They should be places of perfectly free public resort. I believe that it is as impossible in the case of the church, as it would be in that of the park, for the people around to feel thoroughly free and comfortable in entering, if a large—and the best—part is reserved for private use, so that any one, when in that part, feels he is there on sufferance. So, we say, let all private appropriation of places be done away; let all traces of private occupancy be removed: such things ought not to be in a place for public use! It is not that therefore anything of real comfort or convenience should be lacking; whatever people would want if they came always, should be there in every place for every one who comes even casually; but all as the carrying out of the same grand and simple idea, as making the public place of worship more the kind of place to which the public may love to come and may feel perfectly at ease in coming to! Whatever of rest, or help, or blessing the church has to offer, its peacefulness and quiet, its charm of solemn music, the holy sympathies of prayer, the rousing or the comfort of its spoken word, let these be not provided as by a few people for their own religious gratification, but be offered to the service of God by being really and freely dedicated to the public use.

MIND'S SEASONS.

WHENCE comes the mantling green of summer woods
To clothe the boughs that have been dead so long?
And whence the thought that breaks our silent moods,
And blossoms into song?
I stand as leafless as the blackened trunk,
I feel no stir of any inward breath,
Of what oblivious Lethe have I drunk
To bring this barren death?
Has mind its seasons like the circling earth?
Its sun that draws new being from its roots?
Its periods of long waiting? Winter dearth?
Spring days? Autumnal fruits?
O God of spring, here like a winter oak
I reach to Thee my bare, bleak, frozen arms,
And pray for leaves, pray for the quickening stroke,
Pray for the breath that warms.
And prayer is its own return, the fire
That floods the mountain-top with hope of day;
The getting of the good that we desire
Enables us to pray.

A HAPPY FAILURE.

LET readers transport themselves to Canterbury in 1776, and let them enter a barber's shop, hard by Canterbury Cathedral. It is a primitive shop, with red and white pole over the door, and a modest display of wigs and puff-boxes in the window. A small shop, but, notwithstanding its smallness, the best shop of its kind in Canterbury; and its lean, stiff, respectable master is a man of good repute in the cathedral town. His hands have, ere now, powdered the Archbishop's wig, and he is specially retained by the chief clergy of the city and neighbourhood to keep their false hair in order, and trim the natural tresses of their children. Not only have the dignitaries of the cathedral taken the worthy barber under their special protection, but they have extended their care to his little boy Charles, a demure, prim lad, who is at the present time a pupil in the King's School, to which academy clerical interest gained him admission. The lad is in his fourteenth year, and Dr. Ormond Beauvoir, the master of the school, gives him so good a character for industry and dutiful demeanour that some of the cathedral ecclesiastics have resolved to make the little fellow's fortune, by placing him in the office of chorister. There is a vacant place in the cathedral choir; and the boy who is lucky enough to receive the appointment will be provided for munificently. He will forthwith have a maintenance, and in the course of time his salary will be £70 per annum.

During the last fortnight the barber has been in great and constant excitement, hoping that his little boy will obtain this valuable piece of preferment; persuading himself that the lad's thickness of voice, concerning which the choir-master speaks with aggravating persistence, is a matter of no real importance; fearing that the friends of another contemporary boy, who is said by the choir-master to have an exceedingly mellifluous voice may defeat his paternal aspirations. The momentous question agitates many humble homes in Canterbury; and whilst Mr. Abbott, the barber, is encouraged to hope the best for his son, the relatives and supporters of the contemporary boy, are urging him not to despair. Spirit prevails on either side—Mr. Abbott's family associates maintaining that the contemporary boy's higher notes resemble those of a penny whistle; whilst the contemporary boy's father, with much satire and some justice, murmurs that "old Abbott, who is the gossipmonger of the parsons, wants to push his son into a place for which there is a better candidate."

To-day is the eventful day when the election will be made. Even now, whilst Abbott the barber is trimming a wig at his shop window, and listening to the hopeful talk of an intimate neighbour, his son Charlie is chaunting the Old Hundredth before the whole chapter. When Charlie has been put through his vocal paces, the contemporary boy is requested to sing. Whereupon, that clear-throated competitor, sustained by justifiable self-confidence and a new-laid egg, which he had sucked scarcely a minute before he made a bow to their reverences, sings out with such richness of compass, that all the auditors recognise his great superiority.

Ere ten more minutes have passed, Charlie Abbott knows that he has lost the election; and he hastens from the cathedral with quick steps. Running into the shop he gives his father one look that tells the whole story of—failure, and then the little fellow, unable to command his grief, sits down on the floor and sobs convulsively.

Failure is often the first step to eminence. Had the boy gained the chorister's place, he would have been a cathedral servant all his days. Having failed to get it, he returned to the King's School, went as a poor scholar to Oxford, and fought his way to honour. He became Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and a peer of the realm. Towards the close of his honourable career, Lord Tenterden attended service in the cathedral at Canterbury, accompanied by Mr. Justice Richardson. When the ceremonial was at an end, the Chief Justice said to his friend—"Do you see that old man there among the choristers? In him, brother Richardson, behold the only being I ever envied; when at school in this town we were candidates together for a chorister's place; he obtained it; and if I had gained my wish he might have been Chief Justice, and pointing me out as his old schoolfellow, the singing-man."

CHRISTMAS IN HUNGARY.

WE last week told how Christmas is kept in Naples; the Pesth correspondent of the Times gives this account of the way in which it is observed in Hungary:

"In Hungary, Christmas, New Year, and Twelfth Night are thrown, as it were, into one pot, and form one long holiday for pleasant meetings, games, and mummeries. One of the great features of these festivals is the representations of the Nativity and the Adoration of the Magi. Not long ago, even in the capital, you could meet in the evening, at this time of year, bands of mummers going about from house to house and exhibiting their art. But it was not in the capital that you must look anywhere to study such old popular customs, but in the country, and in the country towns, where the trade of these itinerant bands flourishes now as briskly as ever. But these exhibitions have not the faintest resemblance to those ponderous, well-prepared mysteries which still exist in some German places. It is more a humorous travesty coupled with improvisations on local affairs. From beginning to end good humor pervades them, so that were it not for a certain bonhomie you might almost call it a satire. The object is simply to amuse by drolleries and extempore songs. The mixture of the serious and comic is incredibly ludicrous. Just fancy, for instance, a hussar, or liveried Hungarian servant, entering gravely, bowing and asking permission to introduce to the company the Archangel Gabriel and the shepherds. Then, when the permission is given, the dramatis persona are duly presented once more, and begin their play. The shepherds begin their conversation, which almost always consists in joking and quizzing each other, perverting the Latin texts in their own way, and immediately after singing a pious simple song, calling on each other to go and worship the Babe; or else you may see the shepherds asleep and the archangel coming in and belaboring them to rouse them from their sleep, and frightening the lazy by telling them the fib that their sheep have strayed. Even more amusing are, perhaps, the representatives of the Magi, who, like the Athenian bores in Shakespere's 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' carry their lantern to represent the star which leads them to the manger. According to time-honoured custom, one of the three is black, and he is the butt of the company, whose questions and answers are an unceasing play on words and meanings."

SEND FOR THE GAS-FITTER.

THE REV. NEWMAN HALL communicates to the New York Independent an incident which recently occurred in one of the out-door meetings which he has been holding. A free-thinker who happened to be present rose and said he came to hear about temperance, but in his opinion the man who invented gas had done more to enlighten the world than all the parsons. Quite a disturbance ensued, but a friend of Mr. Hall at once begged for a fair hearing even for the objector; and then being himself called up he said: "Mr. Chairman—I'm for free thought and free speech; and yonder gentleman has a right to think and speak for himself as much as I have. (Loud cheers from the friends of the objector.) That gentleman says he considers the man who invented gas did more to enlighten the world than all the parsons. Well, if that is his opinion he has a right to hold it and maintain it. But, whatever our different opinions, there is a time coming to us all which we call death, when most men are somewhat serious, and like to get advice and comfort respecting the world they are going to. Now, when this season comes to our friend, I would recommend him to send for the gas-man." An immense sensation, with a tumult of applause, followed this sally, which, as Mr. Hall says, was better than a sermon, and not likely to be forgotten. He adds that the impudent boys of the neighborhood where this occurred still, when at a safe distance, shout to the man round the corners of the street, "Send for the gas-fitter."

HOW SOON WE LOSE OUR CHILDREN!

HOLD diligent converse with thy children; have them
Morning and evening round thee; love thou them,
And win their love in these rare, beauteous years;
For only while the short-lived dream of childhood Lasts are they thine—no longer! When youth comes Much passes through their thoughts which is not thou,
And much allures their hearts which thou hast not.
They gain the knowledge of an older world
Which fills their souls, and floats before them now
The Future. And the Present thus is lost.
Then, with his little travelling-pocket full
Of indispensables, the boy goes forth.
Weeping, thou watchest till he disappears,
And never after is he thine again!
He comes back home—he loves—he wins a maid—
He lives! They live, and others spring to life
From him; and now thou hast a man in him,
A human being, but no more a child!
Thy daughter, wedded, takes a frequent joy
In bringing thee her children to thy house!
Thou hast the mother, but the child no more.
Hold diligent converse with thy children; have them
Morning and evening round thee; love thou them,
And win their love in the rare, beauteous years!

CHRISTMAS FESTIVITIES.

Barnard Castle.—The members and friends met together at the house of Mr. J. Lee, on New Year's Eve, over a social cup of tea, when contributions in aid of the proposed new chapel were handed into the treasurer. A pleasant evening was spent. Previously the kind and able services rendered by Mr. W. S. Lee in connection with the choir were recognised by presenting him with a handsome tea and coffee service, in anticipation of his marriage, about to take place.—Bolton. Christmas and the new year have received their due celebration. On Christmas morning a party of singers visited the houses of the minister, school superintendents, and other members of the congregation. On Christmas Day the Lord's Supper was administered, after a short morning service, in Bank-street chapel; and in the evening the children's festival was held in the school-room, the Rev. J. Worthington in the chair. A printed address from the minister was circulated during the day. A children's party took place on the following evening, at Commission-street school. On New Year's Day, the annual gathering connected with the Bank-street Book Club was held, under the presidency of Mr. Ald. R. Harwood. Ever since its foundation, we believe thirty-five years ago, the anniversaries of the club have been regularly presided over by the late Mr. Robert Heywood. Occasion was taken, in the course of the proceedings to pay more than one tribute to Mr. Heywood's memory. Mr. Worthington also expressed the good wishes of the congregation to Mr. James Heywood (nephew to the chairman), who has resigned his position as a Sunday school teacher, and has entered upon a course of preparation for the ministry in Manchester New College, London. Last Saturday evening the annual meeting of the Commission-street congregation was held, Mr. P. G. Gass in the chair. All the meetings have been well attended, and conducted with much spirit. A beautiful tea-service has been provided for the Bank-street school, at a cost of nearly £30, and was used for the first time a few weeks ago, at a party over which Mr. Joseph Crooke presided.—Aberdeen. The annual soiree was held in the Albion Hall, on Monday evening, the 4th inst., about 200 being present. Rev. J. G. Slater presided. After tea, addresses were delivered by the Chairman, Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee; and Messrs. Adams, Tawse, and Robertson. The church choir and other friends sang several pieces of music during the evening; and a table containing various objects of interest afforded considerable pleasure and amusement.—Birmingham: Hurst-st. Mission. On Monday, 28th ult., the congregational tea and Christmas entertainment took place, when nearly 200 sat down to tea, the price of the tickets having been raised to prevent the room being uncomfortably crowded. The entertainment consisted of solo and choral singing, readings, &c., by the chapel choir,

Sunday school teachers and other friends. The Rev. B. Wright presided. On the following day the Sunday School children had their treat. On New Year's Eve the workers of the Institution—the Sunday school teachers, members of the choir, &c., with their friends, over 80 in all, brought these festivities to a close by a happy evening together. All these parties were, as usual, self-paying.—Longton. The Unitarians at this place held their Christmas tea party on the 29th, in the Mission-room. A goodly number of the members and friends were present.—Preston. The annual party for the school children and their parents was held on Wednesday, the 30th ult. Recitations and songs were given by scholars and teachers, and the prizes for attendance and good answering distributed, the evening's amusement ending with a Christmas tree.—Stand. On Saturday, Dec. 26th, the Sunday-schoolers' tea party was held. There was a very large attendance. After tea, Mr. Darbyshire, the superintendent, delivered an address; recitations, songs, readings, and the performance of a juvenile play following. On Friday, Jan. 1st, the teachers and adult scholars had their usual new year's gathering; and on Sunday, Jan. 3rd, the distribution of prizes to the most punctual scholars took place. The Rev. W. C. Squier presided on the occasion. Twelve scholars, each of whom had been present at the opening of the school at least an hundred times in the course of the previous year, received books. It was the first time that prizes for punctuality had been awarded, and the Chairman, on behalf of the Sunday-school Committee, expressed his hope that next year the number of recipients would be largely increased. Most of the scholars live at a considerable distance from the school, and many of them bring their meals, and spend the whole of Sunday at Stand, as to attend the chapel at night, as well as the school in the afternoon.—Accrington. The annual tea party took place on Christmas Day. There were upwards of 350 persons present, many of whom belonged to the other denominations in the town. The chapel had been most tastefully decorated by the young people. After tea, Mr. E. Coleman, of the Young Men's Literary Board, took the chair. The programme for the evening consisted of a number of glees, songs, duets, recitations, and two dramatic sketches.—On New Year's Eve, about forty of the teachers and elder scholars had a very pleasant recreation party.—Devonport. On Monday, Dec. 28, the congregation held their annual festivity. After tea, the chair was taken by the Rev. Charles Howe. There were present the Revs. Goodwyn Bamby, John Ellis, and E. Allen; George Buckton, Esq., Charles Bulmer, Esq., of Leeds, and other friends. This congregation continues to flourish; and it was announced on this occasion that the number of sittings now let in the church stood at 142, as against 118 last year. Many interesting addresses were delivered, by which it appeared that all the associated institutions are in a healthy state. The children's party, distribution of prizes and Christmas tree, took place on New Year's Day.—Stalybridge. The scholars' and teachers' party was held in the Mechanics' Institution on Christmas Day; upwards of 500 present. After tea Mr. Jackson occupied the chair, and the programme consisted of recitations, scenes, and tonic solo-fair songs. On New Year's Day, the annual congregational party was held in the Sunday school, which was nicely decorated. The Rev. Francis Revitt presided, and a very satisfactory report was presented by the retiring committee, showing that, although their efforts to raise funds for a chapel had been considerably impeded by bad trade, yet the subscription list already amounted to nearly £600, and that they intended shortly to canvass for further subscriptions among their Unitarian friends throughout the district. A stall was opened in one of the class rooms for the sale of clothing, &c., made up and presented by members of the congregation and a few friends, and the proceeds, amounting to £12, were handed to the building fund.—Todmorden. On Saturday nearly 300 scholars of the Unitarian Sunday school congregated at Sobriety Hall for the purpose of enjoying their usual festivity. After tea, the room was arranged for more quiet entertainment in the way of recitations, dialogues, songs, glees, &c. A presentation was made to Mr. W. E. Thornley, the respected superintendent of the Sunday school, who will shortly remove to another sphere of action. Mr. Thomas Lee read the address (on vellum) which was to be given to Mr. Thornley with other articles. The present was a valuable inkstand, in walnutwood, in the centre of which was a neat bronze figure; on each side of the figure was a magnificent cut-glass ink-bottle with gilded lids and rims. In the front of the figure was a silver plate, with the following inscription: "Presented to Mr. W. E. Thornley, by the teachers and scholars of the Unitarian Sunday school, Todmorden, as a mark of respect. December 26th, 1868." Mr. John Sutcliffe made the presentation. The Rev. L. Taplin also gave testimony to the zeal with which Mr. Thornley had laboured, and to his rare management. Addresses were given on the subject by Messrs. Jas. Whittaker, of Glasgow (formerly a teacher in the school); Jas. Crabtree, Z. Astin, and Jno. Law.—Middlesbrough. An interesting meeting of Sunday school teachers took place on Tuesday evening last. The Rev. W. Elliott and teachers from the Stockton Sunday school were present by invitation. After tea a paper was read by Mr. Weatherley, superintendent, on "Some qualifications to be desired in a Sunday school teacher." On Wednesday evening the children gave their annual entertainment; after tea their parents and friends assembled in goodly numbers, and there was a Christmas tree.—Portsmouth: St. Thomas-street. An interesting meeting was held on the 5th instant to take leave of Mr. O. Batchelor, who is going to London to study for the ministry.—Strangeways. On Wednesday evening, December 30th, the scholars' party was held, when the Rev. Brooke Herford presided, and the scholars recited their pieces. On Wednesday evening, January 6th, a teachers' and old scholars' party took place, Mr. Herford again presiding. There was a large attendance, and among those present were Messrs. John Armstrong, Edward Teggins, Harry Rawson, G. J. Taylor, William Thorner, William Moss, Charles Ashley, Robert Lowes, Edwin Winsor, H. Coffey, and a letter was read from Mr. Trippear. Addresses were delivered by the Chairman, Messrs. Rawson, Teggins, Taylor, Ashley, Coffey, and Lowes. In the course of the remarks made during the evening, the names of the late John Harland and John Wilson were affectionately alluded to as having rendered good service as teachers in the school in Dawson's Croft, and the name of Dr. Beard was very warmly applauded.—Leeds. At Mill Hill all the children were entertained at a Christmas tea party on December 28th, in the Congregational Hall, and the parents of the scholars were also invited, and heartily welcomed by the ladies presiding. Altogether about 350 took tea, and afterwards a selection of music was given, interspersed with readings and recitations, and two or three Christmas hymns were sung by the children. Joseph Lupton, Esq., was in the chair.

INTELLIGENCE.

HALIFAX: WELCOME TO THE REV. T. H. SMITH.—On Thursday evening, the 31st ult., the annual congregational tea meeting was held, the chair being occupied by James Stansfeld, Esq., the eldest trustee. The Sunday-school report was read by Mr. Thomas Wadsworth, which showed an improved average attendance, and a fair share of work during the year. The school business being disposed of, the chairman drew attention to the changes which had taken place since the last meeting, and particularly the acceptance of the pastorate by the Rev. T. H. Smith. A resolution of hearty welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Smith was then proposed by Mr. Morton and Mr. Whitehead. The Rev. T. H. Smith, in thanking the congregation for their words of kindness, appreciation, and welcome, said he came amongst them as a friend, a helper of their organisations, and hoped he would be regarded as such on all occasions. He could not pretend to give any idea of the importance and responsibility which he felt to belong to the position he was taking. Whether he would be able to fill that position with success depended largely upon the assistance they should give him. He desired to have, as no doubt they also wished him to have, the most perfect freedom of thought and utterance. He dwelt principally on the relative position and duties of minister and people, alluding also to the position of Unitarian Christianity in the country, and to some of the errors of the present day. The Revs. L. Taplin, of Todmorden; R. Pilcher, of Bradford; Joseph Lupton, Esq., of Leeds; and Rev. J. Ellis, of Elland, also addressed the meeting.

HULL.—On Sunday, December 20th, a new organ, built by Mr. E. Wadsworth, of Manchester, for this chapel, was "opened," and the morning and evening services, in consequence, were attended by very large congregations. Sermons were preached on the occasion by the Rev. James C. Street, of Newcastle. The organ, at which Mr. Hunt presided, has three rows of keys, 23 stops, and two octaves and a half of pedals, with the addition of composition pedals. One thing worthy of mention with respect to the instrument is that it is principally composed of solo stops, and in this it differs in construction from most others of its class. Collections were made at the close of each of the services in aid of the fund for defraying the cost of the organ.

TROWBRIDGE: CONIGRE CHAPEL.—The annual watch-night service, to commemorate the departure of the old year and the coming of the new, was observed, as is customary, at this place of worship on Thursday, December 31st. There was a large congregation. Several members of the church joined in prayer, and suitable hymns were sung; after which, the minister preached from Deut. ii. 12, on "A Christian's review of God's mercies from the beginning of the year to the end of the year." At the close of the sermon, a few minutes before twelve, the whole congregation knelt down in silence for secret prayer until the striking of the clock announced that the old year had passed away and the new year had commenced. After the service was concluded, and mutual congratulations and hearty expressions of good wishes, the people returned to their homes evidently deeply impressed by the solemnities of the occasion.

OWING TO the Ravages of the Vine Disease,
the Production, and consequently the Importation into this country of WINE from the island of MADIRA, for a number of years all but completely ceased. The ground formerly devoted to the Vine plant was turned into Sugar Plantations. Sugar being a less precarious crop, and sooner available for the market than Wine.
Since the disappearance of the disease, the Culture of the VINE has again attracted attention, and for a few years past the quantity of WINE made has increased. Thinking there might be a trade done if a good WINE, at a moderate price, were offered, we have been at considerable pains to OBTAIN SAMPLES FROM THE ISLAND, and have selected one which we can offer at
12s. PER DOZEN.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

In the course of an address, delivered the other night, Dr. Cumming told the story of what happened to the Scotch Church in Rome. The Anglicans had a church there, but it was outside the city walls. The Scotch, however, established a church within the city walls, a minister was appointed and everything went on well—that is without material opposition. But the instant the last retiring footsteps of the French battalions were heard, a message was sent from head-quarters intimating to the poor Scotch minister that he must pack up his traps and be off within twelve hours. A respectful request was sent to the authorities to ascertain the reason of this unexpected step, and the reply was that there was no reason. The Duke of Argyll, a member of the Scotch Church, happened to be in Rome at the time, and his good offices were secured. His grace went to the authorities and ably represented the case, but the only answer he could obtain was non possumus, which, in more enlightened language, means "We can't afford it." They had now a church outside the walls in a granary over a pig-stye, and were doing better than when they lived in the sunshine of success.

On Friday last, at the fifth of the meetings promoted by the Evangelical Alliance, Sir Francis Lyceet presiding, among the subjects for special prayer one was, "for the conversion of Atheists, Deists, and Unitarians." This, we will take for granted, was kindly meant; but what would our orthodox friends say, if at one of our gatherings prayers were requested "for the conversion of Atheists, Deists, and Trinitarians who help to make them."

In the Mackonochie case the question of the legality of the "vestments" introduced by the Ritualists in the Communion service was not raised, but it is stated that a new action is to be commenced forthwith in order to obtain a decision respecting it.

At All Saints', Lambeth, the judgment of the Privy Council as yet seems to have had but little effect in abating the observances which the Ritualists conceive to be of such religious importance. On Sunday last, at the administration of the sacrament, there was a procession of priests, deacons, acolytes, ministrants, and choristers, numbering altogether 31, carrying banners, crosses, &c., and wearing vestments of divers colours; and though Dr. Lee did not actually lift up the paten, he bowed down so as to bring his head below it, and he elevated the chalice above his head while the congregation knelt, and on replacing it upon the communion-table he bent very low before it.

A petition is being signed in the county of Cork in favour of applying the Irish ecclesiastical revenues to the payment of poor rates. "It would be a return," say the petitioners, "to a mode in which, at a period preceding the Reformation, the property of the Church was partially expended, and it would afford great and much-needed relief to the overburdened ratepayers."

The Liberator reports more burial scandals:

"In the first case, a son of Mr. Spendlove, of Hanley, had died. Mr. Spendlove, being a Baptist, had not had his child 'baptized.' The curate, therefore, refused to allow the bell to be tolled, and also refused to officiate. A service was read and an address given by the Rev. J. Clarke, Congregational Minister of Chesterfield, in the highway, and the body was then carried in silence to the grave. The second case is that of a Wesleyan who had lost his son. Here the curate declined to officiate, because he had been 'led to believe that your children have not been baptized in our Church,' and he objected 'to walk at the head of the procession with a member of any other denomination in my own parish.' The Rev. W. S. Dewstoe, Wesleyan Minister, writes of this curate a letter:—'They show clearly what some clergymen of the Established Church would do even in these days, if they dared. And they afford a striking illustration of the petty annoyances to which Nonconformist families are still exposed in places where there is no burial-ground but that connected with the parish church.'"

The Weekly Review is of opinion that the two great branches of the Presbyterian Church in the United States may probably be united formally during the present year, or at latest next year, and will constitute one of the most numerous and powerful Churches—all things taken into consideration—in the world. If the churches in this country are not yet so ripe for union as those on the other side of Atlantic, it is a question only of a few years.

The Irish Central Defence Association have resolved on organising a new and extensive plan of deputation, "to complete the enlightenment of the English and Scotch people on the momentous question now pending." They call for a new series of public meetings, and declare their opinion that "any suggestion taking for granted the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church in Ireland cannot be looked upon in any other light than as sanctioning the proceedings of the enemies of Protestantism." This looks as if we were threatened with a fresh outbreak of Murphyism, from which we can but earnestly pray to be delivered.

On Sunday, the rector of Morpeth, a brother of Lord Grey, spoke of the recent decision of the Privy Council as an "unrighteous judgment," and distinctly declared his intention of preaching the doctrine of the Real Presence "more strongly than ever;" whereupon there was a cry of "Treason, treason," and a number of persons left the church.

A meeting of the Ritualist party, at which about 350 were present, was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, London, on Tuesday, to consider what course should be taken in consequence of the St. Alban's judgment. Archdeacon Denison presided, and had around him, among others that have made their names known in connection with the movement, Dr. F. G. Lee, Dr. Littledale, Lord Eliot, M.P.; Revs. W. J. E. Bennett, A. Le Geyt, J. E. Vaux, W. N. Mayow, T. W. Perry, and A. H. Mackonochie; the Hon. C. L. Wood, and Mr. C. Hope Johnstone. A long memorial, drawn up by the committee appointed at a previous meeting, was agreed to, and it was decided that it should be forwarded to the Bishops and to the Convocations of Canterbury and York. Resolutions were passed affirming that the meeting did "not recognise the existing Court of Final Appeal as a Court competent to declare the law of the Church of England upon either doctrine or ceremonial," and calling in question the late decree as at variance with a fundamental principle of that Church; that action upon the recent decision should be left to the discretion of the clergy; and that they should be careful to teach the doctrines sought to be impugned by the prosecution. While the majority of the meeting acknowledged "the duty of submitting, under protest, to the law of the land, upon that law being put in force," the Rev. W. J. E. Bennett moved as an amendment, and the Rev. A. Le Geyt seconded it, "that this meeting is unable to reconcile submission to the recent decree, the paramount and primary duty being obedience to the Church," and a few, of whom Mr. Mackonochie was one, seem to have urged that the time has come for a severance of the connection between Church and State. We can only say that we have long been of the same opinion.

A second conference was held yesterday of the more extreme men of the party, to which reporters were not admitted. It is stated that several clergymen present determined to continue the use of lights, in defiance of the judgment of the Privy Council—"at all events until they receive a monition from a spiritual authority." We are further told that "it was generally admitted" that the "High Church party must, as a body, secede," in the event of the Court of Final Appeal declaring, in the case of Mr. Bennett, that the doctrine of the Real Presence is opposed to the teaching of the Church of England:—Nous verrons.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

Before leaving New Zealand for this country (where he safely arrived last week), Bishop Selwyn received an affectionate address from the General Synod, in which what he had done in the former scene of his labours was thus referred to:

"The Colonial Church in this country has been organised by you upon a system of Synodical action and voluntary compact, which secures to every Churchman who accepted it the enjoyment of true Christian liberty and the exercise of all Christian privileges. Lastly, it is to you, in the good providence of God, that the Melanesian mission owes its existence, and such measure of success as it has pleased God hitherto to grant to it. Your faith and courage first carried the Gospel into those wild islands, and your wise forethought devised a method of carrying on the work, which experience has already shown to be well adapted to the peculiar circumstances of that mission. And now we think, my lord, how twenty-seven years have passed today since you received the episcopal office—years marked by extraordinary events in the history of our country and Church—an episcopate marked in an extraordinary degree by your work of faith and labour of love, and patience of hope. We humbly believe that by your wide and varied experience of many forms of human life, by bringing you into contact with men in every stage of barbarism and civilisation, or on lonely journeys in the solitude of the New Zealand forest, and on the waves of the West Pacific, God's Holy Spirit has been training you for an even greater work than any that you have hitherto accomplished. . . . We know full well that you never cease to pray and labour for us, and you need no assurance from us that we will ever remember and pray for you. How can we ever forget you? Every spot in New Zealand is identified with you. Each hill and valley, each river and bay, and headland is full of memories of you; the busy town, the lonely settler's hut, the countless islands of the sea, all speak to us of you. Whether your days be few or many, we, as long as we live, will ever hold you deep in our inmost hearts."

The Pall Mall says:

"The Unità Cattolica has come out with a New Year's number which would be touching were it not so extremely absurd. This year, it holds, will see the end of all trouble, not in the way our own Seraphic Doctor [Dr. Cumming] loves to frighten hysterical women with—viz., through thunders, earthquakes, and dissolutions of things generally—but by the return of the whole world under the dominion of St. Peter's successor. This year, it says, is to be the year of salvation and joy, the year of the triumph of truth, the year of the Œcumenical Council. As the reverend fathers at the close of the Council of Trent greeted Pius IV., so the Unità Cattolica greets Pius IX. No more schisms, no more A Catholics. Scornfully it compares the meddlings and muddlings of diplomacy, and its attempts to patch up here, to persuade there, frightening, coaxing, bullying, lying, and yet never succeeding, with the grand and majestic simplicity of the Papal power, which by affixing a bull to the gate of St. Peter calls the bishops from all the ends of the world around his Holiness the Pontiff, and they all hasten to obey, and with awe and reverence to deliberate under his supreme auspices on the highest interests of humanity, or, which is the same thing, the Church. The Unità speaks altogether as if the days of Gregory III. and Innocent III. were at our door again. We should like to send it the Morning Advertiser, which from this selfsame year expects the fall and complete overthrow of the 'Scarlet Lady.' Which is right? And will our generation see the beginning of the end?"

While rejoicing over the acquittal of Ewald, the Pall Mall says:

"To the aged Professor we trust the little fright will have given a lesson, strong enough perhaps to wake him out of the strange Quixotism into which, to the distress of all his friends, he seems to have worked himself against the 'Guelphs,' that same Hanoverian dynasty which made him (as he loves constantly to remind his readers) a 'martyr' in early life. With all his crotchets, with all his fanatical intolerance of other people's learning and opinions, and with those other unfortunate shortcomings which have by this time estranged all but a very few faithful colleagues and disciples from him, Ewald is yet one of the very brightest intellects in Europe; and his fame is not a thing he should be allowed wantonly to trifle with in the evening of his life."

In a pamphlet, entitled "Subjects for thought concerning the Future of the Church in Ireland," Archdeacon Stopford, of Meath, considers it idle to think of evading the decision made in the recent election by affecting to ignore it; "let us rather look at it like men, and meet it with dignity and earnestness." "Is it desirable," he asks, "that Mr. Gladstone should introduce a bill so carefully and liberally drawn that we might accept it in this session, with such amendments as we can reasonably claim? Or is it desirable that his measures should be so ill-drawn as to give grounds for a party fight, not on principles, but on details, extending, perhaps, far beyond this session? In my opinion it would be wise for us to do all that may be in our power to obtain the former alternative." The Archdeacon proposed to the Church Commission internal reform five years ago, but that is no longer the question. Prominent among the principles he lays down is that of "absolute freedom," in the event of disestablishment, "to make our own future arrangements unfettered by the State." For this purpose he would refrain from any discussion "of what should afterwards be settled by ourselves alone." The number of bishops and clergy required should be left, he thinks, entirely to the Church. "We should be careful not to suggest that Parliament should give us any powers for the government and discipline of the Church in future, and we should strenuously resist any such suggestions if made." That, he believes, would put the Church in danger of being afterwards subjected to the tyranny of a majority of the House of Commons in place of its present constitutional relation to the Crown.

In a similar strain the Hon. and Rev. W. C.

Plunket warns his brethren of the "dangers of silence" in reference to this question. He has always protested against Mr. Gladstone's policy, but the time has come, he thinks, when Irish Churchmen must look their position in the face with manliness and dignity. He is convinced that the majority of those having a voice in the preparation of the Government measure are not influenced by a purely destructive motive. "Such persons would be glad to learn, even indirectly, in what way a measure could be framed which, while involving the principle of disestablishment, to which they are pledged, might at the same time inflict as little injury on the Church as the circumstances of the case would permit." If the State should determine to cast off the Irish Church, "let there not remain," he adds, "a shred of State connection to give a shadow of excuse to those who would describe it as an alien Church. Let us claim for ourselves the right to be called the Reformed Episcopal Church of Ireland, in communion with, but not a mere branch or dependency of, the sister Church of England." Mr. Plunket urges Irish Churchmen to remember the "grand traditional associations" of St. Patrick, St. Brigid, and St. Columbkille, and refuse to "denationalise themselves in the eyes of the people by accepting the position of a mere appanage of the English Crown."

On the Privy Council judgment, "A Protestant" writes thus strongly to the Daily News:—

"Is conscience to be nothing and law everything for the future with Church Christians? The right of private judgment made Protestantism. It is its very breath and life. Without it what right has Protestantism to plead for its very existence? Is this right to be ignored, strangled by clerical red tape? The whole church, priests, and congregations, teachers, and taught, are ordered by the Privy Council to do or see done that which will prevent the service being of spiritual benefit to them. No church-goer henceforward is to pray in peace, unworried by some mummery he hates. No preacher, High or Low, is to perform the service in the way he thinks right, and most conducive to his flock's eternal welfare. All are to be tied to ceremonies they think improper. All are to be dressed in petticoats of a cut or colour they hold wrong. The recent judgment is an edged tool, a proverbially ugly instrument to handle, and all our orthodox sects will cut their fingers using it. The ritualist is to go without his candles and his pantomime. The low churchman, as his opponent is chuckling to think, is to pose himself in a way that, if he were not a saint, would make him wrathful. The congregations are equally to be disgusted with something they do not like—something that will make them uncomfortable enough to forget God, and their praises and prayers to Him, as much as distasteful ceremonies can. It strikes one as curious that all this can be clear to all, and yet that we hear nothing talked about but albs, and rochetts, and hoods, and other clerical rubbish, that have no more to do with Christianity than Popes and beads. When will the spirit of the early church again possess men to give up all and follow righteousness? Will the great heart of the first reformers, the men who made our church, never beat again in their law-ridden descendants? If there be soul enough in nineteenth century churchmen for another and a truer Reformation—one not a polite compromise of conflicting principles—surely the fetters rivetted on all church parties by the Privy Council ought now to ensure one."

The following letter in Punch so fully bears out the sentiments we expressed last week on that of Dr. Pusey concerning the St. Alban's judgment that we give it entire:

"Sir,—I don't often write to you, but having last week sent a letter to the Times, it occurs to me that the next best step to be taken is a communication on the same subject to you. The judgment, sir, of the Privy Council is but an exposition of various Acts of Parliament, showing what is the law on this matter of rites and ceremonies in the Church of England. It is not binding upon the consciences of Churchmen. It does not prevent them from believing whatever they choose to believe. Therefore they can hold all Roman doctrine, even the supremacy of the Pope in a certain sense, as long as they do not outwardly demonstrate their inward convictions. This is what I mean by 'The loss of modes of outward expression of belief only drives pious souls more inward, and the inward devotion shines the more through.' Since writing the above I have been led to consider the full import and bearing of my argument, and I discover in it a new moral code for the benefit of society at large. I have been accused of too great liberality towards schismatics, heretics, and Dissenters by my own party, and may again incur its displeasure by stating boldly, that I deeply sympathise with all those unhappy criminals hung or unhung, and with those no less unfortunate sufferers by civil actions, who have been unable to evade the legal penalties which they have severally incurred. This is a legitimate conclusion from my own premises, and from it I do not shrink. What, sir, is any judgment, criminal or civil, but 'an exposition of an act or acts of Parliament?' and, as such, not binding upon the conscience of Englishmen. The felon, unfortunately for him, being in the dock, and guarded by police, cannot walk out and snap his fingers at Judge and Jury, as can an Anglican clergyman at Lord Cairns, the Archbishop of York, and all the Privy Council. Now, sir, I will conclude; and in conclusion will say thus to all Ritualists:—No matter in what precise terms our belief is condemned; no matter that Bishops and Archbishops equally condemn all our distinctive tenets; no matter that the spirit and the tone of the entire English Communion is against us, we can always meet a judgment as we should a temptation, and find a way to escape. Words may mean anything, everything, or nothing. Actions shall be valuable or worthless. But, with the exception of a few absurdly straightforward and honest men who are no longer with us, we have shuffled and shirked from the commencement, and, please Heaven, we will shuffle and shirk to the end. And, dear sir, who shall prepare the net out of which we Ritualistic eels will not wriggle?—I am, sir, yours,

P.S.—In effect, I would say, with old Mr. Weiler, 'Why wasn't there an alleyby?' I mean (and I don't often say what I do mean) couldn't some clever lawyer, like Lewis and Lewis, find out that the Judicial Committee had no right to sit unless the Bishop of London (or some dignitary) was on the bench all the time? Then the proceedings would have to be commenced de novo."

On the same subject the Telegraph remarks that while some of the Ritualistic clergy have declared that they will respect the law, others with equal honesty admit that they must either obey it or leave the Church, and they prefer to depart. One can honour both those classes, though one may doubt the wisdom of the men who would quit the Church without making an effort to change its decrees. But an offence alike against honour and against law is committed by the ecclesiastics who declare in one and the same breath that they will neither surrender their office as Anglican clergymen, nor obey the dictates of the legal courts. It cannot be said that the Church does not recognise the authority of the Judicial Committee. The Church as established by law—that is, the Church as a temporal institution—is the creation of Parliament, and the Parliament which secured the temporalities of the Church also instituted the Judicial Committee. It is utterly illogical to recognise the binding forces of Articles and formularies which rest on Act of Parliament, and yet to dispute the authority of a tribunal which has precisely the same origin. Nor even on their own grounds can the Ritualists deny the authority of the Judicial Committee. To it they appealed in the Gorham case; to it they appealed in the case of Essays and Reviews, and in the case of Dr. Colenso; and to it, through Mr. Mackonochie, they appealed in the present instance.

The same paper points out that the true moral of the judgment in his case is very different from what either set of extreme partisans has deduced. The law and the practice of the Church are in a state of total anarchy. According to this latest decision, the clergy must, down to the minutest particular, conform to an elaborate series of laws which conflict with the present practice of the Church. This grave fact furnishes one more proof of the fact that our ecclesiastical law and practice stand in urgent need of reform and readjustment. When those laws were first placed on the statute book, they were in accordance with the dictate of the English people; and, if they should be revised, the result must conform to the same standard. If the Prayer Book be altered in any way, the grave task must be accomplished in consultation with the habits, the feelings, and the convictions which are common to the English people at the present day.

In the course of a sermon at Atherstone, the Rev. E. Husband, referring to the same matter, spoke out thus:

"Is it the Protestant or the Catholic faith in which with confidence you have placed your trust? If the former, then no doubt the words of a Presbyterian lord carry great weight with them, and the vagaries of a purely secular and worldly court of law demand immediate obedience on your part; but if the Catholic faith be your belief, then the whole question becomes changed, and resolves itself into this alternative, 'Ye cannot serve God and mammon.' Catholics ignore the right of a worldly legislature to interfere in matters purely spiritual, and relating to the rights of the Church of God; much more the absurd anomaly which is presented to us in a Presbyterian presuming to dictate to Catholics what the ritual of that divinely instituted Church should be, to which he in no wise belongs. Our leaders in the great movement, with the assistance of Almighty God, are consulting together what our future action must be at this critical moment. As an individual priest I most earnestly and fervently hope that the great army of Catholics throughout our land, as a body, will decide to ignore the judgment altogether, at all costs leaving the results in the hands of the All-wise God. And if by this act it happens, as many anticipate, that we shall be driven from the Church of England as an Establishment, God will then build up for us a Free Catholic Church, exempt from the tyranny of State interference, and endowed with the liberty which Christ's pure religion affords, to worship Him in the way in which our saintly forefathers loved to worship 'in the brave days of old.'"

REVIEW.

The Church's Creed or the Crown's Creed? By the Rev. E. S. Ffoulkes.

WHEN Dr. Manning took the road to Rome, one of the friends who followed him and quitted the English Church was the author of this pamphlet. Not seldom since the Archbishop, we should think, must have felt tempted to exclaim, "Would that he had stayed where he was!" Little more than a year ago, he published a work entitled "Christendom's Divisions, being a Philosophical Sketch of the Divisions of the Christian Family in East and West," which has been recently interdicted by the Congregation of the Index at the Vatican, and there can be little doubt that the present publication will receive like honour.

The pamphlet is certainly a remarkable one, and it is said to have been twice out of print in the first week after its appearance. The subject to which it principally relates is one, as our readers have been made aware, that is exciting a good deal of interest both here and in America. The "Church's Creed" is the Nicene without the "Filioque," the "Crown's Creed" the same, with the Spanish addition. Mr. Ffoulkes comes in such a questioning, if not questionable, shape as cannot but be very troublesome to those with whom he has cast in his lot. He is evidently one who, in spite of Pope and prelate, will keep his eyes open, and has not yet been fully taught the convenient art of winking, in which several of the Madonnas are so proficient. He has been led to examine, with a freedom of which few Roman Catholics would dare to be guilty, into the vast pretensions of the ecclesiastical system to which he belongs, and the conclusion which he comes to is that many of these are based on a foundation of notorious and acknowledged forgeries. Looking at the history of his Church, he finds four special grounds of offence:—The tampering with the Nicene Creed; the acceptance and continued use of the false Decretals; the treatment of the Eastern Church; and the wicked delays in reforming the Western Church by fair means, "till Providence permitted it should be done by foul." The first business of an Œcumenical Council, he contends, ought to be a humble and contrite admission of these offences, and the most hopeful work in which it could engage would be to seek to bring back the Church to a more primitive and comprehensive standard of doctrine. What he would like to see would be "plain Christians traversing the world with no other passport to the sacraments of the Church in all lands but the Nicene Creed." For a Roman Catholic, this certainly argues great boldness, and where Mr. Ffoulkes can expect to go to, if left to the tender mercies of his infallible Head, we can only conjecture. We should guess it would be to a warm place among heretics.

He thus distinctly avows his belief, which is in direct contradiction to Romish doctrine, that there may be saving virtue in the ordinances of other Churches besides his own:

"If I had to die for it, I could not possibly subscribe to the idea that the Sacraments to which I am admitted week after week in the Roman communion—Confession and the Holy Eucharist, for instance—confer any graces, any privileges, essentially different from what I used to derive from those same Sacraments, frequented with the same dispositions, in the Church of England. On the contrary, I go so far as to say that, comparing one with another strictly, some of the most edifying communions that I can remember in all my life were made in the Church of England, and administered to me by some that have since submitted to be ordained in the Church of Rome; a ceremony, therefore, which, except as qualifying them to undertake duty there, I must consider superfluous. Assuredly, so far as the registers of my own spiritual life carry me, I have not been able to discover any greater preservatives from sin, any greater incentives to holiness, in any that I have received since: though in saying this I am far from intending any derogation to the latter."

But not content with basing his belief on his own personal experience, Mr. Ffoulkes appeals to Archbishop Manning himself as a witness in its favour, and says:

"There is no person in his sober senses who could affirm that you, for instance, began to be a devout, earnest, intelligent follower of Christ, an admirable master of the inner and the hidden life, a glorious example of self-sacrifice, a deep expounder of revealed mysteries and Gospel truths, when you embraced the Roman communion; or that all those graces which you exhibited previously in the sight of men could be deduced from the one rite which you received unconsciously as a child, counteracted by all the bad and unwholesome food on which, according to this hypothesis, you must have lived ever afterwards. In the same way, there is no ordinary person in his sober senses who could affect to discover any fundamental change for the better in you, morally or religiously, now from what you were then. There are some, on the contrary, to my knowledge, of your existing flock who profess that they have not half the liking for the sermons which they hear you deliver as Archbishop of Westminster that they have for the dear old volumes which you published as Archdeacon of Chichester, as fresh and full of fragrance to their instincts as ever."

Considering, also, the practical religious life of the two communions, which he takes to be the true test of the grace of the Sacraments, the writer thus lets us into his feelings, when, after having seen something of the Roman Catholics, to whom he had gone over, he came to ask himself the question, "Are these, then, the only true Christians that you have ever known in life?"

"I can scarce describe the recoil that it occasioned in me! Why, my own father and mother would compare with the best of them in all the virtues ordinarily possessed by Christians living in the world and discharging their duties conscientiously towards God and their neighbours, in, through, and for Christ. 'All for Jesus' was as much their motto as it could be of any parents in Christendom: and well indeed would it be for all Roman Catholic children if they were blessed with no worse fathers and mothers than mine. And I have, or have had relatives and friends in numbers, members of the Church of England, whose homes I will undertake to say, are to all intents and purposes as thoroughly Christian as any to be found elsewhere: and it would be sheer affectation or hypocrisy in me were I to pretend the contrary: or else to claim for my own friends and relatives any peculiar excellence distinguishing them from the average specimens of the Anglican body."

And the conclusion which he comes to is this —

"The conviction impressed upon me by what I have heard and seen at home and abroad is that English Christianity—by which I mean that of members of the Church of England in general; I cannot speak from experience of any other—is as good and genuine, and for ordinary purposes as beneficial, as what is found in other nations—France, Spain, and Italy, for instance—so that either it is produced, fed, and nourished by all the Sacraments, as theirs is, or else, produced, fed, and nourished by a single Sacrament, it penetrates society and forms character to the same extent as that which has the support of all the Sacraments, and is no less efficacious for good in most other respects."

Just and true as all this may be, of course it is very heretical, and directly at variance with the "true Catholic faith, out of which," according to the Tridentine decree, "none can be saved." Then, as to the carelessness with which Anglican clergymen in the administration of the Sacraments have been charged, Mr. Ffoulkes thus unsparingly makes use of the tu quoque retort:—

"I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that it followed naturally from their low views of them, and that their low views of them were precipitated by the audacity that centuries ago was not afraid to say of the Eucharist, 'Sacerdos creat Deum;' of penance, 'Deus remittit culpam: Papa vero culpam et penam;' and the like. But, taking our own views of the Blessed Eucharist into account, is there or has there been any tale of irreverence towards it amongst Anglicans, comparable for horrors with the history of poisoned chalices and poisoned Hosts amongst ourselves formerly, the extent of which is made patent to this day by the special precautions taken whenever the Pope celebrates mass most solemnly, that no such harm may befall him."

With his insight into the present influence of Catholicism in Spain and the low moral condition of the priesthood, and with his views of the mischief wrought by the "governmental policy" of the Popes "since they became princes as well as Bishops"—seeing, as he does, that "it is their conduct more than anything else, for the last thousand years, in governing the Church, which has divided the Church"—how Mr. Ffoulkes can still remain in the Romish communion is a mystery to us, but we feel almost sure that his ecclesiastical superiors would be glad if they could place him in an Index Expurgatorius as easily as they can his books.

DOCTOR POSITIVUS.

In our "American Notes," last week, we briefly referred to a creed which had been put forth by the Positivists of New York. We take the following remarks upon it from a clever article in the last number of the Saturday Review:—

"The First Positivist Society of New York, Box No. 6,055, N.Y. Post Office,' have addressed themselves urbi et orbi, or rather to the Kosmos generally, with a creed in full. And very full indeed it is. It settles, on principles firm as Tenerife or Atlas, these little matters—'a Scientific Religion; the Dynamic Theory of the Universe; Time and Space Explained; Force and Its Changes to account for all Phenomena; and a New System of Morals.' Twelve columns of the New York World are, after all, a narrow canvas on which to display this gigantic procession of new truths. Considering that the advocate of the human race, Anacharsis Clootz, confined himself and his sublime mission to the scanty purpose of redressing social and political disorders, the regenerators of humanity have been moderate in compressing into forty articles and an appendix the credenda of the new gospel, which, as their prophets say, 'taken together, cover the whole of human activity, thought, and emotion, and place life, progress, and reform upon a solid basis.' Forty Stripes, save one, is the burden laid upon our shoulders by a bigoted State Church, but the XXXIX Articles themselves are but tow and packthread to the forty stern decrees which have been falminted to the world from Box No. 6,055. Dr. Positivus at New York cannot be said to be brief, but he is emphatic; and all things considered, seeing that he has only to prove that every religion which ever has existed is sheer nonsense, every system of morals hitherto taught and practised a mere illusion and snare, and every philosophy nothing better than fumbling and stumbling in the dark, forty articles which not only destroy all that the world has ever believed in and held sacred, but also reveal all truth, and settle every doubt and difficulty which ever has been or can be, form, we repeat, a very brief and portable manual.

Druit of course goes before adificat, and before the New York Positivists build up their new world they must get rid of the old one. And a very clean sweep, indeed, they make of it; the besom of destruction is plied by a strong and willing hand. We prefer to let the iconoclasts enumerate the idols which they have shattered:—"It is no longer possible for an honest inquirer to accept as true any of the prevalent religions. . . . The great need of our age is a thorough and entire change of all human thoughts, feelings, hopes, and interests, from the ancient theological subjective and illusory suppositions of Hebrew and Christian mythology to the modern, objective, practical, and positive conclusions, provisions, and rewards of science." A pleonastic enumeration of the effete human hopes and interests which are got rid of is given, and we are asked with a grim and sarcastic air of triumph to attend to the results of 'the inevitable creed of the new Faith. It sweeps at once into the limbo of vacuity all notions and hopes that the mass of our race from its earliest history has hitherto rested upon as they passed from the womb to the grave. We find ourselves in a new world.' Very new, indeed, and without much to fill it; for it is asked, 'Where under this view are 'creation,' 'end of the world,' 'personal gods,' or 'God,' 'the immortal spirit' or 'soul' of man, the 'heaven,' 'hell,' 'devil,' 'sin,' repentance, 'resurrection' . . . and the 'feelings' that have led and held man upward? All these vanish.' M. Auguste Comte surveys the world despoiled of 'all human thoughts, feelings, hopes, and interests.' He has blotted out from the firmament 'all notions and hopes' which have hitherto lighted the path of humanity, and which as a fact, whether true or false, have made man to be what man is, and he stands in a universe ghastly as the lunar sphere, in which there is neither God nor spirit. Doctor Positivus assuring us that immortality, any notion of Deity, any recognition of the soul, or any conception of sin, repentance, and judgment to come, are consigned for ever to the limbo of vacuity, we run to the New York Post-office, Box No. 6,055, to discover what this very New World is peopled with and does consist of. At first the inquiry seemed rather superfluous; for the New York Positivists boast that the great end at which they have arrived is simply the Buddhist Nirvana, only 'a Nirvana more complete and real.' But there is a real distinction between the Buddhist and the Positivist absorption. It has been doubted whether the Buddhist Nirvana is absolute nihilism; at any rate the New York reformers, whether correctly or not, treat the oriental absorption as passing into the infinite and the eternal, while to themselves there is no infinite and no eternal; and with this Positivist nihilism, if we understand it, which we have a shrewd suspicion that we do not, there is no anything except that everything which is nought, and that transcendental nought which is everything. But we shall be told that with the Positivist there is something, though we are by no means certain that 'thing' is an orthodox word in the new Faith.

This thing is Force: Force is the sole reality. 'The real secret of life and growth is the play of force, called Osmosis, i.e., filtration.' This is the new Gospel; and we are thankful to get it in its most condensed and elementary form. All religious hopes and fears, human interests and duties, being got rid of, we stand face to face with the one solid incontrovertible truth, majestic in its simplicity and power—'Osmosis, i.e., filtration.' Osmosis, then, is the new Gospel; or, rather, everything is Osmosis. We are Osmosis. God, if there be a God—which there is not—man, only he is an aggregate of cells—the human will, but this is only a succession of cellular vibrations—are all Osmosis. This brave overhanging firmament, this majestic roof, fretted with golden fires—this piece of work noble in reason, infinite in faculties, in form and moving express and admirable, in action angelic, in apprehension godlike, this beauty of the world, this paragon of animals, this quintessence and microcosm—this Man is only Osmosis. Immortality, the life that is to be, all hopes, all passions, all desires, fears, aspirations, all duty, all sensation, reflection, memory, and will, all that ever has been, is, and is to be, things material and spiritual, human and divine, are Osmosis. So all with one voice, about the space of two hours, cried, Great is Osmosis of the Positivists.

Archimedes could have moved the world had he been sure of his standpoint, as newspaper writers say, of his leverage; and the Positivists, as they are all for the religion of science, must accept this among other dynamical laws. Before we affirm or deny their power to upset the present Kosmos, we may make some inquiries about their leverage. Osmosis is their answer; but when we come to look into it, this Osmosis on their own showing—Osmosis, i.e., filtration—depends upon settling a point which is a moot point between Mr. Darwin and Mr. Herbert Spencer. Osmosis is not only a theory, but is a theory made to account for facts which, whether they exist or not, is a question upon which these distinguished physicists are at issue. . . . The New York Positivists base their doctrine of Osmosis—that is, settle the problem of life—upon principles of the existence of which even the authors of certain speculations on this subject have not satisfied themselves. And further, they do not get even so far as the alternative between Mr. Darwin and Mr. Spencer for the basis of their new faith; for these apostles, after accepting and doubting with the same breath the revelations which those whom they deem to be authorities are not clear about, propose a third hypothesis called Cellular Genesis for their doctrine of Osmosis, which must have been developed by the inner consciousness of Box No. 6,055.

As far as we can make it out, the theory of the Universe and all that it contains, and the secret of Being, according to Doctor Positivus, is this. There exists first a cell; then force. How the cell came to be a cell, or how force came to be, or what might be meant by the self-existence of force, or whether force is eternal, we are not told. Force acts on cell for ever and ever, if there is such a thing as ever and ever. Force is in constant circulation; force vibrating through cells produces life, emotions, feelings, growth, habit, affinities, and what you like. What used to be called the will, or the passions, or the soul, is only force playing more quickly or more slowly through the cells of the tissues; hence the variations in this play or vibration of force produce different results. What used to be called evil thoughts, said to proceed out of the heart—murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies, which defile a man—are only vibrations acting on the cellular tissue not so well, we suppose, as they ought to act. But whether well or ill ought scientifically to be predicated of any action of force on a cell, in this system in which 'sin' has no place, may be questioned. On the other hand, what used to be called virtues are only another and more harmonious set of vibrations. The character of all human actions, therefore, is subordinate to the dynamical law of correlation; and Osmosis accounts for everything. But Osmosis, having no choice, can dictate no choice; and therefore, which is the practical matter, responsibility has no place in the new Church and World of the Future, which at present is confined to the aforesaid Box No. 6,055. It is, we fear, but poor work, after explaining, with such clearness as we could compass, this Gospel of Osmosis, to point out that the New York Doctor Positivus does not hold out an encouraging view of the proposed working of his system. Rewards and punishments in the next world we have of course got rid of, because there is no next world; but as far as this world, regenerated under Osmosis, is concerned, and in the political conditions to which it is to be subjected, the only penalty which it is proposed to enforce in the filtrated Utopia is one for bringing into the world too many children. Property, capital, and political economy are at once to cease. 'Every woman must have the privilege of bearing children; if no permanent relation can be formed, she may select one temporarily.' The apostles of the religion of humanity have banished the Creator from His works; they have destroyed the filial relation between man and his Maker; they have deposed the ruler and judge of His world; they confound man with nature; they have, by abolishing a future life, made the present life not only not worth living, but a curse in itself. But we quite feel that in one respect these reformers have improved upon the 'old subjective Bible and prevailing beliefs.' They have imagined a hell worse than that of the theologians, and would turn the world into that hell."

THE RITUALIST COMMITTEE'S PROTEST.

THE leading ecclesiastical topic of the week has to be classed, after all, rather among what the churches are saying than what they are doing. Some sanguine people have expected that the Ritualists would withdraw from the Church of England. They have, however, reported and memorialised instead! A great meeting of the party was held on Tuesday last, at the Freemasons' Tavern. Though in one sense only a private conference, restricted to gentlemen invited by the English Church Union, yet it was a completely representative body—all those whose names are most prominent in connection with Ritualism being present—Dr. F. G. LEE, the author of the Directorium; the Rev. Dr. LITLEDAL, notorious for his vilification of the Reformers; the Rev. W. J. E. BENNETT, of Frome; the Rev. ORBY SHIPLEY; Mr. MACKONCHIE, the defendant in the late suit, with a large number of laymen, and the pugnacious Archdeacon DENISON in the chair. The chief feature of the meeting was the report presented by a committee of thirty appointed at a preliminary meeting last week; and this report consisted almost entirely of a long and elaborate argument on the whole question of the recent judgment in the shape of a memorial to the Archbishops and Bishops of England and Wales, and to the Houses of Convocation of York and Canterbury.

No one has ever accused the High Church party of lacking either literary ability or skill in the art of special pleading, and this report is, accordingly, after its fashion, a very able document. It begins by protesting against the competency of the Court of Final Appeal, mainly as comprising "no adequate representation of the spirituality or of persons versed in theological liturgical and ecclesiastical questions," a neat little rap for the Archbishop of York, one of the Court, to whom amongst others the memorial is addressed. The argument is well put, but it will strike disinterested spectators as coming with peculiarly bad grace from a party who never questioned the competency of that tribunal when its decisions, as in the case of Mr. GORHAM, have been in their favour. It then goes on to protest against the principle of the judgment that all rites and ornaments must be regarded as illegal, the retention of which is not distinctly specified in the rubrics—a principle directly contradicting that laid down in the Court below by Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE, that any very ancient and general usage not specifically forbidden might be held to be permitted. We are again reminded that the parties to whom the memorial is nominally addressed are only pegs to hang a party manifesto upon by the neat way in which the recent Lambeth encyclical is turned against its authors—that address having exhorted the faithful to "hold fast the creeds and the pure worship and order which of God's grace you have inherited from the Primitive Church"—a recognition of the validity of very ancient usage in the face of which it is certainly hard for the memorialists to have to put out their candles. In regard to this particular point, of candles upon the altar, the memorial proceeds to argue at very great length that "the late judgment does virtually impose upon the Church a new prohibitory and penal law." The whole question appears one of great intricacy—the first Prayer-book of EDWARD the VI. having ordained that the two lights were still to remain, the second having said nothing about them; the whole issue practically depending upon whether the "ornaments of the church," which the Judicial Committee say were to be according to the first Prayer-book, include altar candles or not. The most interesting passages in the memorial, however, are those in which the Ritualists endeavour to show that the judgment, by laying down that the rubric of 1662 is the sole and exhaustive directory for public worship in the Church of England has, by the cardinal principle referred to, on the one hand made several long-established usages illegal, and on the other, revived several entirely obsolete usages, and made them henceforth compulsory. As these results will furnish the armoury for any retaliatory prosecutions upon the Evangelical party, they have a special interest, and certainly the result is a little surprising, and must be slightly bewildering to honest clergymen like Dr. MILLER, who have expressed their intention themselves loyally to obey the judgment which they have obtained against their Ritualist adversaries. It has, it appears, made illegal, among many other minor matters, the use of any metrical hymn or psalm whatever, except the "veni Creator," at ordinations; the practice of the clergyman standing at the side of the communion table, instead of in the front of it; the recitation of the words of administration to more than one person at a time, the common practice being to administer to batches of communicants; the omission of the latter clauses of the exhortation to holy communion, recommending private confession and absolution, and, indeed, of any passage in the marriage, burial, or any other office; and then—another rap at the bishops—the "insertion by a bishop in the order of confirmation, of one or more addresses or sermons;" and the interpolation in the communion service of a benediction for the purpose of dismissing any part of the congregation before the communion has been administered. On the other hand, the following widely neglected practices are by implication made compulsory.

1.—The daily recitation of morning and evening prayer by all priests and deacons, "not being let by sickness or other urgent cause;" and the public daily saying of the same in all parish churches and chapels, unless "the curate" is "reasonably hindered." 2. Weekly communion, at the least, in all cathedral and collegiate churches and college chapels. 3. The use of the alb, vestment or cope, and tunicle, ordered by the first Prayer-book, A.D., 1549, as the eucharistic vestments. 4. The use by all bishops of the ornaments "prescribed" in the following direction contained in the first Prayer-book:—"And whensoever the bishop shall celebrate the Holy Communion in the church, or execute any other public ministration, he shall have upon him, beside his rochette, a surplice or alb, and a cope or vestment; and also his pastoral staff in his hand, or else borne or holden by his chaplain." 5. The posture of "standing before" the Lord's Table during the whole prayer of consecration. 6. The exclusion from Holy Communion of all persons who have not given notice to the curate at least the day before. 7. The proceeding by the Ordinary, in his Court, "against the offending person" who may be repelled from communion. 8. Immersion in baptism, unless weakness be certified. 9. Catechising publicly in all parish churches after the second lesson at evensong on Sundays and holidays.

We can imagine that the framers of this report must not have unfrequently chuckled over the difficulties which they point out. The whole document is, as we have said, able after its fashion, but it is a small and melancholy fashion. It is strong in minute technicalities, but it is utterly weak so far as concerns any real bearing upon the question at issue. Ritualism as it is now being carried out in the Church of England is not a matter of two altar candles, or of a rather more ornate service, or of any fair latitude in the interpretation of the ordinances settled at the Reformation. It is—and the Ritualists themselves know it, and are loudly proclaiming it so every week—a question of setting the Reformation altogether at naught as a wicked and mischievous movement, and going back to doctrines and practices which are Roman Catholic in everything but name. Their petty arguments—their cleverly put dilemmas—are not the appeal of a brave and honest party to the common sense of the country, but are the mere windings and doublings of ecclesiastical sophistry in its endeavours to evade the merest letter of the law. So far as they have any effect, it is not to prove that they are right, but only that others are technically wrong, and that the whole status of an Established Church which involves such disputes is radically vicious. As we read their elaborate disquisitions on whether the Act of Uniformity of 1662 means a little more or a little less than that of ELIZABETH's time, we are tempted to wish that they could have their difficulties solved by an actual reference to the judicial courts of either of those two periods. We cannot think without a smile of what would have been the practical result, if a few of Queen ELIZABETH's Protestant Commissioners could have paid a visit of inspection to any of these High Church services, which it is boasted are as splendid as before this judgment. Mr. MACKONCHIE thinks he is hardly dealt with by those who interpret the rubrics, in having to pay the costs of a long and weary suit. If he had come before those who framed the rubrics he would have been hung for "priesthood" in a week.

LITERARIA.

A NEW edition of the Tamil Bible is about to be carried through the press by the Madras Auxiliary Bible Society. Besides the expenses which have yet to be incurred for printing and publication, £4,992 has been already expended on this version, which has been in progress since 1856. The Tamil was the first Indian language into which the Scriptures were translated, the version having been begun in 1688 by the Dutch for the benefit of their Cingalese subjects.

One of the most interesting works in the late sale of the Marquis of Hastings' library was, "Wiclif, the Four Evangelists," in the handwriting of John Wiclif, rector of Lutterworth, 1380, which was bought for £215 for the British Museum.

A learned Jew, M. Adolphe Neubauer, has just published in Paris a work on the geography of Palestine according to the Talmud ("Géographie du Talmud"), which has gained a prize of the French Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres.

A work entitled the "Olive Leaf; or, a Pilgrimage to Rome, Jerusalem, and Constantinople, for the Reunion of the Faithful," by W. W. Malet, vicar of Ardeley, affords a good illustration of the difference which there is between childlike and childish. This Anglican clergyman—"pilgrim Priest," as he styles himself—sought an interview with the Pope in order to give him the assurance, which must have astonished him, we fancy, not a little, that "England recognizes him as the chief Bishop of all," and that "everything was ready" (here) "for his Holiness to dissipate the divisions by Recognition;" and because Pío Nono bestowed upon him and his companions the Papal benediction, a civility which is freely accorded to all, he asks, with infantine simplicity, whether this "may not imply an earnest of the Recognition of England!" Let us hope his Holiness did not, when Mr. Malet's back was turned, exclaim, "Lord, what fools these English be!"

Dean Alford's work, "How to Study the New Testament" is now complete in three volumes; the third, just issued, beginning with Philipians and ending with the Revelation. Though, as is the case with his edition of the Greek Testament, the Dean often lets his theology override his learning, there is much in the work that will be helpful to ordinary readers of the Scriptures.

Mr. Samuel Sharpe has just published "The History of the Hebrew Nation and its Literature" (J. R. Smith), which seems to us both a valuable and interesting addition to our works of this kind; but as we might be supposed to be somewhat biased by denominational partiality in our estimate of it, we prefer giving the following notice from the Pall Mall Gazette to one of our own: "Mr. Sharpe has already been very useful to the world by his literal translations of the Old and New Testaments, and this little book is another attempt in the same direction. The view of Hebrew history which is here presented is in every respect different from that which is generally accepted in this country. Wisely, with reference to his object of popularizing the results of learned criticism, the author assumes as a basis the view which commends itself to him, and tells the story as he conceives it without any allusion to its divergence from current opinions. Thus he finds his first contemporary authority in the Book of Judges, which he regards as the oldest book in the Bible, and he does not discuss the contents of the Pentateuch until he comes to speak of the time when he supposes the books composing it to have been written. The earlier and simpler portions of Exodus and Numbers are ascribed to the reign of Saul. These records give a historical basis to the general outlines of the exodus from Egypt. Next to them come the lives of Isaac Jacob, and Esau, in the book of Genesis, then the life of Abraham in the same book. To a somewhat later period, the reign of Solomon, is ascribed the second narrative of the Creation. Portions of the life of Noah, the Egyptian episode in the life of Abraham, and one or two other passages in the Pentateuch, are assigned to the reign of Hezekiah, and the ceremonial regulations in those books are variously dated, from the time of Joash to the time of Nehemiah. We state these results as specimens of those to which Mr. Sharpe's criticism has brought him. They exhibit only a partial agreement with the views of Ewald; and though the writer gives no indication of the degree or direction in which they have been influenced by the latest continental research, we believe that they represent very nearly the present state of Liberal theological opinion, as it has been modified by the later German as well as by Dutch writers. Mr. Sharpe's narrative style is simple, free from pedantry, and not without occasional elevation; the want of vividness and imagination which it displays is perhaps an almost unavoidable accompaniment of the sort of discrimination which such a task requires."

OPEN CHURCH PAPERS.

BY BROOKE HERFORD.

II. THE ANCIENT AND ALMOST UNIVERSAL USAGE.

I BEGIN by laying down and illustrating this position, that the place of Common Worship is essentially a public place, and should be honestly kept so; that all Christian churches ought to be places of perfectly free resort for worship, to all who will; places really dedicated to the public religious use. It does not matter whether a church is erected by the munificence of one, or by the pious offerings of a multitude. Those who build it should regard it, not as their house, but God's; and those who are specially interested in its maintenance by reason of their preferring to worship there, should support it, not as a proprietary worshipping place for themselves, but as a temple of God freely open to all who will.

And now I want to point out on what a broad ground of ancient and almost universal use this idea rests! Some people cry out against it as an innovation. Why, instead of its being an innovation, it is the principle that has prevailed in the worship of the Deity in all ages and in all lands; that prevailed throughout Christendom for fifteen hundred years, and prevails throughout the greater part of Christendom still, having never been violated until the rise, under exceptional circumstances, of our various Protestant sects. Now this is a great and significant fact. Look through all heathen lands, either in past ages or in the present, you will not find one in which the temples, however grand and beautiful they might be, have not been places of free public resort for all. It was so in Egypt and Greece and Rome. It is so in India, China,—everywhere! Look into the worship of the old Hebrews, and you find exactly the same idea prevailing. There were its little meeting-houses or synagogues scattered throughout the land, to which the people went for the expounding of the law. Yes; and we read how there were some who "loved to choose out the chief seats in the synagogues," and no doubt they would have been only too glad to have paid seat-rent and had them always; but we do not read that they were permanently allotted to them for hire, or that Christ exactly commended them. And more strikingly still was the "open" principle illustrated in the great Temple at Jerusalem. There the rich Pharisee and the despised publican had an equal right; and at the great festivals its courts were thronged with the dwellers in Jerusalem, and the peasants or pilgrims from distant parts—it was open freely and equally to all. And this same thought of God's temple, as everywhere an open place for all, not only prevailed in every heathen land, and in the old Hebrew worship; look into that form of faith which embraces now so large a part of the world—Mahomedanism—you find the same thing; its mosques are perfectly free to all! Turn to the countries of Christendom; see how things were in the early times, see how they continued through fifteen hundred years. Still the same! Christianity simply followed in this matter what seems to have been the reverent instinct of all the world's religions; no one ever dreamed of anything else than that its temples should be really open to all. In its humble "upper rooms," and in the secret worship of the catacombs; in its magnificent cathedrals and in its lowly parish churches everywhere, up to three hundred years ago—the rich and poor came with one feeling that all alike were free to come, and worshipped side by side. In Catholic countries you still find the same thing. You go into the great beautiful churches on the continent, and there you see all classes just as you do in our public parks—the rich and the poor do "meet together"! You will see poor market women as they pass setting down their baskets on the steps, and going in to pass a little time in prayer; and the poor children of the streets steal in to look at the beautiful altar and the great Christ hanging on the cross. They are all free to come. They know it and feel it. Granted it is a poorer, more superstitious worship than ours; is it not, then, all the more sad that the common people in our English towns should not feel as free and happy in coming in to our purer worship? And would it not be worth any sacrifice of personal comfort and seclusion to help to bring back that old feeling to the people's heart?

It is curious to see how widely—and yet how without any set intention we have drifted away from this old system, in our English Protestant religious life. It is so in the Established Church just as in the other sects. In old times each church, was the church not for those who were avowedly or regularly attendants at it, but for the free use of all in the surrounding district. The name of this old parochial system is still retained, but its reality is gone; and for the most part the churches are let off—just like the meeting-houses of Dissenters—to those who are sufficiently interested or sufficiently well-to-do to hire regular places. As for Dissenters, there is among us hardly the pretence of anything else. Yet this did not originate from any set purpose. It arose out of the simple fact that all Dissent was so persecuted in its origin, that its adherents were only too glad, when at length they were permitted, to build humble places for their own worship—hardly dreamed of assuming to set up public temples. All that was possible for them in those days was, practically, to band themselves together into companies to institute in a quiet way a sort of proprietary worship of their own. They chose back streets and alleys for their chapels, anywhere most secluded from public observation; built just what they needed for their own requirements, never thought of the necessity of avoiding whatever appropriation of places they might gradually fall into or find convenient.

Now all this was natural. I do not blame them that they lost sight of the larger idea of churches freely dedicated to the most public use, because situated as they were that larger idea was practically out of the question for them. But surely it has been a most calamitous thing that their more limited ideas remained after all necessity for such limitations had passed away; that those ideas have been suffered to give the character to all our Non-conformist church life; that when all necessity for avoiding observation passed away, and when it gradually became as open to Dissenters as to Churchmen to build public churches after the old idea, and offer them for the free use in worship of all people, they still confined themselves to making arrangements for their own comfort and convenience, and that so, insensibly, the whole idea of a church has become dwarfed and belittled, and the whole feeling of the community, especially of the poor, towards churches changed.

Surely now, at any rate, the time is come for something better. All churches stand now upon the same level. In God's sight the poor around our churches are as much our parishes as they are the parishes of the establishment. I long for the time to come when we shall be no longer content with our old subordinate position of mere societies of people providing for their own worship, but instead shall take our stand right upon the world's highway of busy life, inviting all men to enter in and join in our simple worship; and doing what alone will even make them feel perfectly at ease in so entering in—proclaiming our churches open temples to which all may freely come, and meekly laying aside the seclusions of home and the distinctions of the world, in a Presence, the sense of which should consecrate the humblest seat and draw us kindly toward even the humblest fellow-worshipper.

Mrs. Robberds, of Manchester.

WHILE it gives no occasion for regret, the departure from amongst us of one so deeply and universally respected as this excellent lady was will not fail to call up some feelings of sadness in many hearts, as it does in our own. Descended from a line of honoured Nonconformist ministers—grand-daughter of the Rev. William Turner, of Wakefield, the friend of Lindsey and Priestley, and daughter of his son, for sixty years the venerated minister of Newcastle-upon-Tyne—she was admirably fitted for the duties which fell to her lot as the wife of the Rev. J. G. Robberds, of Manchester, proving herself a most efficient helpmeet to him in his pastoral work, and leaving sweet memories of Christian sympathy, tender kindness, and readiness to help, in a wide circle of acquaintances and friends. Although, of late, growing years had obliged her to take a less active share than formerly in the business of life, her interest in all the great causes of earth suffered no diminution, but continued fresh and lively as ever; and until within a fortnight of her death, no marked symptoms of failing powers were perceptible, except that the dulness in her sense of hearing, under which she had laboured for many years and had so patiently and beautifully borne, became more complete. She was in her accustomed place at Cross-street Chapel, from which, when in health, she was so rarely absent, last Sunday morning, and in the early evening she was called to her rest. A life like hers, in many respects so favoured and happy, extended to very nearly eighty-three years, crowned with the esteem of the old and the love of the young, and filled with Christian thoughts and Christian deeds, at its close calls, we feel, rather for thanks than for tears. She kept, as a good servant, that which had been committed to her, and we can securely trust has now, through God's mercy, entered on the inconceivable peace which is reserved with Him for those who have faithfully striven to do his holy will.

J. C. Rogers, Esq., of Devonport.

THIS gentleman was one of those devoted Unitarians of Devonport who, for many years, conducted the services in their chapel in Granby-street, and it was in a great degree owing to his zeal and hopeful spirit that their new place of worship, Christ Church, was erected. Although connected with the press in his youth, and called to the bar at a later period, the greater part of his life was spent in the performance of his duty in the civil service. The high opinion in which he was held by the Admiralty led to his being called to London on various occasions, to act as secretary to Committees on Dock-yard and Victualling accounts, &c. Overwork at these times has been the cause of his death at the early age of 46. He was a valuable public servant, and an able, energetic, and warm-hearted friend. His funeral was numerously attended by members of the Societies to which he belonged, and his loss is much lamented. He leaves behind him a widow and a large family.

THE ISIS.

FATHER FABRE.

Ah! there is something in a stream
That fascinates the eye,
A charm in that eternal flow
That ever glideth by.
For still by river-sides the hour
Will often lapse away,
Till evening almost seems to steal
A march upon the day.
So should it be with man's career;
Each hour a duty find,
And not a stone be there to check
The current of the mind.
The path of duty, like the stream,
Hath flowers that round it bloom;
The thicker and the lovelier
The nearer to the tomb.
And ah! the best and purest life
Is that which passes slow,
And yet withal so evenly
We do not feel it go.

THE COUNTRY IN WINTER.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

WHAT advantages has the country over the town in summer, of which it is robbed by the austere winter? People say that the country is dreary in winter, and bleak, and dank, and shivering. Perhaps this is true; but it is one of the most invaluable precepts in all forms of argumentation by comparison not to accept an objection to one side of the comparison until you have applied it to the other. In comparing men and women, for example, it is constantly said that women are illogical, weak, badly educated, seekers after small things; and it is true, but by how much is it less true of men? And so in a thousand other cases, an acute disputant confounds a clumsy opponent by pressing undeniable assertions about one limb of the dispute; but which also, if his adversary could only bethink himself quickly, happen to be just as undeniable about the other limb. The country is dreary in winter if you choose to think so, and find it so; but how of the town in winter? The outlook on a garden where the earth seems sodden with wet, where trees hang despondent heads, and the sky looms leaden overhead, is not inspiring nor gay; but lives there the man with soul so daring as to say that the outlook from a house in one of the long streets around a London square has one whit more claim to gaiety. The sky intensifies the blackness of walls and causeways; and the griminess of the bricks and pavement reflects itself on passers by. If rain be actually falling, the scene is almost tragic in its squalor, muddiness, and mean gloom. Nature weeps in sooty tears. The creaking cab that crawls and rumbles past your window gives but a deadly animation to the depressing sight. If there be fog instead of rain, no words can describe a set of sensations with which the dweller in town is so painfully familiar. Earth hath not anything to show more foul. Eyes, lungs, throat, skin, smart in emulous protest, and the physical sense is as violently outraged as the subtler mental sense of the beautiful and the becoming. So, then, if a rainy or a foggy day be dull and dreary in the country, such a day is neither cheerful nor loveable in town. And, in comparison with the latter, rain or fog in the country may almost be pronounced the opposite of dull or dreary. To a person of appreciative temper, the sight and sound of the rain falling hard and straight upon grass or heath, beating the branches of the trees, and washing in turbulent current along the white road, are far from presenting a mere picture of blank unloveliness. A fog, too, in the country is very different from the same thing coloured and saturated with the myriad foulnesses of a great city. It is white, to begin with, and it is clean; and instead of hanging before your eyes and around your soul as a black pall, it rolls and floats and moves with something like life and purpose and elemental force. The man who has not enjoyed the sight of a lightish fog floating in a wood of firs is the poorer by one fine impression at least. In the same way, when snow comes, what in town is the greatest and ugliest of nuisances, amid woods and fields is a thousand times less of a nuisance, and, so far from being ugly, delights the eye and suggests many things to the fancy, the first by the bright contrast of black and white, and the second by fantastic or graceful shapes and casual bits of the grotesque, by the muffling of all sounds and the seeming preternatural stillness of the air.

Even in an ordinary winter's day, when the aspects of nature offer least to attract or stimulate, we should rather pity the man who could walk over heaths or along high roads, or even in miry fields, and find all barren and displeasing. To those whose love of landscape is limited to a wide view, or a summer park, or lakes and mountains, who can only relish what is vast or rich or noble, of course a lesser thing is as nothing. But he does ill who trains himself only for sumptuosity; and one is wise to seek so to widen and quicken a love for the whole natural world as to be alive to the humbler as well as the more august impressions of the scene. To a man with right sense and eye, few days pass in which the changing greys of a wintry sky do not offer something interesting; and he has a patch of heath, perhaps, or a clump of trees, or a reach of dead brown coppice, which is to him as a friend; dull and stupid to the rest of the world, but to him his friend, and so never either dull or stupid; seasons cannot wither nor custom stale its infinite variety. Then there are the winds. Laden with dust and grit and bits of befoiled straw, lying in wait for prey at the corners of the streets, sweeping down the long spaces, to the townsman they are among visitants accursed. But in the country even the piercing north-easter, worst and most beshrewed of blasts, grows tame to the man who courageously faces it with quick stride; at any rate, it blows clean, and there are no street corners where it may grapple with you as from some high vantage ground of fiendishness. And this is the worst of winds; scarcely another that is not delightful in the country. The south-west wind, coming over furzy commons, or through woods, or down long open valleys, is a theme for the highest of poets; nobody of lesser stature can do justice to it. Even in its excess, when it bellows round your house walls and does wild battle with oaks and elms, there is a fine bluff humour in it worthy of a great elemental force. It may rob you of slumber for an hour or two of a night now and again, but to a man who surrenders himself to the mood there is no vast loss in this, but perhaps gain, for nature takes care that the interruption does not come too often nor endure too long.

So then, in fine, anybody with genuine passion for the country at all, for the simplicity of its life, for its freshness, its cleanliness, its sympathetic changefulness, its suggestiveness, may find all that he loves hardly less in one season than another. The life of the senses is fuller and richer in the time of leafage and sunshine, but all these things that fall short of that fulness and richness are yet accessible in the country, and they are not at all accessible in towns. The sweetness of the country is just as much above the ugliness of the town in winter time as in summer time; and the people who flee up to grim streets and gaunt houses, not because they are drawn thither by business, but simply because they cannot sustain the monotony of dull weather, though they are not culpable, should at least abstain from professing an appreciation of rural life which must be either feigned, or at any rate is artificial and imperfect. However, they are not likely to be detected by more than the initiated few, for no popular fallacy is so little disputed or doubted as this of the exceeding dullness and misery of country life in winter. The fallacy rests on another which is like unto it, that you must be dull and miserable unless you see a great many people, no matter whether they are fools or wise, stimulating or depressing, genial or stiff. As if a brisk walk in the bitterest north-easter that ever blew were not a pleasanter exercise for any reasonable being than ninety-eight out of every hundred social gatherings to which one is invited.

DUKINFIELD CONGREGATIONAL GATHERING.

THE members of the Dukinfield congregation held their annual gathering on New Year's Day. The chairman, the Rev. J. PAGE HOPES, in opening the proceedings, said: One of his duties, and one of his pleasures that evening was, in his own name and on behalf of those who conducted the affairs of the congregation, to wish them a happy new year. Referring to the remarkable changes that were taking place all round them, he felt that a liberal congregation such as theirs might well congratulate itself that the Christian world was advancing, and that the changes which were taking place were changes in the direction of enlightenment, liberalism, progress, and religious equality. He felt, they as a congregation felt, the whole religious world felt, the effects of this change. They were once accustomed to hear it said that opinions were the test of a man's Christianity; but a wonderful change had taken place in that particular—a change so extensive and radical that it was almost impossible now to hear anywhere what was once nearly universal. That idea had been one of the greatest absurdities, one of the most fruitful sources of all evil, that had ever cursed humanity. It had been at the root of all the ignorance and uncharitableness, and was the life of the persecuting spirit, of Christendom. But that bad doctrine, that salvation was a matter depending upon opinions, they were fast outgrowing. They had come to see that salvation depended not upon a man's opinions, but upon his relationship to God, his duty, his conscience, and his fellow-men. He therefore thought that many of the barriers the fathers had built should be broken down. There was a bond of humanity which should unite us, in spite of these dividing creeds. It might be useful to draw their attention to this point, as the leading sign of the times, because they themselves were also advancing; since no man and no church had yet arrived at the perfect truth. They had heard of the person who boasted that he, at all events, had been consistent; "for," said he, "I have not changed since I was a boy." "Then," said a bystander, "you were either a very remarkable boy or you are a very stupid man." He thought it was the duty of every man to change, just so far and just so fast, as he saw good reason for changing; and he could not understand how a man could glory in the possession of a mind who was unprepared to bear the smart of giving up old conclusions for better. And even when the adoption and the teaching of these newer but better conclusions gave pain to others, they must not hesitate. After the pain will come the peace. For, upon the heart of a man who feels that he must part from his cherished opinions, there comes, after a time, the blessed consolation of the feeling that he has respected his conscience and his God. There comes, in truth, the reward of "patient continuance in well-doing"—the reward which comes to all who obey when, like Abraham, they are called to leave the land of their fathers and go to a place that God will shew them. He mentioned this, then, as the leading sign of the times. It might be seen everywhere—in politics and in religion. He thought it was their duty, therefore, to preserve a devout spirit with an inquiring mind; on the one hand to keep sacred, for quiet contemplation, the spirit of religion; and on the other to afford every opportunity for inquiry; to keep the lamp of a religious spirit burning in the soul, and the bright light of the love of truth undisturbed in the mind. He believed they would be able in this way to accomplish the great work set before them. One other matter of importance in this connection he wished to refer to. This leading idea or prevailing spirit of the age made necessary a change in the life and duty of the Christian teacher. As a minister, he wished, in the first place, to be simply true to himself. It was a dishonesty for any man to assume, officially, anything he was not and had not in himself. What he meant was this: That if a Christian teacher was not true to himself as a man, but assumed officially what he was not naturally, he was a traitor to himself and to the God who made him. But the special change needed was in the circle of duties assigned to the Christian teacher. He hoped the time would never come to him when he should lose the earnest desire to keep the pulpit sacred for highest and noblest things that the heart and mind of man can possibly be engaged in contemplating, but he thought the weekday life of a minister should be that of a citizen. There was nothing which touched him or his brother that he should not touch. His business was to raise the tone of public life, to improve social life, political life, and the press. As Unitarian ministers, teachers in the freest and most liberal Church in Christendom, it was especially their duty to take part, on the weekday, in the public life of the people of this country, to help to make it honest, and sweet, and pure. He was thinking of the political work he had lately been doing. He had felt every day and every hour that he had not been departing from his duty as a Christian teacher, or his proper function in endeavouring to make the public and political life of that locality what he believed it ought to be. He felt sure, indeed, that this was one of the great duties of the Christian teacher in these times. There was now a great question before the country; that of the Established Church in Ireland. He did not believe that when they had got rid of that the mighty movement now going forward would be exhausted. They would then only have stormed the first earthwork. The English people had only just taken a new turn in the great line of march. They had turned over a new leaf, and were beginning a new chapter of their glorious history; and we were now the masters of the history of the future. They knew he had very little respect for the arguments of the upholders of the Church in Ireland. They might be all put into a phrase. They had heard of the Irish prelate, who, being argued with as to the desirability of disestablishment, said, "His arguments were good but I could not help laughing at the idea of setting out to convert me from £10,000 a year." That was the long and short of it; they had to contend against vested interests, He said deliberately, there was a greater question at the back of that now before the country, and he called upon them, as Englishmen and Englishwomen, to be prepared for the coming struggle, to brace themselves up for it, to have their intellects bright and their judgments well-informed, that they might worthily take their part in the great movements and the wonderful changes of our time. (Loud applause.)

The Revs. J. BLACK, B.A., and H. E. DOWSON, B.A., afterwards, delivered most instructive and interesting speeches, and the remainder of a very pleasant evening was spent in an entertainment provided by the teachers and the choir.

INTELLIGENCE.

BRISTOL: THE DEAD OF 1868.—The Rev. W. James delivered, on Sunday, Jan. 10, at Lewin's-mead Chapel, his lecture on "The Dead of 1868," and there was a very large congregation, the sacred edifice being filled to overflowing. The rev. gentleman took for his text, Job iii., 17, 18, and 19 - "There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary be at rest. There the prisoners rest together; they hear not the voice of the oppressor. The small and the great are there; and the servant is free of his master." In the course of his lecture he said he had for many successive seasons been accustomed at the opening of the year to meditate upon the obituary of the year just past. He had learned that those services were useful and valuable, and were desired by those in the habit of worshipping in that chapel. He then alluded to the deaths of M. Coquerel, Lord Brougham, Charles Kean, the tragedian, in referring to whom Mr. James took the opportunity of speaking of the amusements of the people. The career of the Marquis of Hastings was briefly adverted to; and the preacher said the history of that unfortunate young nobleman afforded a solemn warning to all young men. A distant potentate, the King of Siam, and another, Theodore of Abyssinia, who had occupied a large share of public attention, had passed away. A reference was made to the Abyssinian war; and then the losses the Church of England had sustained in the demise of the Bishop of Hereford, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Dean Milman, were spoken of. Locally there were three gentlemen who were widely known in their different spheres. Dr. Vaughan, a native of Bristol, an esteemed Congregational preacher; Mr. Samuel Lucas, an eminent writer and scholar; and Mr. Herapath, the talented analytical chemist, and who was a member of the Unitarian Church. Science had been deprived of Sir David Brewster and Dr. James David Forbes. Mr. James concluded with a few words of exhortation to his hearers.

LIVERPOOL: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—The annual meeting of this church was held on Sunday last; the Rev. W. Mitchell in the chair. The report of the committee showed but a small increase in the number of members during the year; but it was urged that the real progress made was far greater than appeared on the surface. The roll of members last year included a proportion of doubtful supporters who had since fallen away, and now the church had less of a miscellaneous character. The committee also urged that they were impeded and crippled for want of light, and air, and room. During the year the subject of a new chapel had been entered into with great spirit and heartiness, and an eligible building site had been secured. A plan would be submitted for erecting a suitable building. The report testified to the continued activity of the various auxiliaries of the church, the Sunday-school, improvement class, &c., and concluded with an appeal for help from all who sympathise with the new movement.

LLANDILO.—The Christmas quarterly meeting of the South Wales Unitarian ministers was held at Onen Faur on the 30th and 31st of December, when the following ministers were present:—Evans (Carmarthen), Evans (Gellionen), Thomas (Pant-y-dafid), Thomas (Llwyn), Williams (Cefn), Davies (Altyplaga), Jones (Aberdare), all of whom took part in one or other of the services. All the services were very well attended, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, and the rather inaccessible situation of the chapel, which is on the top of a high hill, and more than two miles from the town.

TENTERDEN.—The funeral of the Rev. E. Talbot took place on Friday last. As he had, during his long residence in the town, taken an active part in political, educational, and local matters, and was universally respected, his funeral was of a public character. The shops were closed, and the blinds of the private houses drawn down. The procession was headed by a number of the members of the congregation and friends, then the Revs. R. B. Aspland, M.A., and Robert Spears, of London, and J. A. Briggs, of Tenterden. The relations of the deceased were represented by his three sons; Mr. Baines, M.P., Leeds, and Mr. W. H. Talbot, Manchester, his brother. Then followed Messrs. Unwin and J. E. Mace, deacons of the congregation, A. Winsor and Edgar Winsor. The chapel was filled by a large congregation, and the service was impressively performed by the Rev. J. A. Briggs.

TODMORDEN.—On Saturday last, January 9th, the annual Congregational tea party was held in the Odd Fellows' Hall, when about 300 sat down to tea, including friends from Burnley and Halifax. The room was decorated. After tea, John Fielden, Esq., presided, and observed that to most of them the past year, he feared, had been, from a business point of view, a somewhat gloomy one; but he could congratulate them upon the completion of their new church—at least so far as the edifice was concerned, and he hoped shortly they might be able to meet within its walls for the worship of God. If by worshipping within it they became better men and women, he did not think it would have been raised in vain. The superintendent, Mr. Thornley, then read the report of the Sunday school, which traced its steady growth and its kindred institutions, and showed them to be in a very vigorous and healthy condition. The giving of prizes to scholars for regular attendance had much improved the rate of attendance, so that, whereas a year or two since the rate of attendance of scholars to the number of scholars on the books was 73 or 74 per cent., it had been raised this year to the high rate of 80 per cent. About 60 scholars had attended the school during three quarters of the year without once failing, and 27 had attended the whole year without being absent on a single occasion. The number of scholars on the books of the school was 279, and the average attendance for the last year past was 224. The evening classes were in active operation, one or more meeting for instruction every week-day. The Sunday-school choir and instrumental band were working very successfully. The tract society had come into operation during the last year, and reflected great credit upon the zeal of the adult scholars who had set it on foot. The savings bank, which was only opened in October last, had already deposited in it the sum of £70, and promised to be a most useful institution. The funds which supported the school were derived from the collections made upon the occasion of preaching the school sermons; and as, owing to peculiar circumstances, these sermons had not this last year been preached, the treasury was exhausted, but the school committee hoped soon to remedy this evil. The report was supported in an earnest speech by the Rev. J. Ellis, of Elland, and, having been put to the meeting, was passed. The Rev. Lindsey Taplin, pointing back to the past history of the school, showed how, when he first became acquainted with the Sunday school, though it was then a much smaller child than now, it was yet a very healthy and vigorous one. Mr. Thornley, as their superintendent during the last six years, had taken much interest in their child, and had laboured for its welfare, and they could not allow him to pass away from amongst them without according him their good wishes for his future welfare. A motion to this effect was then put to the meeting, and received with warm applause. Mr. Thornley briefly responded. The meeting was afterwards addressed by the Revs. J. H. Smith, now of Halifax; Jos. Freeston, of Rochdale; and Mr. Swaine, of Sowerby Bridge. This agreeable meeting came to a close by the usual votes of thanks.

CHRISTMAS FESTIVITIES.

Carter Lane, London. The annual festivities at this place were begun on New Year's Eve, when nearly 100 parents were invited to tea by one of the teachers. It was the first meeting of the kind, and may be considered a success. At the termination of that meeting about thirty members of the congregation attended a communion service. After that the meeting was considerably augmented, and a watch night service was held. On Sunday, the 3rd, the annual service for parents and former scholars took place. On Monday, about 200 were present at the children's tea meeting. The chief feature of this party was an exhibition of work done by the children at home, the first thing of the kind ever attempted; and the teachers were taken quite by surprise at some of the articles made, so excellent were they both in design and execution. On Monday evening, the congregation and a large number of friends took tea together, the room being decorated for the occasion; and after tea adjourned to the lower room, when the first penny reading of the year was held, the Rev. J. Taylor presiding. A very pleasant evening was spent. Aberdare. A tea meeting was held at the Old Meeting House, on Monday, the 4th instant, to help in the liquidation of the debt on the chapel, which was re-erected in 1862. It is expected the profit will amount to from £15 to £20. There was a concert in the evening, for which the tickets were also available. Aspley. On Saturday, January 2nd, the Christmas tea meeting was held, when about 170 persons were present. The proceedings after tea were enlivened by a large selection of glees, songs, dialogues, recitations, &c.—The Free Christian Society, Birmingham, held their Christmas party on Tuesday, December 29th. A day school for girls was opened on Monday last, January 11th, and on the same day the penny entertainments, which before Christmas had been unusually successful, were recommenced. The meeting room has now been licensed for the celebration of marriages. At Roscommon-street, Liverpool, the annual festival and entertainment to the Sunday-school scholars took place on Monday, January 6th. In addition to the teachers, there were present the Revs. J. Alsop, W. A. Pope, &c.; also Mr. White, of the Liverpool Town (Trinitarian) Mission. After tea Mr. T. E. Stephens, the superintendent, delivered a short address to the scholars, encouraging them to be steadfast in their work, and enumerating those who were deserving of praise for regularity, good behaviour, and attention. The Revs. J. Alsop and Pope also delivered addresses; and afterwards exhibitions were given from a magic lantern by Mr. White. Sale. On Saturday, December 19th, the blankets subscribed for by the members of the blanket club, and the money paid into the penny bank in connection with the chapel, were distributed. Sixteen pairs of blankets had been paid for, and the bank fund amounted to £94. On Thursday, January 7th, the annual tea-meeting for the parents and scholars was held, many friends of the congregation being present. The Rev. Dr. Beard presided, and distributed prizes to deserving scholars. A report of the school was read, after which recitations and readings were given by scholars and teachers, interspersed with glees and songs.—Chorley. On the morning of Christmas Day divine service was held in the Park-street Chapel.

In the afternoon, at five o'clock, a number of members and friends met together in the school-room. After tea, the Rev. G. Ride occupied the chair, and delivered a brief address, after which the evening was spent in listening to readings and recitations by the chairman, and Messrs. P. Hodgkinson and J. Simm, with other innocent amusements.

OWING to the Ravages of the Vine Disease, the Production, and, consequently, the Importation into this country of WINE from the island of MADEIRA, for a number of years all but completely ceased. The ground formerly devoted to the Vine plant was turned into Sugar Plantations. Sugar being a less precarious crop, and sooner available for the market than Wine.

Since the disappearance of the disease, the Culture of the VINE has again attracted attention, and for a few years past the quantity of WINE made has increased. Thinking there might be a trade done if a good WINE, at a moderate price, were offered, we have been at considerable pains to PROCURE SAMPLES FROM THE ISLAND, and have selected one which we can offer at 42s. DISCOURSES OF DAILY DUTY AND DAILY CARE, by the Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS. London: E. T. Whitfield, Strand; and through all booksellers.

"Seldom of late years have we received from the pulpit of any Church sermons so rich in spiritual life, and, at the same time, so full of precious thoughts, clothed in a style of chaste beauty and simplicity, as these five 'Discourses of Daily Duty and Daily Care.' This volume alone is sufficient to refute the common charge made against us, that our theology is too severely intellectual to give nutriment to the spiritual life, and too levelled to warm the heart or enkindle devout sentiments. These sermons show how practicable it is to combine the intellectual and the emotional elements in religion, and to appeal to the heart while convincing the understanding. We might quote largely from every sermon passages justifying the high commendation we have bestowed upon this exquisite little work. We must content ourselves with a few opening sentences from the first sermon, on 'Beneficent Neighbourly Love'—a sermon which reads like a prose-poem.—Inquirer."

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

It is stated that the Mount of Olives has become the property of the Crown of France.

A clergyman of the name of Wild, has been lecturing in Canada, taking for his subject "What the world is coming to." He announces these among other things looming in the distance: Coral insects will fill up the Pacific with solid habitable land; eventually the globe will be all land, or at least there will be no more sea; there is also to be perpetually equal day and night of twelve hours each all over the globe; there is to be only one language spoken throughout the world, and "that, of course, will be English."

A New Testament, translated by an American missionary, is now being circulated in Japan.

As usual, the Papal government is not able to "make both ends meet," and this year the excess of expenditure over receipts is six million livres, a pretty large deficit for so Liliputian a State. The Pontifical authorities, however, look with hope to the Œcumenical Council to set things right.

On the subject of this same Council, a pastoral letter from Archbishop Manning was read on Sunday in all the Roman Catholic Churches in London. It solicits the prayers of the clergy and laity of his diocese for the happy issue of the Council, and enjoins the clergy to hold special services each week for the same purpose. The council will be called the "First Council of the Vatican," as it will be held in the right transept of St. Peter's. The transept will, it is said, accommodate upwards of 2,000 persons, and it will be so arranged that the voice of each speaker may be distinctly heard throughout the whole council chamber. The stalls erected for the accommodation of the prelates will cost £9,000 or £10,000; and collections are being made in Catholic countries to meet this and other expenses.

The Paris papers give a long description of the investiture of M. Zadoc Kohn with the dignity of Grand Rabbi at the synagogue there. The congregation kept their hats on, as is the custom amongst Jews. M. Renan, M. Prevost-Paradol, M. Cremieux, the lawyer, and M. Frank, of the Institute, were among those present. M. Cohen was at the head of the Israelitish Consistory. M. Halphen replaced M. Gustav de Rothschild, absent in consequence of the recent death of his father, and acted as vice-president of the central committee. He therefore read the Emperor's decree sanctioning the nomination of Zadoc Kohn. The Hundredth Psalm was chanted by Blum, of the Lyrique, and a French hymn was sung by M. Raumbourgh, a Jewish poet, after the sermon preached by M. Kohn's predecessor. The collection was made whilst Rossini's Prayer in Moise was executed by violoncellos, guitars, and harps. Suddenly a panel covered with crimson velvet was withdrawn, and the tabernacle of Moses was displayed, whence the Sepher (the scroll of the law) was unfolded, whilst M. Ketten sang an appropriate air. Blum sang during the ceremony of replacing the Sepher within the tabernacle. The final Hallelujah was executed whilst the Rabbi, authorities, and consistory quitted the synagogue. M. Zadoc Kohn has scarcely attained his thirtieth year, and is said to be the youngest Grand Rabbi elected since the days of Jeremiah the Prophet.

The clergy of the rural deanery of Kilmacrenan, in the county of Donegal, have passed a resolution approving of the principles of re-construction of the Irish Church when disestablished that are propounded in Archdeacon Stopford's pamphlet, which we referred to last week, and calling on the Bishop of Derry "to take early action with a view to convening a synod representative of the clergy and laity of the diocese" on those principles.

The following protest, understood to be drawn up by Dr. F. G. Lee, was formally made at All Saints', Lambeth, and in several churches both in London and the country on Sunday, and has been already influentially signed by clergy of the High Church party:

"In the name of God: Amen. Whereas, in the case of Martin v. Mackonochie, a judgment has been given by Her Majesty the Queen by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, in which certain principles are laid down and acted upon, which, if accepted and generally applied, would seriously damage the Church of England in the estimation of the faithful both at home and abroad:

"And, whereas the said principles, in their nature, tend to dissociate the present Church as by law established from the Pre-Reformation Church, and by consequence from the Primitive Church:

"And, whereas, moreover, the said principles, if strictly applied, are such as to render the due administration of the Holy Sacraments and the celebration of Divine service impracticable, if not impossible:

"And, whereas, furthermore, without any fresh legislation, the said judgment thus tends to curtail the reasonable liberties and lawful rights of Churchmen of one school of thought in a manner and to an extent unprecedented, while it lays upon another school a burden of observances which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear:

"Now, we, the undersigned beneficed clerks, having in mind the provision of Magna Charta that the Church should be free, and our own declaration at the time of our ordination, to minister the doctrine, and sacraments, and discipline of Christ, as the Lord hath commanded, and as this Church and realm hath received the same, do hereby solemnly protest against the principles of the said judgment being taken to be the true principles of the Church of England, and against their being imposed by penalties and punishment upon the clergy of the said Church for their acceptance."

After reading this protest, Dr. Lee gave a sermon in which he strongly advocated the doctrine of the Real Presence. The prayers of the congregation were desired for the Bishop of Salisbury.

From the "Baptist Handbook" just published it appears that there are 1840 Baptist churches in England, 475 in Wales, 108 in Scotland, and 34 in Ireland, giving a total of 2,447 churches in Great Britain and Ireland. The increase of membership is 9,972; the total number of members being 231,506. Fifty new churches have been formed during the past year, 41 new chapels opened, and 29 chapels enlarged or improved by addition of schoolrooms or otherwise.

A curious illustration of the force of bigotry is exhibited in the Arran Islands. It appears that in them there is only one bakery, and that belongs to Protestants. The Roman Catholic population—more than 3,000 in number—do not care to eat Protestant bread; and so they obtain their loaves by the mail which runs between Galway and the islands. Suddenly the mail is, for some unexplained reason, stopped. The Roman Catholics can get no bread of their own religion; they refuse to eat any made by "heretics."

The Archbishop of Canterbury has withdrawn the inhibition he issued against Father Ignatius, and he will now be free to continue his ordinary ministrations in church. It is understood that in compliance with the request of the Archbishop, he will not return to St. Edmund the King, Lombard-street, but that he will take some other metropolitan church for his services.

"Father Ignatius" writes to the Morning Advertiser in a strain anything but complimentary to the Ritualists. He has been brought into immediate contact with several of these "Romanising clergy," and "their notions of contract and morality utterly failed when exposed to that standard which exclaims, 'All false ways I utterly abhor.' A devout and reverent manner, with a tone of character showing evidence of regard for that Light ever burning, which the mortal eye of man cannot see, but which the spirit within him can, they gave no evidence of." And he attributes this lamentable deficiency to the fact that "an excessive ceremonial in churches has no beneficial influence anywhere, and no ascendant power at all beyond the walls of the Church." And he says, "One of the said high-wrought clergy, under a disappointment, shook his fist in my face, with an Italian courage (so much for form and ceremonies); in the presence of a large body of gentlemen; just as the whole body of go-ahead men are now shaking theirs at the Queen, the Privy Council, and humble pie! But such exhibitions cannot change, as their doctrine is, wrong into right, or matter into spirit, nor noisy men into men of importance." Perfectly true, Mr. Lyne, and well-adapted to home use.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In giving an account of the last days of Cardinal Andréa, the Report of the Anglo-Continental Society says:

"Before leaving Naples he wrote his will, which he prefaced by a declaration, that by the force of right he was in the right in his struggle with the Pope, but by the right of force Pius was in the right. He distinguished, he said, Giovanni Mastai from Pius IX. the Pontiff; the Pontiff, retaining still the nature of Giovanni Mastai, could err, and did err in a childish manner, being taken in by that Ahitophel Antonelli, by Patrizi, an ignorant flatterer, and by Caterini, who was a rogue. For himself, he declared he was more Catholic than Pope Pius IX., who at the beginning of his Pontificate and onwards, had done many things which were not altogether Catholic. At the end of his will he left his 'full and sincere forgiveness to the Holy Father, the Cardinals, Prelates, and the rest of his enemies.'"

Regarding the policy of the St. Alban's judgment, the London Review sums up its criticism thus:

"Those Liberals who regard a national church as a very valuable friend to liberty of belief and worship, are bound to be satisfied with it; those Liberals who think religion and freedom are alike served by the absence of all connection between Church and State will regard the judgment as a ticklish experiment, and will observe with interest the spread of anti State Church opinions amongst the Ritualists, which it has already occasioned. Perhaps by the time Mr. Samuel Morley has made up his mind to be a Churchman, the High Churchmen will have resolved to become Dissenters."

In a pastoral just issued, Dr. Ellicott, remarking on the same judgment, insists upon obedience to the law of the land in this matter, and condemns all "evasion or passive resistance" as "in a high degree disloyal and culpable." But while the Ritualists are thus instructed as to their duty, the Evangelicals are reminded that if the recent judgment condemns candles and genuflections, it at the same time "as strongly condemns that neglect of the plain rules of our Prayer-book, which has led to so much of the present re-action." The Bishop points out that the question of "vestments" still remains open, and he appears to be desirous that it should be settled by the Privy Council, "if possible, in a friendly suit."

O. S. B., "Ignatius," writes to the editor of the Daily News:

"Many of your readers are interested in the fate of our Norwich Monastery, and the beautiful chapel which I built there by dint of long and hard exertion. Yesterday one of our Norwich brothers wrote to me that Mr. D. had let our chapel to a Miss Robinson, a lady preacher among the Dissenters of Norwich, and that our beautiful altar and choir screen (upon which I have expended large sums out of my own private purse) are to be demolished, in order to make the building more suitable for dissenting worship. Our Benedictine brother also tells me that this Mr. D. intends turning out our community from the old chapel, and letting it to this good lady for a school. Seeing that Mr. D. has obtained possession of my property in an illegal manner, I think it right to inform my friends, through your instrumentality, that I shall bring an action against any person who shall presume to use our monastery chapel without my permission. As a suit in Chancery is being instituted against this Mr. D. at the present time for illegality in this matter, I think he is a very unwise man thus to challenge mine and my friends' feelings by pretending to let the chapel which I built and paid for, for monastic worship, to a female preacher among the Norwich Dissenters. I greatly respect the love and zeal of Dissenters, but, as I built my chapel for Catholic worship, I shall not allow it to be 'let' for other purposes."

Referring to the disestablishment of the English Church, the Daily News points out that much more than the financial question is involved in it. The connection with the State is probably the sole bond which could keep three religions in one Church. That there are virtually three religions in the Church of England at this moment will hardly be denied by any one who considers the vastness of the differences which separate each of its three parties from the other two. What is to retain them in the same organisation when once their common relation to the Establishment is at an end? The Ritualist considers the teaching of the Evangelicals upon the Eucharist as little better than blasphemy, and their mode of celebrating the Communion Service as gross though unintentional sacrilege. The Evangelical retorts that the cardinal idea of Ritualist worship implies idolatry of the most degraded kind. The Rationalist surveys both alike from a pinnacle of conscious superiority, and pronounces the whole controversy to be merely a development of the material and superstitious notion of an incarnation and an atonement. The News does not say that anything is gained by the enforced coexistence of all three in one and the same society; but it ought nevertheless to be understood that the deliverance from the State control, for which Mr. Mackonochie longs, means freedom for three churches, not for one.

In some remarks on Mr. Morley's objection to the "secularization" of Church property, the Rev. Edward White, after observing that everything turns upon whether we are to leave the definition of "sacred" and "secular" to the priests, says:

"Mr. Morley himself would be the first to acknowledge that the very idea of a sacred priesthood as restricted to the clergy is an abuse; that a layman may, under certain circumstances, at least once a year give a sound lecture to the ministry; and that the character of priesthood belongs to all 'the Lord's people.' The object of Nonconformity is, in a manner, to 'secularise' the priesthood by destroying the false notion of clerical sacredness. The name 'Church,' again, has been by the priests appropriated to the clergy. We have secularised that also, and taught the people that they form the true Church of God. In the same manner we have succeeded in teaching the Crown that its 'majesty' is not more 'sacred' than the rights of the people. We have already secularised, at the time of the Reformation, vast quantities of landed property, formerly consecrated to the private use of mitred abbots and idle monks, and everything assures us that the future course of legislation will tend towards the secularisation of that which remains. In one word, the holiest use will be found in the people's welfare. The nature of the public use in every case is a fair subject for open discussion; the question of the appropriation of Church property to education, to the relief of the poor, or to the payment of taxes brought on the nation by wars instigated more or less directly by clerical influence and policy, upholding Continental despotism in Church and State, is a fair matter for debate. But 'secularisation' in some sense is the certain issue of future legislation. To whatever use the Church property may be applied, it will be said to be 'desecrated' and 'consecrated' by Mr. Morley's clerical supporters; but not all their outcries will succeed in preventing the establishment of new practical definitions of secular and sacred. And England will not be frightened at a word when once it has been let into the secret of the Latin Seculum."

Referring to the Bishop of Peterborough's recent discourse, in which he spoke as if the clergy of the Establishment were the only channels of communication between the poor of our large towns and the suburban rich, the Freeman justly remarks:—

"Of course the Bishop sees only by the light of his own position. The State confers on ministers of his sect a position and status which give them an unquestionable advantage in making charitable appeals; but he is quite mistaken, as much so as the Spectator recently, if he supposes that Dissenting congregations are not also, and almost universally, media for conveying to the poor around them the benefits of Christian visitation and kindness. Dissenters have not, of course, many rich men amongst them; but it is ungenerous of Churchmen first to depress the social position of the Free Church ministry, next to boast of having the wealth and the property of the kingdom with them, and then to represent themselves as surpassing those who arrogate no special advantages to themselves at the nation's cost. We believe that in proportion to it means, though ignored by the State, Dissenters accomplish vastly more for the poor and ignorant than the State Church clergy do."

Mr. Mackonochie wrote a letter to the Times a few days since, strongly advocating the dissolution of the "ungodly alliance" of Church and State, and expressing his belief that, from the way in which some remarks that fell from him at a meeting of the Ritualists last week were received, the conviction is gaining ground that the time has come for the Church to claim deliverance from the yoke of State control. Looking at the matter, he says, from a State point of view, an equitable union of Church and State is only possible when the two terms are co-extensive. In any other case, one of two difficulties will arise—either the influence of the Church in the affairs of State will be a burden to those subjects who do not belong to her pale, or else (which is the more probable alternative) the yoke of the State will press heavily upon the conscience of the Church. The English Establishment dates from a time when the two were co-extensive, and a continuance of this condition was assumed at the Reformation, but it has not been realized, nor will any one dare to predict that it is likely to be realized. So that even from this point of view the union of Church and State is an anachronism, and ought to be swept away. But, taking higher ground, what right, he asks, has the Spouse of Christ to ally herself with the powers of the world? Surely to do so is to commit that terrible spiritual adultery against which her Lord has so often warned her. If the State be unbelieving the very idea is an offence to the dullest spiritual instinct; and the opposite hypothesis is even worse. A Christian State is the child of the Church. It is of the Church in such a State that each individual is "begotten again of God in Christ Jesus;" it is by her that each is fed; by her prayer and blessing that all State acts seek for help from God; by her anointing that the sovereign is set apart for the high functions of Government. Can we then defend adultery between a mother and her son? Such he believes to be, and always to have been, the nature of union between Church and State. Doubtless, the State owes to the Church all the affectionate care and support that a dutiful son can give to his mother; but this is not the theory of Establishment. The Jewish Church began to fall from God, and ultimately sank into idolatry, from the time that it became an Establishment in the reign of Saul. The reign of Constantine was the beginning of the decline of Christianity in spiritual things quite as much as it was the beginning of its rise in temporal grandeur. Mr. Mackonochie does not advocate, but on the contrary, strongly opposes secession from the Church of England; what he wishes is a corporate separation of the Church from the State, and he urges that to agitate for this object is the duty alike of citizens and of Churchmen.

In a subsequent letter, addressed to the Daily Telegraph, touching upon the idea that the State may keep the Church revenues to itself, he says, "freedom will be cheaply purchased by those who believe that they have a Divine mission at such a price." And, after giving "a rough, suggestive view" of the way in which he considers that the Church property might be justly treated, he adds, "but, be that as it may, I for one say let the State send forth the Church roofless and penniless, but free, and I will say 'Thank you.'"

AMERICAN NOTES.

A few weeks ago, we gave some remarks by Professor Gardner, of Chicago University, on creeds, in reply to an article which appeared in the New York Nation. Finding that what he said conveyed a wrong impression, he writes to that paper to correct it, and says:

"I am interpreted as expressing a hostility to creeds in toto and per se. I not only disclaim the truth of this interpretation, and regret that I should have been so thoroughly misunderstood, but now reassert what I supposed I had clearly stated before, viz.: That I agree with all orthodox believers in considering some creed necessary to proper church organisation, but differ very materially in regard to its relative importance in the same. . . . I conceive the whole spirit and teaching of the Scriptures to indicate the brotherhood of the church, and brotherhood implies at least unity of organisation. . . . We are all one in Christ, and Christ is our elder brother. We all acknowledge this, too, by addressing each other as brethren. The question then arises, how shall we organise so as to make this a living, palpable fact to the world as well as to ourselves? Manifestly, by making that the prominent idea or basis of our visible organisation which is more than all else the index of the supposed fact.

"Now, the cardinal doctrine of Christianity is an unconditional and unbiased seeking after purity of heart, the legitimate result of which, we are taught, will be perfect love toward God and man—a fulfilment, in this way, of all the requirements of the law and the prophets. What we, as a church or a brotherhood wish to promote in ourselves, and make manifest to the world, is this seeking after purity of heart; and if we can find one characteristic which, more than any other, indicates to ourselves and others the fact of this new life begun, this should be the basis for our visible organisation. What saith the Scriptures? 'We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren.' Again, 'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.' The one characteristic of all others, then, which is best evidence to ourselves, and the world outside, that we have truly begun the better life, is 'love,' or, as the word is elsewhere translated, 'charity.' Neither of these terms seems to convey the true idea of the original word, ἀγάπη, and in my previous communication I preferred to call it sympathy, as more nearly interpreting to our minds now what I understand to be the true signification of the word. We would make, then ἀγάπη, or 'sympathy,' the basis of church organisation for the reasons above stated; and I feel called upon to say this, because I think it evident to Christians themselves, as well as the world at large, that 'creed,' by reason of the relative importance it holds in the Church, is now and has from the first been the basis of Protestant Church organisation—an error, I conceive, second only to the Catholic error of an organisation upon the basis of 'works.' Faith has come to be synonymous with 'creed,' or the acceptance of a creed, and 'creed' has thus virtually become the door of the church. Whereas Christ says, 'I am the door.' To enter this door requires something more than the acceptance of a 'creed'—an experimental knowledge of the way through, namely; and, as I said before, this is best expressed in one word, by 'trust,' not 'faith.' But this experimental knowledge of Christ through trust in him results in ἀγάπη, or sympathy with him and his teachings, as well as with all who have passed through a like experimental knowledge. We may not have all arrived at the result by exactly the same mental processes. In truth, so long as language is the imperfect medium it is now, and always has been, for the communication of ideas, it is foolish and unreasonable to expect it. It is sufficient to inquire whether the result has been attained. At this point, and not before, arises the necessity for church organisation, and the new instinct which demands it should be its basis, for the same reason that another instinct is the basis of the family relation, and another of the state. Since, then, religious experience is the result of thought and feeling fused into one, and one is naught without the other, so far as religion is concerned, it seems illogical to me to maintain that 'credo' is the basis of all religi- us as well as intellectual life. Finally, let us, as Christians manifest our love for Christ by loving each other, and not by wrangling as to how we all come to have this same love and can best assert it."

A letter from Oneida Creek, by one who had spent several days among them, gives the following account of the Communists there, which agrees in the main with Mr. Hepworth Dixon's description of them:

"The community numbers about 275; but about 25 of this number are at their settlement of Wallingford, in the state of Connecticut, and about 300 miles from here. Of the 250 that are here, there are about as many males as females, of various ages. They have a farm of about 520 acres, on which they conduct the following business:—Grazing, corn growing, fruit growing, preserving fruits, corn, and vegetables; shopkeeping, silk spinning, ironfoundry, steel-trap making; and the writing, editing, printing, and publication of a weekly newspaper—the Circular. For 34 years they have persevered, through many great difficulties, in publishing and gratuitously circulating a periodical. * * * The clerking, printing, and editing are done by the female members of the community. The whole party seem to lead a blameless, industrious, contented, and useful life. They are intensely theological, profoundly scriptural, and enthusiastically Christian; and they found their practice on their theology, of which one of the vital points is the doctrine that what they call 'Christ's second coming' took place at the destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 70. They consider themselves civilized enough to do without old-fashioned marriage, and they look for God's will to be 'done in earth as it is in heaven, where they nei her marry nor are given in marriage.' However, they do not object to marriage for 'people in the world who know no better.' In their school I found a party of nineteen remarkably bright and happy-looking little children. They have entertained me very kindly, and I believe them to be constantly kind towards each other and everybody. Their spiritual leader is Mr. Noyes, a man of deep thought and great learning. You may be sure that among these hundreds of Communists there is a great diversity of talent, disposition, and education. They have no private property, but have all things in common. They have meetings every evening in their great hall, for hearing news, &c., reading aloud, and again for conversation. Sometimes they have concerts and theatrical performances. Last night, one of their members, who is a highly-educated university man, gave us a lecture on chemistry, illustrated by experiments. Some business was soon gone through. 'Rule Britannia,' and some other songs, were beautifully sung. On Mr. E.'s asking for criticism, about a dozen male and female members of the community talked about Mr. E. one after the other, for half an hour, commending his good and condemning his bad qualities. The criticism is very highly valued for keeping the members on their good behaviour, and in good humour. Everybody labours with his hands, and everybody (of whatever age) is a student. Some of the helps work ten hours a day, and some eight; but the members usually work not more than eight hours in summer, and four in winter. One man—who was crippled by a tree falling upon him while working at the clearing of the farm in its early days—has become a very good shorthand writer and reporter. These people usually have three meals a day—at six a.m., mid-day, and six p.m.; and they scarcely eat any fish or flesh, but live very much upon a great variety of fruits, and of farinaceous and vegetable food. They seem to be working in earnest for the public good. They consider that their movement is in its infancy, and look forward to having a free university—the greatest and best in the nation."

Dr. Bushnell has published a new work entitled "The Moral Uses of Dark Things." It is said to be characterised by the wonderful combination of sharp-sightedness and far-sightedness which gives to Dr. Bushnell's thinking its great charm, and which in their extreme manifestations become undue subtlety and a far-reaching after what lies in reality nearer at hand.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT. — Mr. E. Coleman, student of the Home Missionary Board and Owens College, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the congregation at Accrington to become their minister.

OPEN CHURCH PAPERS.

BY BROOKE HERFORD.

III. THE FEELING OF THE PEOPLE ABOUT CHURCHES.

I BELIEVE that the departure from the ancient and once universal principle of regarding the Temples of God, as essentially open, public places, as open as our public parks, and the gradual substitution in Protestant sects of the plan of building them as proprietary meeting-houses has been injurious every way.

It has been injurious to those attached to the churches. It has dwarfed their whole idea of what they ought to aim at in their building and supporting of a church of God. It has led them to measure what they should do in this way by what may be sufficient for their own comfort or convenience. It is quite a mistake to suppose that men will be most liberal when they are doing something merely for themselves. The rich man who throws his grounds open for the public to walk through freely, is far more likely to care with a noble liberality for their being made as beautiful as possible, than he who keeps them fast closed for himself and his friends. So a congregation will never feel the pride and the delight which Christian men and women should feel in making their church and its worship as beautiful and attractive as possible until they take up the old idea, and make the church once more freely open to all.

But the system of pewed and allotted churches is most mischievous in its effects on those outside, unattached to them. The simple fact is that they are almost universally chilled and repelled by the aspect which churches and worship have thus, quite without intention, come to wear.

Do not think that I exaggerate on this matter. The feeling of the people at large about churches has changed. They do not regard them as they were regarded everywhere of old, and are still upon the continent, as places of free public resort. They do not feel them to be any concern, except of those who form their congregation. They look upon them as proprietary, and mostly, middle-class institutions, where the poor may obtain commoner places at a cheaper rate, and some sort of places even for nothing. I do not say that such a feeling is just. I do not think it is: I believe that most congregations are only too glad to extend the largest hospitality to strangers, even to the poorest. But they do not know this: you cannot get them to feel it; they only know that when they do go in, the whole arrangements are such as to remind them that they are occupying somebody's private place; the tokens of reserved occupancy meet their eye all about them, they are half afraid of somebody coming who will regard them as intruders, and on the whole they do not feel at ease, and prefer to keep away. My experience on this particular matter in Sheffield and at Strangeways is, to me, most suggestive. Almost under the walls of the Upper Chapel in Sheffield was a dense poor district, comprising many narrow streets and courts from which came a large proportion of our Sunday scholars, and in which probably not one family in ten had any connection with any place of worship except through the children attending some school. We divided the neighbourhood into districts, and our visitor visited with tracts from house to house. The people were earnestly invited to the chapel, and told that they would be welcomed and have comfortable seats and—nothing to pay. Except in a very few instances we could not get them to come. Now and then one or two would drop in, in the evening, and they often were welcomed, for I had many of my people there who shared my desire, and our chapel-keeper knew my feeling and put them into thoroughly comfortable seats, where he knew that they would not be disturbed, the owners being of that kind of people who find “once a day quite as much as they can stand.” But these poor people did not know this. How could they? I have watched them many a time, for I used to set a great store on these poor stragglers of the neighbourhood, and longed for nothing more than to make them feel that our chapel was a happy place to come to. Well; all through the earlier part of the service I have seen the signs of that feeling of not being at ease. Every time the door opened and a dress rustled down the aisle I have seen them glancing timidly back, evidently wondering whether the new comer was coming to this seat, and if so, where they should put themselves to be most out of the way. There was the sad fact—they were not at ease. There was abundant room for five hundred more, and yet in all that space there was not a corner into which a poor stranger might creep without feeling that he or she was in somebody's place. And the result was that it was difficult to get them to come at all, more difficult still to get them to come a second time. And we never got any of this class to attend regularly.

Now curiously enough, I have a similar district, only rather poorer and more neglected (Green-gate), at the same distance, if anything a little further off, from my present chapel in Strangeways. It is visited exactly in the same way, and by the same class of visitors; but instead of the inducements held out in the former case, the following is the invitation given on every tract-cover:

“You are invited to attend this church. You will not have to ask to be shown to a seat, nor be troubled by thinking you are in some one else's place, but can come in and sit wherever you like, as the whole church is open and unappropriated, and books, &c., are freely provided throughout for public use.

“There are no pew rents; the church entirely depends upon the offerings of the people, which are collected at every service, that all who are disposed may have an opportunity of helping, in the simplest and easiest way. No one will know what any other gives. The poorest with the smallest offering,—with none at all, if none can be spared,—will be as welcome as the rich.”

What has been the result? After four years' work we have more of these people attending in any single month than I was able to get during the whole of my nine years' working in Sheffield. They are just as reluctant to come at first, being unable to realise that the feeling they have been accustomed to associate with churches and chapels will not beset them in ours also. But when they have once been, they feel at ease in coming again, and the offertory instead of being a hindrance gives them a feeling of independence.

I do not say that the disinclination I have spoken of to enter pewed churches may not be overcome. It may be by some special attraction—a startling popular preacher, the reputation of very fine music something out of the common way in the service, will bring in crowds, who will not be kept out by pews or anything else. But that is not what is really needed. I am sure there is enough of comfort in our churches, enough of beauty in sacred music, enough that is interesting in the services of religion to make people glad to turn in for a quiet restful hour now and then without any special attraction, if only you can once let them understand that our churches are freely open to all, that they can go in and sit anywhere they like without the formality of being shown to a place, and without the discomfort, when they have been shown to a place, of feeling doubtful whether it may not be wanted, whether they are quite welcome.

ENCOURAGEMENTS TO THE UNITARIAN MINISTRY.

THE annual meeting of the Manchester New College Trustees, and the annual examination, with its attendant gatherings, of the Home Missionary Board, draw our attention away from the exciting ecclesiastical topics of the day, to the thought of those who are entering the ministry in our small section of the great Church of CHRIST, and to the work, the opportunities, and the difficulties which await them. And, certainly, if any encouragement be needed for them, it is afforded by the aspect of the greater church around which gather the ecclesiastical interests of the day. If, on the one hand, there is something attractive in the power and prestige of the so-called Church of England—if its parochial system appears to give the worker for CHRIST a vantage ground for his work upon society, and its ritual to surround his services with an attraction which he could hardly find in our Nonconformist worship—yet, on the other hand, these advantages are only to be obtained at the cost of loss and injury in points which touch the very heart of religious life and work. It is almost pitiable to mark the confusion and dismay, the timid waiting upon ecclesiastical injunctions, the inability to see the open way of duty, which characterise the utterances called forth in the Establishment by the present crisis. We need go no further than Mr. MACKONOCHE's letter on the subject of severing the connection between the State and the Church for evidence of this. After setting forth his desire for some measure of this kind, and the terms on which it might be equitably done, he says, “but be that as it may, I for one say, let the State send forth the Church roofless and penniless, but free, and I will say, ‘Thank you.’” One cannot help asking where is Mr. MACKONOCHE's difficulty? What need is there for him to wait for the State to do anything? The freedom for which he sighs simply waits for his own will to take it, and as we read such a sentence as this we cannot help feeling how utterly confusing and distorting must be that whole atmosphere of establishment in which such men have grown up, thus to blind them to the reality of all the religious work going on in the country except their own, and to lead them to fancy that there is no standing-place for true ministry outside the pale of that biggest of the sects which is at present one of the departments of the State.

The ministry among ourselves, if it has not such brilliant prospects to offer, does at least afford this—a humble post of service in which a true and reverent worker may live out what life of Christ-like endeavour, and speak whatever thoughtful word, he has in him, in almost perfect freedom. Perfect freedom of course there cannot be where a man has to work with others, and those others constitute, as in the case of a congregation, the element of permanent life in which his own leadership and ministry is only a temporary incident. But the hindrances to freedom among us are only those arising out of consideration and respect for others, and the need of a certain harmony of feeling between those engaged in a great common work. They are not such as any fair-minded man will feel to be a difficulty, and it is seldom indeed that they will not gradually yield to the freest working out of a ministry at once loving and devout and inspired by true self-devotion. To such a ministry the state of the world affords infinite encouragement—not to a routine ministry, not to half-hearted professionalism. There never, probably, was a time when the ministry was so poor an investment in any worldly aspects, or when it could yield so little of any kind of gratification, if done in any spirit but the very highest; but let any man of even fair power take it up with all his heart, and give himself thoroughly to it, and he will find that there could never be a time when his work was more wanted, nor a time when, done in such a spirit, it would meet with warmer appreciation. The great encouragements of the time are the great needs of the time. The impatience of mere creeds, craving in men's hearts for a simple, rational religious faith; the distrust of all religion of mere forms and conventionalities, welcoming every setting forth of religion that takes hold of the realities of life, and speaks with a voice of helpful power; the very apathy and alienation from all churches of the mass of the people in our great cities, bringing to every man's very door the saddest and most touching appeal for fearless and devoted effort—all these things are, to every man who has it in him to do a true work for God and Christ, elements of opportunity as noble as heart could desire.

"Give me a fulcrum for my lever," said the philosopher ARCHIMEDES, "and I will move the world." It is what every young minister hopes for as he is looking forward to his work. He would fain move the moral world, and longs for a position from which he may be able to do it. That position he may find in even the humblest post of ministerial service that our churches open to him. Wherever there are even a few faithful ones united in the desire to grow up into a true church of Christ, when there is a little band of teachers trying to do their best in a Sunday school, there is a position from which, if a man will be content with small beginnings, and has any form of moral and religious courage in him, he may move the world. For what is needed is not new and startling methods for presenting our faith and winning the ear of the people. We need not have our ministers afraid of any new methods that may open fairly out in the doing of their work, and have indeed again and again urged that they must be more watchful to see, and prompt to take, such openings, and that the full work of the present day can not be wrought out without they are; but not the less is it true herein, as in all things,—the duty that lies nearest, first. So it is from keeping up in the most perfect efficiency the humble workings that we already have, from making our small congregations, such as they are, more into true churches, fulfilling in all kindly faithful ways the round of such ministry as waits everywhere for the departing students of our colleges, that they shall grow up to greater power and larger work; by faithfulness in few things that they shall come to be rulers over many.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

FROM DOUBT TO FAITH.

We watched the cold fields sown with corn,
And said, "This life is most forlorn."
The hungry cows tore up all day,
We said, "Thus good is plucked away."
The bitter snow fell fast all night,
We said, "Life ends in shrouds of white."

Wondering, we watched the early year,
And said, "Lo, tender blades appear."
All day the sun, all night the dew,
We said, "Life has its changes too."
Slowly came the stems and ears,
We said, "Much promise disappears."

In Autumn we walked forth again,
The fields were heaped with yellow grain;
Then blithely garnered up in store,
The dangers of the corn were o'er.
Then said we, "God is good indeed,
He watched and blessed the farmer's seed."

We said with tears, "Increase our faith,
Even as Thy Son's disciple saith."
We said, "In hope we spend our breath,
And wait for eyes to see this death."
Our souls we give to Him to keep,
Till angels His great harvest reap.
And homeward hand-in-hand we went,
Feeling we knew what this life meant.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XVI.

A STRANGE OFFERTORY.

The New York Sun vouches for this:—A preacher in a frontier settlement had been collecting money for some church object. There was still some 20 dollars wanting, and after vain efforts to make up the deficiency, he plainly intimated, as he locked the church door one day after service, that he intended to have that said 20 dollars before any of them left the house. At the same time he set the example by tossing five dollars on the table. Another put down a dollar, another half of a dollar, another a quarter of a dollar, and so on. The parson read out every now and then the state of the funds. "Thar's seven and a half, my friends,"

"Thar's nine and a quarter." "Ten and six bts are all that are in the hat, friends and Christian brethren." Slowly it mounted up. "Twelve and a half." "Fourteen." "Fifteen." "Sixteen and three bits," and so on until it stuck at 19 dollars 50 cents. "It only wants fifty cents, friends, to make up the amount. Will nobody make it up?" Everybody had subscribed, and not a cent more was forthcoming. Silence reigned, and how long it might have lasted it is difficult to say, had not a half dollar been passed through the open window, and a rough explanatory voice shouted, "Here, parson, there is your money; let out my gal, I'm about tired of waitin' for her!"

UNIVERSITY PREACHING.

In his "Recollections of Oxford," Mr. Cox tells us he heard Dr. Tatham deliver the famous sermon in which he wished "all the Jarman critics at the bottom of the Jarman ocean," and which concluded with a passage less generally known—"I leave the subject to be followed up by the larned bench of bishops, who have little to do, and do not always do that little." As a sample of the old style of sermon, he gives the following specimen of sound ing verbiage, which was noted down at the time: "A system thus hypothetically elaborated is, after all, but an inexplicable concatenation of hyperbolic incongruity." And he says, "such sentences, delivered in a regular cadence, formed too often our Sunday fare, in days happily gone by."

RATHER TOO BAD.

In a work just published, entitled "Last Winter in America," the Rev. F. B. Zincke relates this good story. A minister had opened the proceedings with prayer. He was followed by a rival preacher. The latter, after dwelling for some time on general topics, at last came up to his opponent in the following way: he prayed that the gifts of the Spirit might be poured on all his brethren in the ministry abundantly, and then added, "And on behalf of our brother whose words we have just heard, we offer this special supplication, that his heart may become as soft as his head."

A SCOTCH PREACHER.

Many amusing anecdotes are told of Mr. Robert Shirra, minister of the secession church of Kirkcaldy. Here are one or two that are vouched for as authentic:—Once when he was reading the 119th Psalm, "I will run the way of Thy commandments when Thou shalt enlarge my heart," he said, "Well, David, what is your first resolution? 'I will run.' Run away, David, what hinders you. What is your next? 'I will run the way of Thy commandments.' Better run yet, David. What is your next? 'I will run the way of Thy commandments when Thou shalt enlarge my heart.' No thanks to you, David; we could all run as well as you with such help." He was occasionally quite eloquent as well as quaint. One of the finest refutations of the notion of human equality—no equality of rights, as we understand it, but inherent equality as the French proclaimed it (or were supposed to have done)—was uttered by this minister in reply to a deputation from his congregation who had requested his views of the then novel doctrine. He said:—"My friends, I had a call from some of you the other day, desiring to know my opinion on liberty and equality; when I told you, if you came here to-day, I might let you know. Now, since I had your visit I have travelled in spirit over the universe, and I shall just tell you what I have seen in my travels. I have travelled over the earth, its frozen and burning zones, mountains and valleys, moist places and dry, fertile lands and sandy deserts, and I have found men and children, big and little, strong and weak, wise and ignorant, good and bad, powerful and helpless, rich and poor. No equality there. I have travelled through the sea, its depths and shoals, rocks and sandbanks, whirlpools and eddies; and I have found monsters and worms, whales and herrings, sharks and shrimps, mackerel and sprats, the strong devouring the weak, the big swallowing the little. No equality there. I have ascended to heaven with its greater and lesser lights, suns and satellites, and I have found thrones and dominions, principalities and powers, angels and archangels, cherubim and seraphim. No equality there. I have descended into hell, and there I found Beelzebub, the prince of devils, and his grim counsellors, Moloch and Belial, tyrannising over the other devils, and all of them over wicked men's souls. No equality there. This is what I have seen in my travels, and I think I have travelled far enough; but if any of you are not altogether satisfied with what I have told you, and wish to go in search of liberty and equality yourselves, you may find them somewhere that I have not visited. You need not travel the same road that I have done, for I can tell you positively you will not find what you want on the earth, neither in the sea, neither in heaven, neither in hell. If you think of finding them any where else, you may try. Meanwhile I have given you all the information I can. It rests with you to make a proper use of it."

AN ODD CONCATENATION.

In reporting Dr. Vaughan's speech at Doncaster, in which he referred to the possible decrease of Church Establishments, at the close of the proceedings, the local journal relates, with unconscious gravity, "The choir then sang 'Who Killed Cock Robin?' after which Dr. Vaughan closed the meeting by a few seasonable observations on the uncertainty of human life."

THE UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

On Monday last the annual public examinations of the students in connection with the above institution were commenced in the lecture room of the Memorial Hall, and the whole of the meetings arising out of them have been attended with great interest and pleasure. We noticed present, at various times during the proceedings, the following:—Revs. Dr. Beard, W. Gaskell, M.A., John Wright, B.A., and Brooke Herford (tutors); Henry Green, M.A., and S. A. Stinthal (visitors); R. M. Shipman, Esq. (president); Ivie Mackie, Esq. (treasurer); R. v. James Drummond, B.A., and E. C. Harding, Esq. (secretaries); Revs. H. E. Dowson, B.A. (Gee Cross), D. Davis, B.A. (Lancaster), Jeffery Worthington (Bolton), H. McKean (Oldbury), Chas. C. Coe (Lancaster), H. Echus (Coseley), G. Ride (Chorley), H. Austin, (Cirencester), D. Berry (Mossley), J. Freeston (Rochdale), J. Harrop, E. Allen (Lydgate), G. H. Wells, M.A. (Gorton), H. Hill (Stannington), T. Timmins, B. Glover (Crewe), D. Matts (Ballymoney), James W. Braithwaite (Horsham), F. Revitt (Mottram), Jas. C. Street and E. H. Hopkinson (Newcastle-on-Tyne), A. Rushton (Blackley), W. George Cadman (Dob Lane), John G. Slater (Aberdeen), W. W. Robinson (Boston), T. E. Poynting (Monton), C. T. Poynting, B.A. (Monton), W. Oates (Birkenhead), John Fox (Heywood), J. Black, M.A. (Stockport), H. Williamson (Dundee), Joseph Smith (Idle), J. Birks (Kingswood), M. C. Frankland (Chowbent), George Fox (Park Lane), W. H. Herford, B.A., C. B. Upton, B.A. (Liverpool); Mr. Pinnock, Mayor of Newport, I.W.; Messrs. B. Heape, W. H. Talbot, Geo. Smith, E. Bowman, M.A., W. A. Case, M.A. (London), J. H. Reynolds, Alderman C. S. Grundy, Richard Aspden, John Armstrong, Joseph Lupton (Leeds), Smith Golland, Harry Rawson, John A. Cleworth, Thomas Rawson, Jesse Pilcher, Miles Mayall, D. Buckley Joseph Wrigley (Mossley), J. E. Heywood (Oldham), John Grundy (Somerset), W. Hickin, jun., F. Ashton, T. Elgood (Sale), G. T. Taylor, G. W. Walsley, C. J. Herford, Peter Eckerley, B. Templar, George Lemmon, F. Taylor (Bolton), William Shawcross; Major Coppock (Stockport), Dr. Marcus and Dr. Kestenberg.

The various days' examinations were as follows:

MONDAY.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

Was held at six o'clock on Monday evening; R. M. SHIPMAN, Esq., presiding.

The annual report was read by the Rev. J. DRUMMOND, one of the honorary secretaries:—

During the session there had been 15 students engaged in the regular courses of study. Mr. Matthews, one of the students had been connected with the Board as an Owens scholar during the first term. Mr. Coleman had held an Owens scholarship during the whole year, and would continue his connection with the Board till the end of next year. The committee regretted that none of the retiring students had sought the advantages of continued study by becoming candidates for the scholarship. Of the six students who had completed their course, Mr. Whitham had an invitation to become the minister of Christ Church, Nottingham; Mr. Macleod would enter upon ministerial duties at Nantwich; Mr. Brunton would occupy the pulpit at Mildenhall. The annual examination of candidates for admission was held as usual in October. Only two were selected as equal to the requirements of the Board—Mr. William Freeston, of Bury; and Mr. Thomas Bennett Bradick, of Duxfield. In accordance with a suggestion made in the altered rules adopted at the last annual meeting a course of lectures on the laws of health had been delivered by Dr. J. S. Fletcher, and which it was hoped the students would find of great service in their future career. The committee had to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of two volumes for the library, from the Rev. E. Kell, and complete sets of the Prospective and National Reviews, from Mrs. Charles J. Herford. They must also again record their indebtedness to Miss Yates, whose munificence had to a great extent relieved them from the otherwise very serious embarrassment of a defective subscription list. They could not, however, regard the necessity for such generous donations without the gravest anxiety, and they would earnestly press upon the attention of their friends the great importance of obtaining increased subscriptions. They would also venture to call the attention of subscribers to the fact that subscriptions were due on the 1st January in each year; and as they had experienced some slight difficulties from the tardiness with which some of their supplies had arrived, they would request their supporters to be so kind as to remit their subscriptions when applied for. They trusted that when their wants were fully made known, their appeal would not be in vain but that their services on the increased sense of general approval and sympathy.

Mr. GEORGE WADSWORTH, jun., read the financial statement, showing the expenditure to be £1,305. 6s. 5d., and the income only £1,157. 9s. 11d., and leaving a balance due to the banker of £147. 16s. 6d. The amounts received for subscriptions were—arrears of 1867, £55 16s.; for 1868 (old), £710. 9s.; ditto (new), £24. 6s. 6d.; total, £790. 11s. 6d.

Mr. RICHARD ASPDEN asked what was the amount of the outstanding subscriptions.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY replied that they amounted to about £120, of which some £25 or £30 had been received since the 1st of January, and which had not come into the accounts of last year.

The CHAIRMAN: So that in fact the real deficiency would amount to about £25 less than £147. 16s. 6d.

Rev. D. DAVIS moved the adoption of the report.

Mr. J. LUPTON, Leeds, seconded the resolution, and said he agreed with the passage in the report which lamented that none of the students had sought the advantages of continued study by becoming candidates for the Owens College Scholarship; and he thought that so valuable an adjunct should not be disregarded. He was glad to find that some of the students were going out to begin their ministerial labours. He knew two of the stations they were going to—Nantwich and Middlesbrough—to be important centres. He adverted to the unsatisfactory condition of the accounts—one-tenth of the subscriptions being uncollected. The expenditure was £1,300, and there was a deficit of over £140. He should like to know whether this deficit came from one district or more? It was well this should be known, and the local treasurers of such districts should resign at once if they could not collect the subscriptions in a moderate time. These unpaid subscriptions had a very prejudicial effect upon the future subscription list, and he himself had refused to pay a subscription due in one year in another.

Mr. WADSWORTH explained that Bristol was in arrears £30, London £30, and Liverpool £40. Of the remaining £20, £10 was deficient in Manchester, and the remaining £10 was scattered over different parts of the country.

Dr. BEARD agreed with Mr. Lupton in regretting that there was no candidate for the Owens College scholarship this year. He had not lost sight of it. He had represented it to the students, and he was not surprised that there was no application; but it must not be inferred that the students were inferior this year, for that was not at all the case, but there were peculiar circumstances, mostly of a domestic character, which had prevented students from applying for the scholarship. It so happened that domestic circumstances and scholarship qualities did not happen to coincide in any one of these individuals.

Mr. EDDOWES BOWMAN said that this should be left to the students themselves.

The appointment of officers, and votes of thanks to the visitors, Rev. H. Green and S. A. Steintal, and to Rev. C. C. Coe for his kindness in consenting to conduct the dedicatory service, closed the proceedings.

THE ANNUAL SOIREE

was held, as usual, on Tuesday evening, the large room of the Memorial Hall being quite full; and it was pleasant to recognise many of the rank and file of the neighbouring congregations amongst the audience. R. M. Shipman, Esq., again presided.

The CHAIRMAN said that in 1853, now fifteen years ago, some gentlemen, whom he saw around him, and who felt the want of an institution for educating for the ministry these men who could not expect to attain to the advantages of the Manchester New College, met together, and a nucleus was laid for something—they hardly then knew what, nor what proportion it would ultimately be developed to. Little by little it grew, until, in 1854, the promoters of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board opened its doors with six pupils. Many and serious fears were then entertained for its success. Some thought they would do no good at all, others that they would do so much good that they would ruin the Manchester New College. At the end of fourteen years he left them to judge of the usefulness of the institution by the work which was achieved. Steadily, during the first three years, the tutors attended to their duties, and steadily did the students attend to theirs. At the end of them they had fifteen or sixteen students, and they felt strong enough to attempt—what was then an experiment—to hold their first gathering such as the present. This meeting was a proof how they had progressed. Their first president was Mr. James Yates, who gave them his countenance and support, and in their younger days to know that a man of high qualification, varied learning, and undoubted position should consent to be their president was very encouraging. As Mr. Yates was unable, from age, to attend, it fell to his (the chairman's) lot to preside on that occasion. But to-night he had been invited, not as a locum tenens for any other gentleman, but in his own behalf. (Hear, hear.) At the time of that soirée six students were sent forth, and from that time to the present twelve soirées had been held, not only successively, but successfully. At the present time 57 students had been educated, and, with one or two exceptions, were now actively and usefully employed in the duties for which they prepared themselves. This was enough to render them satisfied with the results of the Home Missionary Board.

Without it they would have been at a great loss in many of the pulpits and many of the missionary districts, and it was pretty certain that but for this board the missionary cause must have languished in many parts of England. The young men were from all classes except the most educated; not that they were uneducated men, but they came more from the ranks of the hand workers than the head workers. He had before him a list, which was published last year, of the fifty students who had left them. They had been sent to London, and as far north as Dundee and Aberdeen, as far west as Liverpool, and as far as Nottingham and Leicester. This was sufficient to prove that the institution was not merely local for Manchester and neighbourhood, but that it had really become what it had been designed to be—a national institution.

The Rev. J. BLACK said he had gladly accepted the invitation of the committee to say a few words, because it gave him the opportunity of expressing his interest in their missionary undertakings. There was a time in his own experience when such guidance as a Unitarian mission could afford might have saved him a long and anxious conflict. As to the merit of this institution and the details of the work which it was doing so well, he would leave others to speak who could speak from a better knowledge and with more authority. One word only he would like to say with reference to an objection which had been alluded to this evening and on former occasions, viz., that the efforts of the Home Missionary Board are merely adding to the number of half-educated ministers. Now it seemed to him that objection sprang from the hasty of first glances. In this, as in every denomination, if there were life in it, men would arise from among the less educated, the professionally uneducated classes, who out of the fullness of their hearts would desire and endeavour to speak the truth that was in them. It was not for this or any other board to assume the function of determining who or what class of men should take part in the active missions of the Church. What was given them to choose upon was simply whether labourers of the class referred to should or should not be assisted with an education suited to their circumstances. (Hear, hear.) On this ground he thought the board deserved the respect and support of all, because it had engaged the services of our ablest men for this useful work, and had done more to raise the standard of education for missionaries than had been done or attempted by any other denomination. On the general question of Unitarian missions he could speak almost from an external point of view, for he had not forgotten his earlier impressions about them. He had become convinced of their many peculiar advantages. He would not be understood to say that Unitarians alone had the power of doing something to satisfy the requirements of the times. In all denominations, liberal and honest men were to be found whose labours were contributing to the great ends we had in view. We felt ourselves to be labourers together with them. But Unitarians had very great and very special advantages. The religious want of the hour was a quite definite one—indeed, it was the one want, as Jesus Christ used to say, of all men—the want namely of a whole heart and a single eye. On the intellectual side, this exhibited itself in a desire to harmonise science with religion. The chairman had expressed a hope that the world was not losing its hold upon religion. For himself, he thought it was not. The very materialists, to whose case the chairman had alluded, showed us that in the least likely circumstances men would seek a religion of some kind. More recently, some of the leaders of the material philosophy were beginning to draw very clearly the line between matter and mind. That was the opening of an era in which due place would be given to whatever is loftiest and holiest in man. There had been a time of troubled darkness with many. The sun, for their horizon, had gone down; but they remained even then with open eyes and ears listening for the sounds of the morning. Now, again, the light was shining in; a murmuring which, as the sailors say, accompanies the sunrise like a Memnon's voice, was heard on the waters; and assuredly the ascending light would shine more and more unto the perfect day. The true difficulty was not as to the existence of religion, but its consistency with science. Now the Unitarians had solved the problem at once, when they had concluded that acceptance with God depended entirely upon a man's faithfulness to his conscience. Science was left to its own province, and they could appreciate its high value without any misgiving. He had spoken of the felt need of consistency on the intellectual side. There was another aspect—that connected with our active life. Here also Unitarianism had the advantage. With others, the doctrines of original sin and eternal punishment imparted an asceticism to their religion which could not be ignored. No doubt the majority of Christians lived and felt much like ourselves. But their views of business and of their relation to the natural world were out of harmony with their creed. According to that, the grand aim of this life was just to escape the wrath to come. With ourselves, the present bears to a future life the relation which the child bears to the man; and there is no sense of inconsistency between our common life and our religion. He might have touched upon another advantage we possessed—the political and ecclesiastical one. But it was not necessary for him to repeat what they had all heard so often on the question of creeds. With such advantages, he trusted they would not be found inactive. He looked forward to the time when the world would at last receive as its acknowledged religion the truths in which they placed their faith. They were to labour towards that consummation, neither allowing their zeal to overstep their respect for the rights of conscience, nor letting their reverence for these impede their activity. They could not in any form be exclusionists or oppressors. But in that day, when, as Jesus Christ foretold, the meek shall inherit the earth, then should they go in and possess the good land which the Lord their God giveth them.

Mr. JOSEPH LUPTON expressed his warm interest in the Home Missionary Board, and urged that greater support should be given to it by the denomination at large. He had been asked especially to repeat to that large meeting what he had said the night before, that subscribers ought to be prompt in paying subscriptions when due, and he spoke of the towns, of which he was very glad to say Leeds was not one, which were in arrears. He concluded by expressing the pleasure he felt in seeing how chastely and beautifully the decoration of the hall had been carried out by Mr. Worthington, the architect.

The CHAIRMAN alluded to the dedicatory service to be held the following evening, and expressed his pleasure that Mr. Coe had consented to conduct it.

The Rev. C. C. COE said that it was rather he who had to thank the committee for the honour they had done him in inviting him. Though, however, he would rather that the students had had to address him than that he should have to address them, yet he was sure if he could only infuse into the service one-tenth of the good feeling he had towards the students, it would not be altogether a failure. As to the interest he took in the labours of the Home Missionary Board, he could only say that very soon after his own ministerial education was finished he had felt it his duty to manifest his sense of the importance of the Board, and had made himself a life member; and this year, long before he had any idea that he should be selected to take part with them, he had made arrangements to be present at the examination. (Hear, hear.) He was glad to see it in its home at that hall, and when he thought of the great number of efficient men who had gone forth from it, he felt that the institution had great claims to their support and sympathy. It seemed to answer some of their greatest needs. There are three things that struck him with wonder. First, that there was a great deficiency of young men to swell the ranks of the ministry. Some had not the means as educated men to enter it, and others who have the means did not like the prospect, partly, perhaps, because they did not think the ministry the best opening in a worldly point of view, and partly because they shrank from the criticisms that generally were poured upon the minister's devoted head. The second was that in spite of all their activities, there is a very large number of the people associated with no kind of religion—some in respectable positions of life, and some amongst the poor; while many were even in positive antagonism to it, careless and indifferent—often neglecting their wives and families, and ready to drop into the ranks of pauperism. To this class especially their missionaries needed to go, and he should rejoice to hear of their doing a good and faithful work amongst them. The other marvel to him was that our churches, with all their efforts, did not seem to increase as they ought to do. He suspected, however, that the reason was in part that they need a more definite organisation as well as a little more positive teaching. (Hear, hear.) If there were a more popular element in the government of our churches he was sure they would be more attractive to a vast number of people. But while he believed there was a great work for the ministers trained in the Home Missionary Board to do, he also heartily believed in the necessity of drawing them from all ranks of life. He would like to see the rich men in their congregations not only supporting with generous pecuniary aid such institutions, but doing one thing more, and that was—he would like to see some of them sending their sons into the ministry; or at least if they saw one of their sons showing any signs of fitness for it, devoting him to it; yes, and endowing him, if necessary, that he may be able to live as comfortably as his brothers. (Applause.)

W. A. CASE, Esq., M.A., of London, who was very warmly received, made a most effective speech, which we regret that we cannot report in full. After thanking the meeting for the kind welcome which had been given him, he said it seemed almost an impertinence for one like himself to come forward to address such a meeting; but the common subject they had at heart and the common interests in which they were engaged emboldened him, in compliance with the call of the chairman, to do so. He might also put in a further excuse, and that was that, when he left University College, it was his lot to be thrown somewhat into the power of Manchester life, and he then learned a lesson which had not been without its effect upon his subsequent career. He had, moreover, another credential, and that was that, as a student, he received the kindly help of their first president, to whom such proper reference had been made—Mr. Yates. (Hear, hear.) It must not, however, be on merely personal matters that he must address them, but rather upon those common interests in which they were all so deeply concerned. And he wished to say that he had often heard in London of the Home Missionary Board, and read its reports, and made himself acquainted with its doings, but until then circumstances had prevented him being present at one of their meetings. As it happened that he himself did a good deal in the way of examination, he was fortunate in being able to drop in and hear one of theirs. Now, he knew from experience that it was possible to have a very learned examination—one, indeed, that would rather show the learning of the examiner than that of the examined; but he had not felt that this was the case here. He must say that he had been surprised by what he heard. As he listened to the papers on the "Literature and Interpretation of the Scriptures," that day, he could not help feeling that he should have liked to have his friend Mr. Sharpe at his side, who was so skilled in biblical questions. As he heard the various answers given, he was greatly surprised by them, and impressed with their accuracy, as also with the way in which the students had been led to cultivate the power of reproducing the substance of the lectures that had been given them; and more than all, he was pleased to see that they were brought to appreciate the spirit of what was taught them. Well, this first examination was an excellent employment of an hour; but it was followed by another on English Literature—running over poetry, history, fable and story—which appeared to him almost exhaustive. It was the whole range of English literature, from Anglo-Saxon times, epitomised; giving the fresh sentiment of Chaucer, and the stately beauty of Milton, as well as the significance and grandeur of Shakespeare. He could assure the students that his feeling was how great, under such tutors, was the privilege which they enjoyed. (Hear, hear. If there was one thing he feared at all it was lest they should contentedly rest upon what they then got. The information was so full, the scholarship so accurate, that he felt they would need to remember that it was not the mere possession of knowledge, but the acquiring of it, which would strengthen their powers and fit them for their great and solemn duties. (Hear.) Mr. Case then proceeded to draw a distinction between the congregations in the north and those in London. In the north, he said, they were strong and succeeded pretty well in what they undertook to do; but in London there were great difficulties in the way of combination. London, in fact, was a great number of towns aggregated together, and our congregations there could not unite for common action with the same ease as those in the north are able to do. He had heard before of the feeling referred to by the Chairman of there having been a fear, on the part of some attached to Manchester New College, lest injury might be done to it by the establishment of the Home Missionary Board. He might say that his interest in the College was great, and that he was thrown into intimate relations with those engaged in conducting it, but he had never heard a word of jealousy expressed respecting the Board. They had both one common object—they might be doing a somewhat different work—but the one common object both had was that of sending out able men to do God's work in Christ's spirit. (Hear, hear.) In preparing them for this work, both were doing their best to help on the progress of truth, and through it the progress of the world. (Hear, hear.) He hoped, therefore, that in regard to each other's work they should hear nothing whatever of jealousy. How could there be any? And he must be permitted to say that, with Mr. Gaskell as one of the Visitors of the College—than whom he knew none who did more work—(loud applause)—he was sure no such feeling could arise. Having spoken of the nature and character of the particular work which was before them, he would just add a word as to the lesson they all ought to take home to themselves, which was this: That if we are to have effective ministers, they must be backed by a religious and earnest laity. (Hear, hear.) The laity had their part to do, and must strengthen the hands of their ministers, not by merely contributing a guinea to an institution like the Home Missionary Board, or by mere words, but by giving them personal help, sympathy, and co-operation. And there was yet another way in which the laity might help ministers in the performance of their duties, and that was by living up to the truths which they taught. In spite of all opposition, in spite of its being an age of compromise (for the time for compromise was not yet come), they must be faithful to that truth which would endure after all the creeds and all the dogmas which compel the human will had passed away. They must live by it, and speak it uncompromisingly, and impress upon their children the necessity of speaking it fearlessly and freely. By so doing they would be instruments of blessing, not only to themselves but to the children that might come after them. (Loud applause.)

After a short interval, the proceedings recommenced with a short address by the Rev. BROOKS BRADFORD.

The CHAIRMAN then mentioned the names of the retiring students, viz., Messrs. Leyland, Walker, Miskimmin, Brunton, Macdonald, and Whitham, and as chairman of the committee of the institution, bore testimony to their success as students, and to the way in which they had conducted themselves, and concluded by asking the good wishes of all present as an encouragement to them in the great work of reclaiming the erring and the sinful, in which they were about to engage.

Mr. LEYLAND, the senior retiring student, in reply, expressed his own thanks, and those of his fellow students, to the committee, subscribers, and tutors of the institution, and to the members of the different congregations to which they had had to preach, who had so kindly received them. But there was a way, he thought, in which they might show their thanks far better than by mere verbal phrases. He believed they all entered the institution with a Christian spirit in them, and it still remained, and he hoped that by the diligence with which they might hereafter labour in spreading the great truths they all had at heart, they would thus show, in more substantial form, their sincerest thanks. (Applause.)

The Rev. J. C. STREET, as one of the old students, gave an interesting narrative of the work that was being done at Choppington—a work begun and carried on by the former students of that board.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, as one of the visitors, said a few words, bearing his testimony to the general excellence of the different papers read by the students.

The usual vote of thanks to the chairman brought the meeting to a close.

VISITORS' ADDRESS.

At half-past four on Wednesday afternoon, the company adjourned from the lecture room to the hall above, when the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL delivered the visitors' address:

You have now, gentlemen, arrived at what I have little doubt you consider the most agreeable portion of these three arduous days—the close of your annual examination. You, gentlemen, know as well as I can do—nay, indeed, better than any of us who have sat listening here—what the true value of your examination has been. It is unjust to judge of the real progress made by the results which can be produced in a few short hours. Accidental circumstances may have made some answers fall short of what you are really able to accomplish, or may in some cases have enabled you to seem—pardon me if I say it—more deeply acquainted with a subject than it would be reasonable to expect from you. Nay, further, it is not so much the absolute amount of knowledge which a man carries away with him which renders the years spent here so valuable, as the training and discipline your minds and hearts will have received, if you have used aright the opportunities which have been offered to you here. Some of you are present to-day whom I addressed two years ago at the close of a similar examination. I have very little doubt but that if some of the questions which you then answered with such accuracy were put to you to-day, you would be unable to give the details you then had at your command, even if all the greater facts are still vividly impressed upon your memories. But this is not to be grieved over. The acquiring of those details trained your mental powers, their arrangement under their fitting categories exercised your reasoning powers, and but a very slight study of your notes or of the right authorities will quickly bring to mind the facts which now seem forgotten. No man learns much without forgetting something. A very learned man, speaking of one of his contemporaries, said, "I have forgotten more than he ever knew." The mere acquisition of a large number of facts, or the remembrance of many details, do not make up education. The time spent in academic study is valuable chiefly because it gives the mind the advantage of coming under the influence of well-trained intellects, that are able to guide their pupils into the best ways of pursuing knowledge and acquiring wisdom. The study of language gives exactness and quickness of observation. You have to discriminate between the slight shades of meaning in words which represent similar ideas in different languages, slight shades which it is so difficult to reproduce in translation, yet without which all translation is robbed of its chief grace. You may not perhaps pursue your Greek studies in future sufficiently to become critics of the New Testament; but if you have used aright the lessons you receive under such able guidance here, you will not have failed to see what power is given to a speaker by the accuracy of his language, and the fitness of his words to express the exact meaning he intends to convey to his hearers. It is impossible to overrate the advantage which you will obtain by a close attention to the grammar of the Greek language, as it, like the study of the grammar of any language, is at the same time a discipline in accuracy and a training in logic. The very fact that your time of study is so short as to exclude mathematics from your course, renders it all the more important that you should devote to this one branch the most diligent and conscientious work. I am sure that all who have listened to the examinations of the Greek classes will have been pleased with the progress you have made, and the facility you have already attained. With especial praise would I mention the Middle Greek. A good foundation has been laid, and if I venture to urge upon you not to relax, and rather to increase your attention to accuracy in grammatical knowledge, it is not because I have to find fault, but because I know from experience the value of such exactness, and the serious evils of its absence. The remaining objects to which your attention has been directed during the year have had a more special bearing upon your future professional duties. No one can doubt but that the men who are to speak to the people on the most important topics which can touch humanity should be well acquainted with the history and literature of their own language. It is, however, impossible fairly to value the literature of any language without some acquaintance with what has been produced by other nations; and your tutors have wisely chosen the literature of Greece to give you this means of comparison, a literature which contains for every form of literary expression models unsurpassed by any other nation, which you will be able to appreciate all the more the closer your attention has been directed to the study of the language of the New Testament. Though the hoine dialecte has not the classic grace of the dialect in which Thucydides wrote, nor the melodious flow of Homer's verse, it will have helped you to read with comparatively little trouble what has been written in Greek; and if you devote, as I trust you will do in future years, sufficient time and attention to the increase of your present knowledge, you will be able to enjoy more fully than you have done as yet the varied stores of classical literature, and thereby become better able to appreciate what has been accomplished in your own language, and to employ its treasures with greater taste and refinement. The history of ecclesiastical opinion, which you have pursued, enables you not only to trace the gradual encroachments which have been made upon the primitive simplicity of Christ, and to point out the sources of those doctrines which you do not accept, as well as those you believe to be true, but, if you exert your own reflection on the matter in which your tutor, from his vast accumulated knowledge, has offered to you, it will give you the power to see how there are wants of human nature which cannot be ignored without giving rise to corresponding errors, and will therefore teach you to be broad and catholic in your future work, ministering as far as in you lies to every religious need of man, and generous in judging of the errors which you think you find in others. You have had practical guidance in the science of interpretation of the Scriptures. No branch of a theologian's study can be more important than this, for, though religion has a wider basis than the Scriptures, and it is not only through a knowledge of what is contained in the Old and New Testaments, that the soul can find access to its Father, yet there is no possibility of finding elsewhere so complete a manifestation of the unspeakable perfections of God as in the record which has been handed down to us of the history of the race among whom alone the worship of the one true God was preserved in such purity as to give birth at last to the Gospel. Bound by no slavish fears unto the letter, but reverently guided by the spirit of truth, you will, I hope, have learned how to use that precious gift to man, the Bible, without suffering it to be as it has been to many, a hindrance in the search for pure religion. To guide the theologian in his great study, no branch of knowledge is useless. To make a perfect theologian, all sciences are needed. Your time is all too short; the time which even the longest period of academical life affords is far too brief, even to learn the first rudiments of knowledge in many branches which at the present day are spreading forth in every direction; but as your future work is to be specially directed to missionary enterprise, as far as possible, it is well that your attention is turned to the investigation of those great moral laws which govern the social life of man. Men often speak of political economy as a hard, cold science, because they do not comprehend what it is about which they are speaking. In the great universe of God there is no room for chance. All His laws are loving, because they are divine; and are truly wise, because they are so full of love. Human wisdom lies in learning the will of God, and obeying it; and those who only find the laws of God in the material universe are blind to perhaps the grandest manifestations of His glory. Political economy is but the science which traces the laws by which God governs the social relations of man. Those laws are just as sure in their operation as a law which governs the relations of the stars. To know them, and, knowing them, to submit to their operation, is the duty and will be the blessedness of man. It was with great pleasure that I heard the answers given in the class of pastoral theology. The practical suggestions which the lectures had evidently contained seem to have been well appreciated by you, and I am sure you will find them very useful to you in the course of your future ministerial life, even where circumstances compel you to depart from some of the details which have been put before you. I cannot allow this brief review of your studies to close without referring to one subject to which I understand your attention has been called, although it has not come before us in your public examination. I mean the physiological lectures of Dr. Fletcher. I can speak with some authority, from personal experience, in saying that in some phases of ministerial work, nothing can be of greater service than an acquaintance with the laws of health. Valuable as such knowledge is to every man, for no education can be considered complete without it, the minister, who has to visit among the neglected classes of our large towns, will rarely find a day pass on which such knowledge is not called into useful action. The only warning I would venture to give, is that you should not deem yourselves qualified to act as advisers in cases of illness, because of your acquaintance with some of the broad facts of physiological science. Briefly and hurriedly have I glanced at the varied subjects which have been brought before our notice during the examinations of those three days. May I add a few general words of advice before I close. You are, while attending the various lectures and classes at the Board, spending years which will have an incalculable influence upon the whole of your future life, and remembering the positions you will be called upon to fill, upon the lives of those to whom you will have to minister. You entered upon your studies here at an age when you could understand the solemn nature of the responsibilities you undertake; but we are all aware that to keep alive the fervour of high enthusiasm is no easy task, and it cannot be amiss for me to remind you, and in reminding you let me be allowed to remind myself also, of the noble aim which should always be before the mind of a minister of the Gospel. It is a noble profession to which we are devoted. But if it is so noble, then ought we to strive to be worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called. Your portion of duty while you are here as students is that of preparation. You must devote yourself to that work with all your heart; and let me say that here you will be beset by one particular temptation, because of the very fact that you approach your studies at an age above that of ordinary students. It is but natural that you should think your lives best able to judge what you require, and will select for special attention those subjects which you think most important. I will not tell you that this is wrong, but beware lest this natural tendency should lead you to give less than is due to any discipline which you think less necessary to your preparation. Give credit to the wider experience and maturer judgment of your tutors, and believe that they will not ask you to waste your time. There are very few men who do not regret that they were not wiser in their generation. Believe me it is not an empty phrase we use, when we wish that we could be students once again. These quiet hours will never return. Once plunged into the busy life of the practical minister, we all feel how much we have missed, by not availing our selves to the very full of the opportunities which have been offered again. This consideration makes me add one word too as to the use of your leisure hours. You cannot always be at hard work, but you may make your relaxation minister to your intellectual growth. At the present day the world is flooded with light literature of a kind which I cannot help regarding as essentially injurious. I am not going to speak against novel reading as a means of resting the mind after the closer studies of your various classes. But I hope you will exercise a wise selection in your reading. English literature is rich in all branches. There is no need for any one to follow the abnormal productions of the bad taste of the present day in order to find means of delightful rest after severe mental toil. If you employ your leisure hours in making yourselves not acquainted but familiar with the works of those whose names stand high upon the roll of standard authors of fiction and poetry, you will find that your very pleasures have ministered to your power for good, and unawares your thoughts will find expression in graceful forms that have insensibly become your own. May I intrude one moment longer on your time to speak one word more especially directed to you, my brethren, who will to-day close this important stage of your education. To you the warnings I have uttered are not addressed, but do not think therefore that I do not feel the deep sympathy with you in the important step you are taking now. Though in some respects it is a long time since I, like you, had to bid farewell to my "alma mater," yet I remember well the mingled feelings with which I closed my college course and entered upon responsibilities similar to those to which you are hastening. I would not speak one word to chill your hopes or to lessen the feeling of enthusiasm with which you go forth to do your share in the great work of making known to men something of the unsearchable riches of Christ. Indeed, I would advise you rather not to let any disappointments such as you will inevitably meet, cool your warm love of your work, or check your noblest aspirations. But I would tell you in your most fervent hours to keep a humble spirit both towards God and man. It need not that I should say how fruitless is all our work unless God gives the increase; but it is perhaps necessary to remind you of one danger that especially beset those who have made good use of the advantages they have enjoyed in the guidance of truly learned and devoted teachers. They leave their studies, with the results at which those teachers have arrived after long experience and much research, fresh in their minds, and they are very apt therefore to overrate their own knowledge. Beware of self-sufficiency. There is nothing which gives more conclusive evidence of immature judgment in dealing with moral questions on which the learned are divided than dogmatic assertion except irreverent flippancy. Yet, strange to say, these are the two errors into which young ministers are only too apt to fall. The tone of your examination papers leads me to believe that you will be in little danger of either fault. But it is in the early days of ministerial life that men are sometimes hurried into positions of great temptation, and I therefore have ventured upon this, I hope, unnecessary caution. I have spoken it the more readily as I would at the same time beg of you to be courageous in the search after truth and uncompromising in your declaration of what in your deepest souls you believe to be true. The social and religious world is at the present day, as it appears to me, labouring under great dangers. Men on every side are wishing to enjoy the blessings of freedom without incurring its responsibilities. There are men in the Church of England who would be glad to use all the ceremonial of the Church of Rome as the fit expression of what they believe to be the truth of God, but shrink from sacrificing the vantage-ground of membership in that communion, deeming that limitations in the ceremonies they hold dear are outweighed by their being saved from the isolation of Nonconformity. There are in the same Church men who hold opinions very similar to those which you and I hold dear, but in their longing for a closer and wider communion than they think can be found in dissent, still remain within that fold, which you and I find closed against us by insuperable moral barriers. Among so-called orthodox dissenters many men are teaching doctrines such as those which will form the basis of your preaching, but they avoid the obloquy of bearing an unpopular name. I trust you will choose to bear fiction rather than compromise the purity of your conscience. Communion with kindred souls is precious, but there are loftier blessings which I trust you will seek. If in future years your studies and your reflection should lead you to adopt views which do not now approve themselves to you, or to surrender some opinion which you now hold dear; should growth in knowledge, bringing you to consider some of the views which most of us now hold to be true to be wanting in authority, I hope you will not shrink from the declaration of what God has revealed to you, though in so doing you have to bear reproach for a season. You will be serving God by maintaining moral honesty and purity, which are far more precious than any correctness of intellectual conviction. And let me add, while you are guided by the love of honesty and purity of soul, I am convinced you will not stray far from the truth of God, for it still is true "that the pure in heart shall see God." And while the Spirit is with you giving you its blessed guidance, you will never be wanting in that reverent waiting upon Him, which will destroy all thoughts of selfish pride, and open wide your hearts to see that the Church of God and of His Christ is grounded not on dogma, but on love.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES.

The first prize awarded was given by the Rev. John Wright to the Political Economy Class. The success of Mr. Turland and Mr. Miskimmin being nearly equal, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal assisted Mr. Wright in determining which should have it, and Mr. Turland got it. It consisted of "Stanley's Jewish Church," his history of the Church, and a copy of "Essays and Reviews." Mr. Sharpe's prizes were awarded to Mr. Leyland, the senior student, and Mr. Turland, a second-year student, for proficiency in Biblical literature. They were two copies of his "History of Egypt." The books were accompanied by ten sovereigns, six to go with the first prize, four with the second. Dr. Beard remarked that Mr. Sharpe had been a steadfast friend from early days. He began by subscribing £5 a year, he now subscribed £30 a year, besides numerous gifts of valuable books. He took rank with such of their benefactors as Mr. Mackie and Miss Yates.

DEDICATION SERVICE.

At seven o'clock the same evening service was held in Cross-street Chapel, when the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Leicester, delivered, in the presence of a numerous congregation, an eloquent dedicatory address to the retiring students, from Romans xv. 13. "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace, in believing that ye may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost."

And so the proceedings of another year were brought to a close.

INTELLIGENCE.

BLACKBURN.—"Points of Agreement and of Difference between Unitarian and other Christians" was the subject of a lecture, delivered in Cobden Hall, on Friday evening last, by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. The second lecture of the course was delivered on Sunday evening last, by the Rev. J. S. Gilbert, of Rivington. Subject: "Justification by Faith; the False and the True Doctrine of it." The attendance was very encouraging.

DUNDEE.—Last Thursday evening, Mr. David Hodgkiss, a member of the Dundee Unitarian Church, delivered a lecture on the first chapter of Genesis to a large audience. The subject was illustrated by diagrams, prepared by the lecturer. At the close, discussion followed. A hearty vote of thanks was awarded to the lecturer and to the chairman (David Jobson, Esq.), after which the meeting separated.

KINGSWOOD.—In the afternoon of Sunday, the 3rd inst., the annual distribution of prizes took place. On Friday, the 8th inst., the school dinner was held, and the scholars were plentifully served with roast beef and plum pudding. The "fragments" were distributed to the poor. The depositors of the school savings' bank received their money, which, together with interest at 8 per cent., kindly given by Mrs. Lloyd, of Inkford, amounted to between £40 and £50 for the past year.

LEEDS.—On Tuesday evening, the 12th inst., the members of the Mill Hill Old Scholars' Society invited their friends to the seventh annual gathering of the society. About 150 were present to tea, after which a short meeting was held, presided over by Mr. Councillor Gaunt, enlivened by music and recitations. Mr. Woodcock, the secretary, read the annual report, which showed the society to be in a satisfactory condition; the ordinary meetings had been held regularly every quarter, when papers of an interesting nature were read and discussed. This society is a useful link uniting those to the school and its institutions who were associated with them in years gone by. Already the congregation has been increased by this means.

MANCHESTER: ROCHDALE ROAD.—On Saturday evening, Jan. 9th, 1869, a lecture was given here, under the auspices of the Domestic Mission Mutual Improvement Society, on "Self Education," by the Rev. Dr. G. Gottheil (Rabbi of the Reformed Synagogue, Cheetham Hill). The Rev. S. A. Steinthal occupied the chair. The lecture was very interesting and instructive, and at the close Dr. Gottheil was warmly thanked. The audience numbered about 100 persons.

PRESTON.—The annual meeting of the members and friends of this congregation was held on Wednesday, the 13th inst. Tea having been partaken of, G. B. Dilly, Esq., presided, and the meeting was afterwards addressed by the Revs. G. Fox, of Park-lane, R. J. Orr, and Mr. J. Dobson. A most agreeable part of the proceedings consisted in the songs with which some of the young ladies present favoured the audience. A hymn and prayer terminated this pleasant reunion.

ROCHDALE: CLOVER STREET.—On Tuesday evening, Jan. 12th, a congregational tea meeting was held in the above place of worship. About 120 of the members present. After tea a meeting was held in the chapel, presided over by the Rev. J. Freeston. Brief reports were given of the Sunday School, Mutual Improvement Society, Sick and Burial Society, and the newly-established Day and Evening Schools. A statement was also made of the financial condition of the building fund of the new schools. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester; the Rev. Jeffrey Worthington, of Bolton; the Rev. Lindsey Taplin, M.A., of Todmorden; the Rev. T. Carter, of Blackwater-street Chapel; and also by several members of the congregation.

SOUTHAMPTON: JUNTO SOCIETY.—On Wednesday evening last the annual tea and public meeting in connexion with this valuable society was held in the library and committee rooms of, and lastly in the church of the Saviour. About 50, under the presidency of the president of the Society, the Rev. E. Kell, M.A., F.S.A., sat down to tea, after which the company, which was afterwards increased to some hundreds, assembled in the body of the church, which never looked prettier, as the recent Christmas decorations still hung round the walls, &c. After a choice selection of sacred music on the organ, the Rev. president gave an address, after which a very interesting selection of recitations and sacred songs was given.

TODMORDEN.—The teachers and adult scholars held their annual Christmas party on Saturday last. After tea the usual programme of games and dances, songs and recitations, was gone through. In the course of the evening the Rev. R. H. Gibson, of Manchester, was called upon for a brief address. The evening was closed with singing, "Now pray we for our country," and a word from the minister, (Mr. Taplin). He gave a welcome to one or two old scholars, who, owing to circumstances, had been absent from the school for a few years, and had lately returned to it. He spoke of those who were in distant lands, and named the names of three who during the last year had been gathered home. Thirteen of their teachers had been married during the last year, and he could not forbear on that occasion expressing his own as well as their good wishes for the happiness of such. He looked forward with great hope to the new year; they had only to labour faithfully and in the same kind and harmonious spirit, and it could hardly fail to be a prosperous one.

WALMSLEY.—On the 16th instant, the Sunday scholars, with their teachers and a few friends, altogether 100 in number, had their annual tea party in the spacious schoolroom. After tea, the minister of the chapel was voted to the chair, and a very pleasant evening was spent in the recital of appropriate pieces by the scholars, intermingled and enlivened by several hymns from the chapel choir.

THE COMING WEEK.

Great Yarmouth.—Special services on Sunday, morning and evening, by the Rev. T. L. Marshall.

Hull.—On Sunday evening, the last lecture. Subject: "Moses."

London: WALWORTH.—On Monday, the annual social meeting.

London: KENTISH TOWN.—On Sunday, morning and evening, the Rev. P. W. Claydon will preach.

Penmaenmawr: PENDYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. W. B. Hughes. Service at eleven a.m.

Salford: FORD-STREET.—On Sunday, morning and evening, sermons by the Rev. C. C. Coe in aid of the Chapel Fund.

Births.

DOWSON.—On the 19th inst., at the Parsonage, Gee Cross, Manchester, the wife of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, of a son.

Marriages.

BINNS-CHAPPLE.—On the 13th inst., at the Unitarian Chapel, Birkenhead, by the Rev. Geo. Beaumont, of Gateacre, the Rev. William Binns, of Devonport, to Fanny Sarah, eldest daughter of Frederick Chapple, Esq., of Oxtou.

LAURENCE-HARDWICK.—On the 17th inst., at the Unitarian Chapel, Gloucester, by the Rev. J. Gow, B.A., Mr. William Laurence, carpenter, to Miss Mary Anne Hardwick, both of that city.

Deaths.

GREEN.—On the 12th inst., Alice, fourth daughter of Richard Green, aged 21 years, of Bartholomew Road, Kendal Town, London.

GRIMSHAW.—On the 20th inst., at his residence, Stanfield Lodge, Gorton, Joseph Stanfield Grimshaw, Esq., in the 86th year of his age.

OWING to the Ravages of the Vine Disease, the Production, and, consequently, the Importation into this country of WINE from the island of MADAGASCAR, for a number of years all but completely ceased. The ground formerly devoted to the Vine plant was turned into Sugar Plantations, Sugar being a less precarious crop, and sooner available for the market than Wine.

Since the disappearance of the disease, the Culture of the VINE has again attracted attention, and for a few years past the quantity of WINE made has increased. Thinking there might be a trade done if a good WINE, at a moderate price, were offered, we have been at considerable pains to procure SAMPLES FROM THE ISLAND, and have selected one which we can offer at 4s. PER DOZEN.

OWING to the Ravages of the Vine Disease, the Production, and, consequently, the Importation into this country of WINE from the island of MADEIRA, for a number of years all but completely ceased. The ground formerly devoted to the Vine plant was turned into Sugar Plantations, Sugar being a less precarious crop, and sooner available for the market than Wine.

Since the disappearance of the disease, the Culture of the VINE has again attracted attention, and for a few years past the quantity of WINE made has increased. Thinking there might be a trade done if a good WINE, at a moderate price, were offered, we have been at considerable pains to

PRODUCE SAMPLES FROM THE ISLAND, and have selected one which we can offer at 9s. PER DOZEN.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Letters from Salt Lake City state that the order prohibiting the Mormons from trading with "Gentile" merchants and shopkeepers is now rigidly enforced, and has caused great dissatisfaction. Brigham Young is in admirable spirits, dances "with youthful ease and grace" at private parties, and declares that there are only three great men in the world—himself, Bismarck, and Napoleon. The Pacific Railway is rapidly approaching the city, and the Mormons are still firm in their determination to destroy the road. As no orders have been sent to the United States' troops to guard the railway, the Mormons flatter themselves that the American Government is afraid of them, and Young and his elders encourage them in this belief by numerous warlike speeches.

The Unità Cristiana of Turin has changed its name to Unità Politica. The editors complain that under their previous title they were mistaken for an organ of the reforming priests, such as the Emancipatore Cattolico, or of Protestants, or of Free-thinkers, and their readers were consequently excommunicated. They think "political unity" more possible of attainment than "Christian unity," inasmuch as "Orthodox Greek, Evangelicals, Anglicans, and Catholics are farther than ever from approaching to unity." They promise to be more energetic than ever in their hostility to the Unità Cattolica, the organ of the Papacy.

It seems that the Prussian Government is bent on making Ewald a "martyr," as he calls himself. The Crown Advocate has appealed against the decision which acquitted the Professor on the charge of libelling the King, and the appeal, as might be expected, is exciting a strong feeling in his favour.

Father Hyacinthe has been preaching a set of sermons in Notre Dame, in the presence and under the sanction of the Archbishop of Paris, which have been causing a great sensation there, and rousing the ire of the Jesuits, who can only comfort themselves with the assurance that "Rome will be down upon him before long." In one of these homilies he eloquently denounced the usurpations of the priesthood in the interior of families, and boldly took part with the "hearth" against the "cloister," making it clearly felt how unseemly was the position of a priest in the midst of the enjoyments and activities, the bustle and honest freedom of mere ordinary home-life. His theory was that the father was the nature-given "director" and chief, the guide and consoler—the minister, in short, appointed by God to administer the lives and consciences of his children.

We had no idea that Queen Isabella was reduced to such a shiftless state as, from a Paris paper, she appears to be. We there learn that every seventh day she receives a small packet containing the chemise which Sister Patrocino has worn during the preceding week; Her Majesty, in her turn, dons this garment for a similar period.

Various religious agencies are availing themselves of the present opening in Spain to distribute copies of the Scriptures, and works of a Protestant character. The Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society have determined to print a million separate Gospels in Spanish for immediate circulation. And on Sunday last a Protestant religious service was performed for the first time in public at Madrid.

The rapid sale of Bibles and Protestant tracts in Spain appears to be alarming the priests, and they have induced 15,000 ladies to address a remonstrance to Marshal Serrano against religious equality and innovation, which are fraught with all manner of evils. In order to defend "Catholic unity" and inculcate the worship of the Virgin, they have likewise started a journal. In this they say:

"It is impossible to establish differences between the worship rendered to the Virgin, and that to the Son. Its glory and object are identical. To draw the faithful to the altar of Mary, the divine spouse of the Church, is to draw them to Jesus Christ, to the Catholic religion, the only true and eternal one. To write the history of the Holy Virgin, to sound her heroic virtues, to show how this privileged creature, so filled with graces by God, is from her immeasurable altitude the advocate and protector of the church militant; to enumerate her wonders, and, if necessary, to discuss and defend them; to study all that relates to her worship, her festivals, her temples, and her images, to work as we will work that every body may know these things, the ignorant as well as the wise, the poor as well as the rich, is our mission."

A formal monition has been served on Mr. Mackonochie to abstain from the illegal practices condemned by the Privy Council judgment.

Archdeacon Denison has published a correspondence the object of which, on his part, is to separate himself distinctly from those Churchmen who approve of resistance to the same judgment. He says:

"I will not, for one, act with men who hold their position by law but will not submit to the law."

The report of the commissioners appointed by the Bishop of London to inquire into the charge against Mr. Bennett, of Frome, of having been guilty of heresy in teaching the doctrine of the Real Presence, has been sent to the Bishop of Bath and Wells, and the case will be remitted to the Arches Court by letters of request from him.

The official record of the Roman Catholics in this country shows that the peerage of the three kingdoms includes, as belonging to that communion, 30 against 16 at the time of the passing of the Emancipation Act, 40 years ago. It must be observed, however, that several peerages, such as those of Beaumont, Camoys, Herries, Bellew, and Lovat, have either been called out of abeyance or created since that date. The earldom of Shrewsbury is no longer held by a Roman Catholic, but on the other hand, Lord Bute, Lord Denbigh, and Lord Gainsborough, are among recent "verts." Archbishop Manning has soon begun to utilize the first of these, having, it is said, obtained from him £5,000 towards the new cathedral at Westminster. There is, too, a rumour that the Marquis is about to become a priest; but this, though it is said to come from Mng. Capel, who received his Lordship into the Romish Church, seems hardly credible.

The decision of the Judicial Committee in the St. Alban's case has led to a dispute respecting Lord Cairns' religion, one party contending that he is a Presbyterian, and another party that he is a Church-of-England man. The only interesting fact that comes out of it is that he, as well as Sir W. Page Wood, now Lord Chancellor, was a Sunday-school teacher in the schools belonging to the Sloane-street church at Upper Chelsea.

One of those doings which even Churchmen, we should think, must feel ashamed of, took place at Skerton, near Lancaster, last week. At the house of Mr. E. Pickard, a member of the Society of Friends, a seizure was made for vicarial tithe, amounting to 3s. 11d. and the costs about 10s. The effects seized were three hearthrugs. At the sale there were only two spectators, one of them being a local reporter; and the rugs were knocked down by the auctioneer to himself for 10s. 6d., which will scarcely cover the demand on Mr. Pickard.

The Rev. George R. Prynne, a well-known Tractarian clergyman of Plymouth, has written to the local papers stating that he can no longer support the Irish Church Establishment. Before the recent election he, with the other clergy, signed a memorial in favour of the establishment. But subsequent consideration has induced him to see that it has failed in every way as a Missionary Church and as a State Church, and that it has no more right to State support than the Episcopal Church in Scotland, and he feels bound, as an honest man, to make known his change of conviction.

A correspondent of the Times has devoted his Sunday mornings for the past twelve months to visiting the city churches; and he reports the results of his observations. There are, it seems, between St. Paul's Cathedral and St. Dunstan's-in-the-East, 35 churches, all of which have thus been unofficially inspected. The results are thus told: "In two the congregation consisted of five persons each, in three others the attendance was under 10 each, in 6 others from 10 to 20, in 10 others I found from 20 to 40, and in the remainder the worshippers were from 40 to 90; in only 1 church did I find 100, but in that case the church was well filled. This includes the poor women who come for the bread which perishes. Thus in ten churches the united congregations did not exceed one hundred persons, and in thirty, employing 30 or more clergymen, as many organists, &c., the gross total of the congregations would not exceed that of one of our West End Churches." The writer adds, "At one church I visited the service had commenced with not a single worshipper other than the officials. I on one occasion asked an official if it ever happened that there was no service for want of a congregation. His answer was 'Sometimes of an evening!'

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

On the Pope's idea, that the Council to which he invites Protestants is a proof of the "inextinguishable vigour and life" of the Catholic Church, Dr. Pressensé thus sharply remarks in his Revue Chrétienne:

"Truly it needs some audacity to speak, under present circumstances, of the 'vigour and inextinguishable life' of Catholicism. Has it not struck with death everything which it has touched, whilst the nations who have abandoned it progress every day, and the balance of power in the world is every day adjusted for their advantage? Besides, it must be admitted that the programme of this Council is singularly adapted to attract the sons of the Reformation! It is well known that what they wish to proclaim, above all other things, is religious and civil absolutism; that which they would proscribe, is the liberty of the soul and the freedom of conscience. It is quite certain that the most stupid tenets of ultramontaniam will be formulated into dogmas. The Papacy opens to the view of modern civilisation a vast sepulchre, and she urges free and prosperous nations, who attribute their greatness to the Reformation, to come and take a niche in this sepulchre by the side of the wretched countries which owe to her their degradation and fall. The moment for this appeal is wrongly chosen; Protestants will not even take the trouble to reply to this fulsome invitation, which recalls the doleful saying, Brother, we must die! The youthful and progressive races of mankind who wish to advance, and know that progress is impossible except outside the pale of a Papal Catholicism, will reject with disdain the winding-sheet which is so complacently offered them."

The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol has been giving his views on what the "tone" of the clergy should be. He does not at all agree with those whose ideal of the modern pastor is the man of eagerness and impulsiveness. We have, he says had too much of this. Fervour and experimentalism have, of late, far too much usurped the place of earnest study and tranquil thought. This well-meant, yet "vanity-feeding restlessness" is a plainly marked element in many of the Church's present troubles. What now is needed is the reverse; "more peaceful warning, and less bustling; more inward preparation for daily duties, and less craving for publicity; more of true fervour and tranquil enthusiasm, and less of mere excitement and effervescence."

In returning thanks for the clergy and ministers, at a dinner given by the mayor of Doncaster, Dr. Vaughan referred to the difficulties with which both bishops and clergy had to contend. The axiom that the Church is not the clergy is one, he said, which has a very imperfect acceptance among them, and still less among the laity. Among the former there are those who seem willing to arrogate to themselves the title of Church; for himself he utterly repudiated any such monstrous hypothesis. He then went on, with great justice, to say:—

"It is too much the habit of the laity to treat the clergy as if they were not only the ministers and officers of the congregation, but as if they were set to bear all the burdens, all the duties.—I had almost said all the sins of the people: as if they had taken upon themselves the office not only of setting a good example, but even of appropriating and engrossing in their own persons all the graces and all the virtues which should adorn the Christian character. I consider that such thoughts as these do a great dishonour to that Church which is, in other words, the whole congregation of faithful people dispersed throughout the whole world."

The Church Times cannot think that the Archdeacons of England and Wales have been well advised in recommending that the figment of a Church-rate shall still be upheld as the proper and most effectual means of obtaining funds for defraying the expenses of public worship. The rate is a hard mechanical experiment for raising money from Churchmen and non-Churchmen alike; the true Church system is that which elicits the free-will offerings of the faithful. The fact that the latter is pecuniarily the most successful resource should have had its weight even with the archidiaconal mind.

The Church News affords, in the following paragraph, a curious illustration of the views which the Ritualists take of the purity of the judicial functions, and of the sort of recompense to which they consider themselves entitled for their zealous support of the Conservatives at the recent election:

"Whatever the Tory papers, whether daily or weekly, may think of the Cairns judgment, there can be no doubt that it has made Orange Toryism, as represented by that mushroom Peer, stink in the nostrils of all English Catholics. These latter have been cleverly duped, but we doubt if they are likely to be duped again. Having put forth their strength—neither mean nor unworthy of consideration—in order to support constitutional principles and to back up the Tory party at the last election, they now find themselves insulted, snubbed, damaged, and divided through the scandalous one-sidedness of two ex-Tory Chancellors."

The Record, never easy to please, is much put out with the Home Secretary's appointment of the three new members of the Ritual Commission. It says:—

"Mr. Bruce has already proved, as we had good reason to believe, that he is quite as much of an ultra-Churchman as Mr. Hardy. His selection of the High Church Lord Carnarvon, and the vacillating Gladstonian Bishop of Chester, is eminently unsatisfactory, as well as the substitution of the latitudinarian Mr. Charles Buxton for Mr. Cardwell. Temporising measures will not avail at the present crisis, and protracted delays will only embolden those who seek, like Mr. Mackonochie, to level with the dust our ancient Ecclesiastical Establishment."

A correspondent of the Church Review is much scandalised that the Bishop of Oxford is contributing articles to Good Words. He says:—

"How a man of his name and position can think it consistent to support a Presbyterian journal is more than I can comprehend. Woe to the Church when her leaders give countenance to her enemies."

The following choice bit from a paper which till recently was edited by Dr. F. G. Lee, and in which the spirit of his pen may still be detected, might be headed, "See how these Churchmen love one another!" The object of the writer is to hold up to contempt the Church Union:

"The uninteresting dullness of Mr. Fellow, the enthusiastic Yankeeism of Mr. Parker, the inbred Whiggery of Mr. Wood, the aristocratic commonplace of the Dean of York, the matrimonial speculations of Mr. Gutch, the profound puzzle-headedness of Dr. Pusey, the eloquent pomposity of Mr. Mayow, the pert self-satisfaction of Mr. Radcliffe, and the ecclesiastical ambition of would-be Dean Cowan—grand and great as they are, whether contemplated in isolation or combination, have simply ruined their society. It is breaking up before our eyes."

A correspondent of the Methodist Times, referring to a statement respecting the number of "souls added to the Church" by revival services at Willington, says:

"No one believes that the apostles were really drunk on the day of Pentecost; but those who write about modern Pentecosts often perform a feat popularly attributed to the inebriated alone; i.e., they 'see double,' and sometimes more than that."

And he offers this suggestion:

"Would it not be well to have 'revival' reports 'hung' for six months, to 'dry in,' before they are sent to press? Something like hams are hung? Old ham is always the lightest, but, personally, I relish it most."

Lord Russell has published another letter on the Irish Question, in which he offers the following outline of a plan for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church:

"1. That at a certain date to be named—say March, 1870—the Established Church of Ireland shall cease to exist as an establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property.

"2. That in the interval the Irish Church should, by means of a convocation or such other mode as may be deemed most advisable, frame a scheme for its organisation as a free church.

"3. That to this free church should be assigned such cathedrals and parish churches as may have been chiefly built by voluntary Protestant contributions, and such lands and glebes as the present Established Church may produce equitable claims to retain.

"4. That to the cathedrals, churches, lands, and glebes thus retained should be added a sum to be derived from the Church lands and rent charges, the amount of which shall be fixed by Parliament.

"5. That property equal in amount to that retained by the Protestant Episcopal Church shall be assigned to the Presbyterian and Roman Catholic people of Ireland for purposes to be defined by Parliament, to be administered in the case of the Presbyterians by the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, and in the case of the Roman Catholics by the Roman Catholic members of the Board of Charitable Bequests, already constituted by act of Parliament, with numbers enlarged—say to 15 or 25.

"6. That the funds to be so applied shall be derived from a fund designated by Parliament the Irish Fund, and that the amount applied from year to year shall be fixed, and shall not vary according to the rate of mortality among the existing clergy of the Established Church.

"7. That the building and repair of Presbyterian and Roman Catholic places of worship, and dwelling-houses for their respective clergy, shall be among the purposes to which the funds to be assigned to Presbyterians and Roman Catholics shall be applied.

"8. That the remainder of the funds to be derived from the disendowment of the present Established Church shall be applied by Parliament, from time to time, solely to Irish purposes. That with this view the fund called the Irish Fund shall never be diverted to purposes other than the welfare and improvement of Ireland."

The London Review insists, and as it seems to us with good reason, that more should not be given either to the Irish Church or the Catholics than a moderate gift out of hand, such as Mr. Bright proposed last year at Birmingham. The more Mr. Gladstone reduces his three-fifths' estimate the better for the success and merit of his policy. The continuance of the glebe-houses in the hands of the Protestants ought to be avoided if possible; partly because of their value—about £120,000 a year—and partly because the Irish people will not believe in the disendowment thoroughly so long as these outward signs of State provision and supremacy remain. And finally, the abolition of the Maynooth grant—to which indeed the ministry stand pledged—may prove as essential to Mr. Gladstone's popularity with the Protestant people of England and Scotland as the withdrawal of all property from Protestant hands may be to the effectual working of his great scheme in Ireland. Absolute equality must be his rule; and he is bound to see an inequality in every indulgence to the Irish Establishment that can justly be avoided.

The John Bull sees something threatening in the present aspect of affairs in the Ritual Commission. It says:

"While Lord Ebury is talking of liturgical revision, the Ritual Commissioners have been attempting to deal with it, a motion of Earl Stanhope's to make the Athanasian Creed optional having only been defeated by a very small majority, after one of the commissioners had threatened to resign if any attempt were made to touch the Creeds. Mr. Venn, we hear, has a series of changes to propose which all tend to explain away those parts of the Prayer Book which the Evangelicals dislike, and it is high time that Churchmen should let the commissioners know that they will not have the Prayer Book tampered with. In this view we are glad to know that the new primate is very much disposed to concur."

The Standard, too, says this is no time to talk about liturgical revision. It would be a difficult task enough if the Church were at peace and her sons heartily united upon all matters of doctrine. Under present circumstances, when both doctrine and ritual are in dispute, it would be simply flinging down the Prayer Book to be cut and carved and mutilated at the pleasure of the strongest party, or to be eviscerated and diluted into the feebleness and colourlessness of Lord Ebury's ideal. The Standard has no sympathy whatever with that fine, generous, large-hearted spirit of "comprehensiveness" which proposes to expel those who are already members of the Church in order to make room for those who are outside, and who, as far as our contemporary is aware, have never signified their anxiety to come inside. Mr. Binney and Mr. Newman Hall are excellent men, but there is no reason why Archdeacon Denison should be turned out of the Church of England in order to make it acceptable to them; and that, or something very like it, is the meaning of the liturgical revision policy.

In a letter on the subject of his secession from the Liberation Society, Mr. Morley, whose objection is based on its proposal to apply to secular uses the property of the Church, after an equitable satisfaction of existing interests, says:

"I hold as distinctly and decidedly as I ever did the opinion that religion is hindered and the spiritual character of the Church of Christ is lowered by the worldly influence which results from mere political interference, and I shall be thankful to see the day when we shall witness an entire cessation of such interference. So much for my opinion, to which I shall be prepared to give effect on every suitable occasion. My conviction, however, deepens that the great result I wish to see accomplished will not be secured by assault on our part. Our great work seems to me to be to indoctrinate the public mind with right views as to the separate functions of the Church and the State, and to encourage Churchmen who are endeavouring to secure more liberty to seek it in the only legitimate method."

SALFORD: FORD-STREET.—On Sunday last two sermons were preached by the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Leicester, when collections were made in aid of the chapel fund amounting to £7. 5s. 6d.

REVIEWS.

The British Quarterly Review. January, 1869.

THE present number does not strike us as reaching the average success of this excellent Review. But this may be because we cannot altogether agree with the spirit and method in which the article entitled "Davidson on the New Testament" is reviewed. It seems to us more the work of an ex parte advocate than of an unbiassed seeker after truth; and shows more interest in blaming Dr. Davidson for any fault or error that may be discovered, than in estimating and accepting the amount of new truth which Dr. Davidson has contributed to our knowledge of the New Testament. It is true that the reviewer praises highly the unrivalled biographical knowledge of Dr. Davidson, but then he considers him "simply to be guilty of the most offensive and ridiculous affectation," by not referring to the works and writings of scholars like Westcott, Alford, and Tregelles. He holds Dr. Davidson's course to have been one of increasing scepticism, leading to results many of which are as yet uncertain, but of which his present opinions give no hopeful prospect. Thus Dr. Davidson only regards, as authentic portions of the New Testament, nine Epistles of St. Paul, the Epistle of Jude, and the Book of Revelation; he rejects much of the miraculous element in the New Testament; considers that the raising of Lazarus was not a literal fact, and that the resurrection of Jesus may be speculatively but honestly resolved into a spiritual event, having the souls of the disciples for its theatre. "Yet he apparently believes in the sublimest of all doctrines—the incarnation of the Son of God in the person of Jesus of Nazareth," p. 34. This admission the reviewer cleverly advances as an argument in favour of an inspired record, since a divine incarnation would be useless to later generations if its record were not sound and trustworthy.

The bulk of the article is occupied by a detailed effort to confute Dr. Davidson's estimate of the age and authenticity of the books of the New Testament, save that the reviewer barely touches on the question of the authorship of the Apocalypse, and its relation to the Gospel of John, while he characterises the issue of the fourth gospel by any other writer than the Apostle John as a forgery of the most decided character. We cannot enter at length into these detailed criticisms, but must content ourselves with mentioning one. The discovery of the first four and a half chapters of the Epistle of Barnabas in the original Greek in the Codex Sinaiticus, ratifies, as authentic, the "as it is written," with which the phrase, "Many are called, but few are chosen," is prefaced by Barnabas. This is taken to prove the then existence of Matthew's gospel (in which alone these words occur) at the date A.D. 110, to which Dr. Davidson assigns the authorship of this epistle.

Though not always agreeing with this article, we could not but read its spirited and methodical treatment of the subject with considerable interest. On the other hand, though we generally agree with the article on "Church Principles and Prospects," we must confess to having found its sixty pages of argument somewhat dreary. It examines the principle of Church and State alliance, which it considers to have failed in all its forms; it shows the wonderful and rapid progress of dissent, and the power of the voluntary principle in England as compared with that of an establishment; it enumerates the possible steps which may be taken to meet the difficulty that is growing on our country; considers that comprehension is difficult, that equal endowment is impossible, that common disendowment is always just, and to be pursued except under circumstances of overwhelming practical necessity. The article concludes by examining and replying to some objections that have been made to the principle of Free Churches, and alleges that, even if there be any truth in the subjection of the minister to the congregation by the voluntary system, the evil is far less than that resulting from the irresponsible power of the clergyman over the congregation in the establishment. In short, it argues that in many ways the voluntary system would be found superior to an establishment. In very spirited terms the desire is expressed at the conclusion, that the true unity of the Holy Catholic Church of Christ should be maintained by cultivating the holy sympathies and charities of a common spiritual relationship, which are, alas! as yet, so far from being realised by the various Christian sects of England.

Another article, "In Memoriam," speaks of the late Dr. Vaughan as a preacher and literary man. He discharged the duties of his pastorate at Kensington, while Professor of History in the University of London (as University College was then called), till he was appointed Principal of Lancashire Independent College. A touching reference is made to the loss of his gifted son; and after passing his works in review, the writer details the incidents of his connection with the British Quarterly as editor, and after the mention of his services to the Congregational Union, concludes with a brief but eloquent tribute to his memory.

The Sunday-school Penny Magazine. Manchester District Sunday-school Association.

We are glad to receive at the same time the bound copy of the magazines which were issued in 1868, and the January number for the current year. The year's numbers form a very neat volume, and we are glad to hear that the committee of the District Sunday School Association have made arrangements to bind in similar style all sets forwarded to them for the low charge of sixpence. All such sets may be sent to Mr. Jones, at the Memorial Hall. Of the great improvement which has taken place in the general style and contents of this magazine we spoke last year, and are happy again to bear our willing testimony. If it is not quite as simple or attractive to the very youngest children as some of the cheap illustrated serials, such as the Adviser, Children's Friend, &c., it is at any rate far better adapted to the generality of our Sunday scholars, and will be found by the members of our congregations an admirable magazine for the Sunday afternoon reading of their little ones at home. We heartily commend it to our readers.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN AMERICA.

As our readers must be aware, the American Episcopal Church has no sort of connection with the Government, but is conducted entirely on the voluntary principle, its general affairs being managed at a triennial convention, held in different States. Of the proceedings of the one held last autumn at New York, the Pall Mall Gazette gives a long account, from which we extract the following particulars.

The convention consists of a House of Bishops, and four clerical members and four lay members from each State forming the Lower House. New York, being now divided into two dioceses, sends a double set of members. One of the first subjects which came before the meeting was the expediency of creating new dioceses in States already sending delegates to the convention. The general opinion was against the innovation, on the ground that bishops are at present inadequately paid. A clergyman of Minnesota complained that the episcopal office was "almost degraded" by the poverty often entailed upon it. One bishop had been obliged to support himself for many years by teaching in a school. "Another one told me that he accumulated within fifteen years an indebtedness of more than 5,000 dols. just to support his family; there was no obligation felt by any one, and hence no provision made." The speaker begged the meeting, "for Heaven's sake," to have "no more bishops degraded and paralysed by being thrust out into new fields without a dollar of support, their hands hanging down in weakness, and their heads in shame." Endowment was not proposed by any delegate, but several argued that before the formation of a new diocese was sanctioned a proper provision for the bishop should be guaranteed. On the other hand, it was contended that there might be bishops found who would dispense with a salary, while under the proposed rule their services would be denied to the people. A deputy from Kentucky said he knew of a minister "who year after year has devoted himself to the Church without a cent of pay, and yet the Church under his administration has flourished as in no other part of Kentucky." A long debate took place, in the course of which a deputy said, "The bishops are not only expected to be gentlemen, but to live like gentlemen, and to act as gentlemen; and they are expected to do this upon a miserable pittance, nine times out of ten, which the men who work for your rich men would scorn to take as their wages." Ultimately the convention resolved that a "miserable pittance" should at least be secured to the bishops, and the new rule was adopted by a large majority.

During the war the Southern bishops declined to meet their Northern brethren, and even in 1865 the Southern churches were almost unrepresented in the convention held at Philadelphia; but it was now reported that once more all the dioceses in the country were represented. Among the propositions brought under consideration was one to institute a more rigorous examination of candidates for the ministry. It was suggested that all such candidates should be examined by written questions, and that the examination should extend over three days. One clerical deputy upon this contended that the examination should be confined to questions of doctrine. "Our great difficulty is that men are ordained priests who do not believe in the doctrines and sacraments which, as priests, they are to teach and administer." Another declared that the present system of examinations was a complete "sham." A third said that when he was examined for orders the gentlemen who presided began a dispute between themselves with reference to "the sufficiency of Campbell's answer to Hume in the matter of miracles. This discussion occupied the whole hour, and I went from the examination scot-free." The lay deputies who spoke were chiefly in favour of the proposed change. One remarked that the Episcopal Church must require her clergy to be properly educated. "There is not a congregation that has not some educated persons in it, who cannot be administered to by those who are murdering the King's English all the time." A clergyman of Nebraska opposed this view. He was in favour of making the examinations less difficult. "I tell you, gentlemen, we have to wake up to one thing and one fact, and it is this, that if we could have a little more unction in our hearts, if we could have a little more of the spirit of Wesley in our hearts, we would do well, and in many respects be improved." Dr. Mead, of Connecticut, said he had once assisted in an examination, and a candidate presented himself whose answers were very unsatisfactory. At length he was required to give account of his faith in the Latin tongue. He had looked out certain words in the dictionary, and replied, "Gallus tuus ego et nunquam animus." The candidate, who was a "bush-lawyer" in Pennsylvania, was rejected. After this anecdote, the original proposition was carried.

The poverty of the clergy in many parts of the country was next brought under consideration. The distress prevails most in the Southern States, and a deputy from Virginia made a great impression by an animated appeal on their behalf. Almost everywhere in the South, churches have been burnt down, or have gradually fallen into ruins. Many of them were used as hospitals or stables during the war, and when the troops quitted the country the people had no money to carry out necessary repairs. But clergymen in needy circumstances are very numerous in the Northern States. One from New York mentioned the case of a minister in a rural district who received an annual stipend of 250 dollars (about £36). "Visitors in summer were accustomed to make up a purse for him, in order to eke out his income; but when his people found that that was done, they determined that he did not need the 250 dollars." The subject was referred to a committee.

A message from the House of Bishops to the Lower House on the state of the marriage law, led to a long discussion. Dr. Clark, of Connecticut, stated that the number of divorces in his State amounted to one-tenth of the number of marriages, and it was almost as bad in Massachusetts. He had himself always refused to perform the service for any who had been divorced "for anything less than adultery." Mr. Welsh, of Pennsylvania, said that in some parts of England there was "a sort of divorce, or exchange of wives," as commonly practised as in the West India plantations. "It will be a sad day in our country if we ever reach the point they have in some portions of Great Britain. The looseness of matrimonial ties is fearful, not only among the working classes, but the upper classes." Other deputies seemed to think that America has no great cause for boasting. Mr. Johnson, of Connecticut, described the effects of the State divorce laws as "perfectly horrible." Another deputy, of New York, related a case that occurred only a few months ago, in which a man married a second time with his first wife acting as bridesmaid. It was ascertained that this first wife was subject to epileptic fits, and the man had obtained a divorce from her on that ground. The poor creature was described as looking like a corpse at the wedding, trembling at every glance of her ex-husband's eye. The man himself published a defence of his conduct, which was so shameless in its admissions as to call down upon his head a storm of denunciation from all parts of the country. The Rev. Mr. Martin, of Indiana, laid other facts before the convention. In a local office there were thirty divorce cases on the docket. The judge would pronounce the decree, and the "woman would rise up and would be followed by a man. She would go down stairs, procure a licence, and in twenty minutes be married to that man." The clerk of the court had known one woman go through this ceremony twice.

The subject of Ritualism was touched upon by more than one deputy, but the convention seems to have been disinclined to enter fully into it. Before separating the House of Bishops issued a pastoral letter in which an earnest remonstrance was offered against the attempts "now made to disparage our Anglican Reformation." "These attempts," the letter continues, "would warrant severer terms than we choose to employ." The prelates especially condemned the doctrine of the Real Presence, and those "extravagances in Ritualism, recently introduced which tend to assimilate our worship to that of a church not sectarian, but hostile to our own." The bishops also warned the clergy against encouraging too much indulgence in worldly amusements. "In our day there is a licentiousness and grossness in theatrical and like entertainments which would have been shocking to even the least refined in the days of our fathers."

Several other questions were debated, but, like the labours of our English Convocation, the American Convention does not seem to have led to any important practical results.

EVANGELICALS IN LABOUR.

THE annual gathering of the Evangelicals was held the other day at Islington, when the vicar, the Rev. Daniel Wilson, presided over between three and four hundred of his clerical brethren; and addresses were delivered on "the advantages and perils of the connection between Church and State," which will, the Record thinks, "strike a chord that will vibrate through the length and breadth of the country." All we can say is, that the country must be in a very weak state indeed if it is at all affected by them.

The Rev. T. R. Birks, some of whose wild utterances on the Irish question we gave a short time since, led off with a paper in which "the advantages and perils" of the alliance between Church and State were to be illustrated by the Old Testament history. This was done in a way very satisfactory, no doubt, to himself and his hearers, the "advantages" being shown to be incalculable, and the "perils" almost nothing. The Rev. C. F. Child, in like satisfactory manner, illustrated the same theme from the early and middle ages of the Church. Both these gentlemen took an entirely different view from their reverend brother, Mr. Mackonochie, who affirms that "the Jewish Church began to fall from God, and ultimately into idolatry, from the time it became an Establishment in the reign of Saul, and the reign of Constantine was the beginning of the decline of Christianity in spiritual things." Dr. Blakeny considered the matter in the light of the Reformation, which, of course, brought clearly out the benefits of bondage, and threw its evils into pleasant shade, reminding us somewhat of the way in which the Southern planters used to defend their "domestic institution." The Rev. Joseph Bardsley followed in his usual feeble forcible strain, and tried to damage Nonconformity by flinging at it quotations from Angell James, Mr. Spurgeon, and other Dissenting writers, which merely served to show their anxiety to bring it up to the Christian mark, and excite it to greater zeal in the discharge of its appointed work.

The chairman likewise fired a few random shot, which the English Independent picks up and deals with thus smartly:

"The enemy both from within and without is seeking to separate Church and State. The Church of Rome desires it, that she may seize upon the prey and reign supreme. The Protestant Dissenter wishes it that he may attain an equal position with the Churchman." Excuse us, Mr. Wilson, but we had rather not. An 'equal position with the Churchman' does not seem a particularly desirable thing just now.

"It is remarkable that among the heathen nations of antiquity provision was carefully made by the State for the worship of the gods of the country." Why go to the heathen nations of antiquity? The heathen nations of the present day would yield more forcible examples. Sir Samuel Baker might perhaps furnish Mr. Wilson with some instances of tribes in the middle of Africa where careful provision is made by the chiefs for the worship of the medicine-man, and then the Evangelicals would be comforted.

"If the State abstractedly has no conscience, yet the men who compose it have. A Government is made up of individuals. Their duty is to establish and protect what they believe to be the true religion." But what if the "individuals" in the Government differ about the true religion, as, indeed, those in the present Government do?

"The Church has all the liberty she requires." There are some Churchmen who vehemently deny this. "An effectual check to heresy is supplied by the union of Church and State." Hm!

"The Church embraces in theory the entire population of the country. This is a most important advantage." Yes, in theory.

"Of one thing I am perfectly convinced, that if the Church of England were disestablished, the Nonconformists would be the first to experience the disastrous effects." Very kind of the vicar to think of us first, but we don't seem to mind the disastrous effects. If he will allow us, we will risk them.

"It has been well said, 'If the old national ship goes down, the Dissenters' cabin will go down with her.'" We really didn't know we had so much as a cabin in the old national ship. We have a ship of our own, and, please heaven, that ship won't go down simply because some other ship goes.

"This, too, is the original form of religion established at the Reformation. The Dissenters have broken off from us, not we from them." Which was the "original" of 300 years since does not seem worth disputing. We could tell another tale about the "breaking off;" but what does it signify?

"The painful fact is that 700,000 Protestant Churchmen in Ireland are to be withdrawn from the protection of the State, and given over by a Protestant Government to the tender mercies of the corrupt Church of Rome." This is terrible. Directly the Irish bishops cease to sit in the House of Lords, the great red dragon of the Revelations will eat up all the Protestants. They will be racked and burned till there is not so much as a whole skin left to one of them.

Oh, Mr. Wilson, these are not chilled pallissers; they are but paper pellets out of a pop-gun. With such pious taradiddles—such paltry, foolish little taradiddles—do you expect to bolster up your Erastian Church, and keep your State patronage and pay? Here is no faith, no lofty devotion—it is cold, timorous, insipid, selfish policy. Truly the Incumbent of St. Alban's makes a more respectable figure than the Vicar of Islington.

SOCIETY IN DANGER.

AS we have watched the prosecution of OVEREND, GURNEY, and Co., and noticed the revelations of commercial dishonesty, not to say rascality, that have come to light, especially those connected with the witness, Mr. EDWARD WATKIN EDWARDS, it has been almost impossible not to ask ourselves whether these revelations are not indications of a wide-spread decay of moral principle, and whether, in fact, the great disintegration of religious belief going on in society is not accompanied by another disintegration, that of moral belief itself. There may be no connection between the widely-prevalent changes in theological faith, and the moral corruption of many kinds which startles us by its appearance; but it is very natural that there should be such a connection. The dissolution of religious faith in the ancient civilisation was accompanied by a dissolution of moral principle which gradually led on to the dissolution of society. It was only what might have been expected. The whole system of religious and moral ideas of the ancient Romans was nothing but a mass of prejudices—of things which children grew up to believe, because they had been told them. Their moral notions had the same foundation as their mythological ones. They were taught that they must be honest and temperate, brave and kind, because these things were pleasing to the gods, and because so it had been enjoined them by their forefathers. But when their belief in gods and goddesses vanished, the necessity of virtue as a means of pleasing them vanished too, and when it was manifest that their forefathers had believed a mass of childish superstition, the suspicion naturally suggested itself that their notions about virtue might be superstition too. No doubt there arose Philosophy to supply to men like SENECA, EPICETUS, and MARCUS AURELIUS, the place of the old religion, but this philosophy was incapable of being communicated to the multitude, and at the very best probably held any practical sway over only a score or two of minds.

It is impossible to hide from ourselves the fact that we are now in the midst of a mental revolution, very similar to that which swept away the Pagan religion of antiquity, and at the same time the moral principles associated with it. Multitudes of men and women have grown up, reared in religious and moral notions that have been communicated to them only as prejudices; things to be believed because their fathers or their ministers have believed them. They enter into the world, and they find these religious prejudices, at least in controversy, doubted, denied, scornfully treated as childish superstitions, on every side of them. They try indignantly, passionately at first, to throw these suggestions of doubt, like "loaded bomb-shells," from their mind. But they become too numerous and too frequent for this process to be continued. They explode at last, and shatter the old faith to pieces. And the misfortune is that when the old faith is gone there is nothing at hand—nothing that can easily get access to the mind—to supply its place. For it is not as easy as it may seem to some of us Unitarians to build up a new faith. Probably very few out of all who lose their old beliefs, come in the way of hearing of a simple, rational faith like our own, and fewer still that have the patience, calmness, and philosophic temper necessary to lead them to examine and adopt it. The result is that multitudes of men find themselves completely at sea as to religious belief without compass and without rudder. And let no one suppose that the moral belief does not suffer in the shipwreck of the religious belief. Where a man has been educated only in a mass of prejudices, and he finds out that the greater portion is rubbish, he is not well able to discriminate between the different portions. He is in the condition of one who has inherited a casket of what he has been told are priceless jewels, but when he comes to test them he finds them one after another to be worthless pebbles, so that at last he throws them all away in disgust. Many young men belonging to our middle classes are in this lamentable condition. They have thrown away all their prejudices—all that stood to them in the place of principles—and have nothing but their own taste, and social opinion, to guide them in the most difficult portion of their life. And we cannot help thinking that this wreck of moral conviction along with that of theological conviction has something to do with the commercial baseness so common among us. No doubt the peculiar commercial circumstances of the time have something to do with it. Opportunities seem to present themselves on every side to men of speculative mind of becoming suddenly rich. Then, too, the passion for luxury intensifies the desire to become so. But this is only to say that temptation has increased just at the very time when the barriers of the mind have been thrown down which would protect against it.

What is to be done in the face of this great danger? Of all that may be done—of how it behoves every one who dreads the tarnishing of England's good name to set himself openly and utterly against the light way in which these commercial frauds are too often spoken of; how, too, each may do something to foster habits of more simple, less luxurious living among the middle classes,—these are duties which concern all men. But surely, likewise, there is a special responsibility upon those who have the guiding and teaching of society, to work more earnestly than ever to build up in the minds of all whom they can influence a simple rational belief, both religious and moral, resting upon foundations that cannot be swept away. As long as the clergy educate their flocks in mere prejudices, they furnish them only with the mock jewels, which experience will reveal to them by and by to be merely pebbles, and which they will cast away, to live in hopeless moral and religious poverty the rest of their lives.

OPEN CHURCH PAPERS.

BY BROOKE HERFORD.

IV.—HOW WE INITIATED THE PLAN.

I SPOKE in the last paper of the result of our adoption of the open church system at Strangeways upon the poor of the district immediately about the chapel, and showed that it has to a large extent removed that disinclination to enter, that fear of finding themselves in the seats of people who may not want them, that sense of being there on sufferance—feelings which are, I believe, almost universal among the masses of those who are unconnected with places of worship, and which must continue until our churches and chapels are once more restored to the ancient idea of places of perfectly free public resort for worship. The question will be asked, however, how did you carry out the plan? What changes were made? I will therefore state as briefly as I can the facts on this matter.

People often say that the open church system will only succeed under certain circumstances. Certainly, however, the attempt to do away with the old character of a pewed, proprietary chapel and to substitute that of an open, public temple, could hardly have been made under less favourable circumstances. It was not a beautiful or attractive place, as a place of public worship surely ought to be,—a plain Grecian building, painted a light colour, and wanting cleaning. Then, there were the associations of a generation of continuous occupancy to be uprooted on the part of many of the people, the habit of sitting in particular corners, the time-honoured right to green lined pews, and so forth. And, however cheerfully the change might be made by the old congregation—and I shall never forget how cheerfully it was made—the whole aspect of the seats, in consequence of different sizes and fittings, remained that of places belonging to particular individuals. To have given the new plan the best chance, the whole place should have been re-seated in a plain, uniform fashion. The expense which this would have involved put it out of the question. All that could be done in this line was to take off all the pew-doors, and to put cushions wherever there were none, re-arranging the whole supply of cushions so as to give as much appearance of uniformity as was possible.

Another matter that had to be settled was the providing of hymn-book, &c. It was felt to be an essential part of a fair trial of the open church system that any one coming in amongst us should find ready to his hand whatever was necessary to full enjoyment of the service. Books, therefore, must be there for all, as a part of the public property of the church. There were some hundreds of hymn-books, Bibles, and Testaments already in the chapel, but they were all private property. Would the owners be willing to give up their private ownership? The matter was put to them, and out of the whole number of books, I believe that only about six were taken home to reserve for private use. The rest were freely thrown into common stock. The names of the former owners were erased, and the whole, with a score or two of new ones in addition, were distributed equally throughout the seats.

The next point to be attended to was the taking every available means of making known to the public what we really meant. The minds of most people have become so saturated with the idea of churches and chapels being places all let out in reserved seats or pews, that it takes a long time to get them to understand how utterly different an open church is, and that they really can go in and sit down anywhere as freely as in a public park. The first means which we adopted, therefore, for permanently keeping the leading characteristics of our plan before the eyes of the people around was to put up a neat announcement board in front of the chapel, headed as follows:—

STRANGWAYS UNITARIAN FREE CHURCH.

The seats are open to all.

The Church is entirely supported by the Offerings of the people, collected at every service.

[followed by minister's name, services, &c.]

Besides this, which we desired to be a standing witness to the public of what we desired our church to be, we felt that it would be well to have some rather fuller statement of our principle and constitution to fall under the notice of as many as possible of those who might come in among us. This was furnished by a slip of paper pasted inside the cover of every Bible and Hymn-book in the place, on which was printed:

Strangers Unitarian Free Church.

THE SEATS IN THIS CHURCH ARE OPEN TO ALL. The Books, Cushions, &c., are freely provided for public use, equally for strangers as for members.

"The support of the Church (the Ministry, the Poor, the Sunday School and all other connected religious institutions,) depends entirely on the free will offerings of the people, there being no seat rents or fixed subscriptions.

The giving of our substance for the support of religion being as much a part of the service of God as a Hymn or a Prayer, according to the ancient custom of the Christian Church, thereby affording to all the opportunity of helping in the simplest and easiest way, as they may be disposed, and as God has prospered them.

THE OFFERINGS ARE COLLECTED AT EVERY SERVICE

The Communion is held after the Morning Service, at stated periods, duly announced. All are freely invited to join in it.

Those who wish to become members, viz.:—entitled to a voice in church affairs, can do so by enrolling themselves annually in the Congregational List kept by the Churchwarden, paying a registration fee of One Shilling.

Something else, however, was still needed. People coming in appeared to have a difficulty in comprehending that all the seats were really unappropriated and free to the first comers, and we therefore had a notice printed in very bold characters, and affixed in the vestibule of the chapel to each of the doors, as follows:

EVERY SEAT IS FREE.

STRANGERS

Are requested to enter and take any seat they find vacant.

I think it best to enter thus in detail into the means we took to indoctrinate the public mind with a right understanding of the system we had adopted, because I know that in some instances changes very similar to ours have failed to bring any increased attendance, owing to carelessness or indifference in adopting means to keep the change and its meaning thoroughly before the people.

RITUALISTS UNDER DEFEAT.

Mr. Lowder, of St. Peter's, St. George's-in-the-East, with whom Archdeacon Denison has been corresponding on the subject, seems to have resolved that he, for one, will not "submit to the law," but act out the policy of resistance which he recommended at the meeting in the Freemason's Tavern; for on Sunday the service at his church was shorn of none of the ritual observances that have been condemned.—At St. Alban's, Holborn, Mr. Mackonochie was somewhat more obedient outwardly, but gave signs of being no less contumacious inwardly. Candles were kept burning through "Matins," but extinguished during the Communion Service. Seven lights, however, suspended from the ceiling are kept permanently burning before the altar. The Rev. Mr. Stanton, in his sermon, warmly attacked "the cruel and unrighteous decision" of the Privy Council, who, he declared, had dealt, or tried to deal, in Downing-street, as heavy a blow to our Lord, present on English altars, as ever the Jewish council dealt him in the days of Pontius Pilate.—At St. Jude's, Moorfields, Sheffield, two candles were kept lighted during the Communion Service, after which the incumbent stepped forward and said, "I, John Edward Johnson, priest and vicar of this church, in compliance with a recent decision, will now extinguish the candles which have usually been allowed to burn in this place. I do so under solemn protest, believing them to be emblematic of the two-fold nature of Christ." This is a new light to us; other Ritualist authorities have told us that they were emblems of his being the Light of the world.—At Plymouth, the Rev. G. R. Prynne desired his congregation to see, in the candles being unlit, the signification that the world persecutes the Church of Christ, and hides Christ as much as it can from the people.—At St. Alban's, Manchester, the Rev. J. E. Sedgwick dispensed with the candles, but preached a foolish sermon on Confession, in which, after dwelling on the power committed to priests to remit sin, he said, "I have not the slightest doubt that there are thousands upon thousands in hell at the present moment—aye, millions upon millions in hell at the present moment, which would have been saved if it had not been for the Church of England's laxity and the inertness of her clergy in this matter of confession."—Though some of the party are talking rather big, we still hold to the opinion which we have always expressed, that the decision of the Privy Council will not lead to a secession, but that there will be an almost unanimous determination to "abide by the stuff."

Mr. William Akroyd, of Stourbridge.

It is frequently asserted that the age in which we live offers no prospect to generous ambition, and no opening to an adventurous spirit. Men weak in body and in mind sit with clasped hands bemoaning the degeneracy of the time, and wishing for the days of their fathers, when men had men's work to do in the world. WILLIAM AKROYD, to those who knew him, was in himself an answer to their querulous complaints. He lived the full life of a man, and had also that power, which is inherent in fine intellects, of diffusing life and energy wherever he went. His whole career was that of one who was "master of himself," and, being so, necessarily became a leader of men. He was born in the year 1804, at Birmingham. He was the son of a journeyman stonemason. His father did the best he could to give him an education,—a far more difficult thing then than now. It certainly was not much learning that originally gave his mind its impetus. He was next apprenticed to a currier, and during this period traversed nearly the whole of England on foot in search of work. At the age of twenty-three he came to Stourbridge, and found employment there. Before very long he started on his own account, and in all worldly matters he was from first to last a most successful man of business. This alone would have been of little moment. It is his marvellous political and social activity, and his capacity for the management of affairs that excites our astonishment and admiration. A mere enumeration of the offices he held would arouse wonder; but the way in which he filled them can only be understood by those who knew his prodigious power of getting through work. A thorough Liberal, alike in politics and in religion, he was a devout hater of every species of hypocrisy, and his large knowledge of men, and keen insight into character, gave him marvellous quickness in apprehending and exposing every attempt at moral or intellectual sophistication. He would have exclaimed with Drummond:

"Each sin some colour hath it to adorn, Hypocrisy Almighty God doth scorn."

How in a few words can we trace such an outline as that of his varied life? When the writer first knew him he was in his full vigour. Well read in English literature, and very apt at quotation, he was better read in men, and more full of anecdotes, which he told with a combination of humour and gravity which never failed to arrest the attention of all within earshot. Ever kindly and generous among friends, he was almost stern in the unflinching way in which he carried either an argument or a business transaction to its legitimate conclusion. But it was, after all, his ever-flowing vitality that as if by natural law, made all political and social movements in his neighbourhood rotate around him as their centre. Railways, boards of guardians, gasworks, election committees, boards of health, &c., all sought and found in William Akroyd their best chairman and adviser. It will take many men to fill his place in the business of the district. In the hearts of his many friends, who knew and loved him so well, there will always remain a blank. There was but one William Akroyd, and those who knew him best, know best that they will never find such another. He brought on sudden and fatal illness by his overwork and anxiety in the last general election, and almost before he was supposed to be in serious danger, his activities came to a too early termination. Concerning such men, we cannot speak of death in ordinary terms. To us they exist still; we cannot let them altogether die. They exist with God, alas! not now with us.

"The power, the will, that never rest,
And cannot die, were all from 'Him.'"

Mr. Akroyd was through life a member of the Stourbridge Presbyterian congregation, and was buried in its chapel yard on Thursday, the 21st inst. The burial service was read by the Rev. D. Maginnis, who will preach a funeral sermon next Sunday morning.

The Birmingham Post has the following acrostic on the deceased, which does not badly sum up his public character, and may be taken as one proof, among many, of the general esteem in which he was held:

A lways staunch and always true,
K indly both in word and deed,
R esting not with narrow view
O n the bounds of sect and creed;
Y oung in zeal, and strong in fight,
D auntless for the Truth and Right.

Mr. John F. Lee, of Kimber.

THE funeral sermon of this excellent man, whose death, at the age of 79 years, we have already announced, was preached by the Rev. D. Maginnis at Stourbridge, on Sunday last, from the text, "I leave the world and go to the Father." (John xvi 28.) After describing the "calm and hopeful trust of the righteous in death, and the grounds of such trust," the preacher gave a sketch of the life and character of the deceased. For thirty years the respected head of a firm whose name and character stood high in the commercial world, Mr. Lee, in his business relations, was characterised by high principle and integrity, and was "diligent in business." As a master he was considerate and kind, and won the esteem and affection of those in his employ. In his old age he had to bear the mortification of seeing the decline and ultimate failure of his business; but under this heavy trial he was sustained by the (if possible) increased respect and confidence, and the deepest sympathy of all who knew him. In public matters Mr. Lee had no ambition to occupy a prominent place; yet he did not shrink from undertaking the duties of any office in which he felt he could render useful service. In politics he was a thorough and consistent Liberal, in theology a decided Unitarian, ecclesiastically a staunch Nonconformist. Born two years before the Birmingham riots, and growing up under the care of those who received Dr. Priestley's religious teachings (his father holding an important office in the New Meeting during Dr. Priestley's pastorate), and who, with that distinguished man, suffered for their political opinions, Mr. Lee acquired an early love of political and religious freedom—a love which grew with his growth, and kept fresh and vigorous even to the last. A prominent trait in Mr. Lee's character was his generous beneficence. In him the poor have lost an ever open-handed friend; and not the poor alone will miss him, but those also who, though not in poverty, were friendless, and needed counsel and help. Making no parade of his religious feelings he was yet deeply religious. His faith in the thoroughly Fatherly character of God, and in a future life of continued progress, and in the reunion hereafter of friends whom death separates, was strong and sustaining. In his severest trials and afflictions he found in Unitarianism all that his heart required. Of death he had no fear. In peaceful sleep his spirit, without a struggle, passed from its earthly to its heavenly home. His remains were followed for two miles on their way to the place of interment by several hundreds of his late employés. He leaves a daughter to mourn the loss of a most affectionate father. His wife died twenty-four years ago.

THOUGHT-SPRINGS.

If when those springs that filter thro' the brain Seem stopped, and all thought's ebbing cisterns low,
We draw upon the little they contain,
Soon, soon the springs will flow.
For all around us hangs thought-laden air,
And thro' all earth the living waters break;
Believing all we seek is here and there,
We need but reach and take.
Defer solicitation, and the springs
Soon bid their waters find another way;
But drawing daily of their plenty brags
Abundance day by day.

JAVANESE.

In a work recently published, entitled "Travels in the East Indian Archipelago," Mr. Albert Bickmore gives the following account of the people inhabiting the Javanese islands:

All the natives are remarkably short in stature, the male sex averaging not more than five feet three inches in height, or four inches less than that of Europeans. The face is somewhat lozenge-shaped, the cheek-bones high and prominent, the mouth wide, and the nose short—not flat as in the negroes, or prominent as in the Europeans. They are generally of a mild disposition, except the wild tribes in the mountainous parts of Sumatra, Borneo, Celebes, Timor, Ceram, and a few other large islands. The coast people are invariably hospitable and trustworthy. They are usually quiet, and extremely indolent. They all have an insatiable passion for gambling, which no restrictive or prohibitory laws can eradicate. They are nominally Mohammedans, but have none of the fanaticism of that sect in Arabia. They still retain many of their previous Hindu notions, and their belief may be properly defined as a mixture of Hinduism and Mohammedanism. A few are "Christians," that is, they attend the service of the Dutch Church, and do not shave their heads or file their teeth. They are cleanly in their habits, and scores of all ages may be seen in the rivers and canals of every city and village, especially in the morning and evening. The sarong, their universal dress, is peculiarly fitted for this habit. When they have finished their baths a dry one is drawn on over the head, and the wet one is slipped off beneath, without exposing the person in the least. The females wear the sarong long, and generally twist it tightly round the body, just under the arms. Occasionally it is made with sleeves, like a loose gown. A close-fitting jacket or baju is worn with it. The men have but a few hairs for beard, and these they generally pull out with a pair of iron tweezers. The hair of the head in both sexes is lank, coarse, and worn long. Each sex, therefore, resembles the other so closely that nearly every foreigner will at first find himself puzzled in many cases to know whether he is looking at a man or a woman. This want of differentiation in the sexes possibly indicates their low rank in the human family, if the law may be applied here that obtains amongst most other animals. Every day I went out to collect the peculiar birds and beautiful butterflies of that region, my favourite place for this pleasure being in an old Chinese cemetery just outside the city, where, as the land was level, the earth had been thrown up into mounds to keep the bones of their inmates from "the wet unfortunate places" just as in China, when far from any mountain or hill. A Malay servant followed, carrying my ammunition and collecting-boxes. At first I supposed he would have many superstitious objections to wandering to and fro with me over the relics of the Celestials, but, to my surprise, I found his people cultivating the spaces between the graves, as if they, at least, did not consider it sacred soil; yet, several times, when we came to the graves of his own ancestors, he was careful to approach with every manifestation of awe and respect. A small piece of land, a bamboo hut, and a buffalo, comprise all the worldly possessions of most coolies, and yet with these they always seem most enviably contented.

TRY, TRY AGAIN.

MR. SPURGEON has just published, under the title of "John Ploughman's Talk," twenty-four papers giving "plain advice for plain people." There is a good deal of sly humour in them, and a great abundance of shrewd proverbs, which are almost sure to make it popular with the class for whom it is meant. Here is a specimen:

"Don't be whining about not having a fairstart. Throw a sensible man out of a window, he'll fall on his legs and ask the nearest way to his work. The more you have to begin with, the less you will have at the end. Money you earn yourself is much brighter and sweeter than any you get out of dead men's bags. Ascend breakfast in the morning of life whets the appetite for a feast later in the day. He who has tasted a sour apple will have the more relish for a sweet one; your present want will make future prosperity all the sweeter. Eighteen pence has set up many a pedlar in business, and he has turned it over until he has kept his carriage. As for the place you are cast in, don't find fault with that. You need not be a horse because you were born in a stable. If a bull tossed a man of mettle sky-high, he would drop down into a good place. A hard-working young man, with his wits about him, will make money where others do nothing but lose it.

Everybody who does not get on, lays it all on competition. When the wine was stolen they said it was the rats; it's very convenient to have a horse to put the saddle on. A mouse may find a hole, be the room ever so full of cats. Good workmen are always wanted. There's a penny to be turned at the worst booth in the fair. No barber ever shaves so close but another barber will find something left. Nothing is so good but what it might be better; and he who sells the best wins the trade. We were all going to the workhouse because of the new machines, so the prophets down at the taproom were always telling us, but instead of it, all these threshing, and reaping, and hay-making machines have helped to make those men better off, who had sense enough to work them. If a man has not a soul above clodhopping, he may expect to keep poor, but if he opens his sense-box, and picks up here and there a little, even Johnny Raw may yet improve. 'Times are bad,' they say; yes, and if you go gaping about, and send your wits wool-gathering, times always will be bad.

Alas! advice is thrown away on many, like good seed on a bare rock. Teach a cow for seven years, but she will never learn to sing the Old Hundredth. Of some it seems true, that when they were born, Solomon went by the door, but would not look in. Their coat of arms is a fool's-cap on a donkey's head. They sleep when it is time to plough, and weep when harvest comes. They eat all the parsnips for supper, and wonder they have none left for breakfast. Our working people are shamefully unthrifty, and so old England swarms with poor. If what goes into the mash-tub went into the kneading-trough, families would be better fed and better taught. If what is spent in waste were only saved against a rainy day, workhouses would never be built."

FACT AND FICTION.

GREAT force is doubtless given to a story
When it is known that every scene and act
Of cruel sorrow, or triumphant glory,
Was one time living fact.

And so again, with all its chosen diction,
Invented narrative we hold as cheap:
"Not fact, not fact?" but is there not in fiction
Reality as deep?

Is not the brain-creation of the thinker
As veritable as his daily strife:
The Pilgrim just as real as the tinker—
John Bunyan's thought and life?

Thought is the spirit of the body, action:
Unacted thought is soul without the frame,
But no less fact; and they that call it fiction
Are cheated with a name.

R. LEIGHTON.

THE MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

THE annual meetings of the above conference were held on Thursday and Friday, January 21 and 22, at the Memorial Hall, Manchester. There was a rather larger attendance of members than usual, and the proceedings were of an interesting and important character. The conference appears to be growing in strength, and is gradually entering upon the active work it has had in view from the beginning. A pleasant feature of this year's conference was the hospitality with which distant members were received by Manchester friends into their houses as guests.

FIRST DAY.

The proceedings were opened on Thursday with the administration of the Lord's Supper by the President, the Rev. J. C. Street, and the Rev. T. E. Poynting, at which there were 24 ministers present. The PRESIDENT gave an able address on the religious signs of the times; and a vote of thanks, moved by the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, B.A., and seconded by the Rev. JOSEPH SMITH, was given to him for it.

At the calling of the roll, the following members were present:—Revs. E. W. Hopkinson, W. W. Robinson, H. M'Kean, H. Eachus, George Fox, J. C. Street, B. Glover, W. Oates, T. Timmins, G. Ride, J. Birks, H. Austen, Joseph Smith, D. Matts, H. Williamson, T. E. Poynting, J. Freeston, W. Birks, James Drummond, B.A., J. G. Slater, C. C. Coe, James Black, M.A., B. Walker, William Brunton, C. L. Whitham, T. Leyland, J. Miskimmin, J. M'Donald, and E. Coleman.

The minutes of last year were read and confirmed, together with the reports of the treasurer and committee. The new members were then elected, and were welcomed by the Rev. W. Oates. Each, in a few words, acknowledged the welcome, the Revs. C. C. Coe and James Black, M.A., specially expressing their warm interest in the objects of the conference.

The officers chosen for the ensuing year were:—President, Rev. T. E. Poynting; Secretary, Rev. Geo. Fox; Treasurer, Rev. H. M'Kean; Committee, Revs. B. Glover, W. Oates, and J. Freeston.

Some very interesting reports of missionary work, done by various members of the conference during the past year, were then read by the secretary.

The Rev. H. M'KEAN read a report of the sub-committee concerning the best manual for use in preparing young people to join our congregations, and the best form of service for their public recognition. Some discussion ensued, when it was at length agreed that the sub-committee should be re-appointed to further prosecute their inquiries, and to furnish the draft of a manual the best fitted, in their judgment, for the proposed object.

The Rev. J. FREESTON read a valuable report of the sub-committee appointed to inquire into the condition of Sunday schools, and the best methods of developing the religious element in them. It was agreed that the sub-committee be re-appointed, and report next year in like manner.

Rev. W. OATES gave a statement from the sub-committee appointed to consider the propriety of raising a missionary fund. The following resolution was unanimously passed:—"That a fund for missionary work be raised during the year, and that the committee of the conference be requested to make arrangements for religious services at Black-pool, Scarborough, or elsewhere, as early as possible, and for the circulation of tracts."

Rev. J. SMITH read the report of the sub-committee appointed to inquire into the matter of books fitted for Sunday school libraries. The committee was re-appointed.

The PRESIDENT gave the report of the sub-committee appointed to consider the propriety of the conference issuing a magazine. The discussion of the report was deferred till the following day.

The revised rules were then read and passed.

The Rev. H. M'KEAN re-introduced his motion concerning the appointment of lay delegates to the conference by the congregations connected, through their ministers, with the conference.

The Rev. W. OATES introduced his motion, "That this conference print and circulate an annual report of its proceedings." The motion was carried unanimously.

Several notices of motion were brought forward for discussion at the next conference, and the proceedings terminated with prayer by the PRESIDENT.

SECOND DAY.

The conference assembled on Friday morning soon after ten o'clock, when the Rev. JAS. DRUMMOND, B.A., opened the proceedings with prayer.

The roll having been called, the Rev. HENRY WILLIAMSON, of Dundee, read an interesting paper on the following subject: "What is there in the missionary operations of other religious denominations that may be adopted with advantage by our own?" An animated discussion ensued, in which the Revs. T. Timmins, H. Eachus, B. Glover, J. Drummond, B.A., Geo. Ride, T. G. Poynting, W. Birks, D. Matts, J. Smith, J. Birks, W. Oates, and the President joined.

The PRESIDENT then referred to the second essay which should have been read by the Rev. J. Whitworth, of Sunderland. That gentleman had forwarded his paper, but it had not come to hand. In the absence of Mr. Whitworth, and the non-arrival of his paper, Mr. Street briefly introduced the subject for discussion—"Lay Preaching: how to develop and employ it in our churches." An interesting discussion followed.

The subject of the Magazine was then re-introduced. The whole matter was relegated to the Committee of the Conference, with power to act.

After the usual votes of thanks, the proceedings were closed with prayer by the Rev. D. Matts.

The members then partook of a substantial tea in the large room of the Memorial Hall. Several sentiments were spoken to by various gentlemen, and the members separated full of gratification and hope from the harmonious conduct and stimulating influences of the meetings.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE, LONDON.

ANNUAL MEETING OF TRUSTEES.

THE Eighty Third annual meeting of the Trustees, was held at Cross-street Chapel Room, Manchester, on Thursday, the 21st inst.; SAMUEL ROBINSON, Esq., the President, in the chair. The following gentlemen were present: Revs. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., Charles Beard, B.A., David Davis, B.A., J. H. Thom, C. C. Coe, S. A. Steinhil, James Drummond, B.A., Jno. Gordon, T. E. Poynting, Brooke Herford, G. H. Wells, M.A., Jeffery Worthington, W. H. Herford, B.A., H. E. Dowson, B.A., Messrs. Ivie Mackie, W. J. Lampert, Thomas Ashton, Joseph Lupton, J. Aleock, Thomas Worthington, George Backton, Benjn. Heape, R. D. Darbshire, B.A., S. B. Worthington, James Worthington, Thomas Avison, Robert Nicholson, R. M. Shipman, Mark Phillips, E. Bowman, M.A., Richard Aspden.

After the minutes of the Committee's proceedings for the past year had been confirmed, the Rev. CHARLES BEARD, one of the secretaries, read the following REPORT.

The committee are happy to be able to congratulate the trustees, at their eighty-third annual meeting, on the increased number of divinity students who have entered Manchester New College at the commencement of the present session. They have reason to hope that the number of students, thus augmented, will receive a still further increase in subsequent years, and that the unremitting and most admirable labours of their professors will thus receive a more fitting recognition and reward than has hitherto been the case.

Since the last annual meeting, the college has lost by deaths an unusual number of old and earnest supporters. The committee desire to record with great respect the name of Mr. Robert Worthington, who had been a subscriber since 1836, had been long one of their own number, and had rendered the college very essential service both as secretary and vice-president. They cannot but feel the sincere regret that the list of their vice-presidents no longer bears the honoured name of William Rathbone, who inherited from his father an interest in the college, which goes back to the beginning of the present century. In Mr. Robert Heywood, of Bolton, whose subscription dates from 1815, the college, as every other institution founded upon the principles of true religious liberty, has lost a constant and zealous friend. Mr. Henry Briggs, of Wakefield, who had been a subscriber since 1818, and had of late years rendered efficient service as president of the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, and Mr. George Talbot, of Leeds, a subscriber since 1829, are also among the heavy losses of last year. Since the beginning of the present year, the Rev. Edward Talbot, of Teutenden, formerly a student of the college, and long a deputy-treasurer, has been suddenly removed from a sphere of Christian usefulness which he had filled with modest efficiency for more than 40 years. But while your committee record with deep regret these among other losses, they are encouraged by the recollection that the principles for which these excellent and honourable men so steadfastly contended are every day resending new and unexpected recognition, and must before long have their final triumph in the reform of the national universities.

Some alterations have been made upon the recommendation of the professors in the regulations for the admission of students. As a knowledge of French or German is required for candidates for matriculation in the University of London, and as the students of Manchester New College who are expected to matriculate at the end of their first year are already too much occupied during that period with other studies to apply with advantage to an entirely new branch of learning, it has been judged expedient to require some acquaintance with one of those languages as a condition of admission. Candidates will in future be also required to give evidence of their ability to read aloud distinctly, naturally, and with correct pronunciation. At the same time, it has been determined to assist students in their preparation for matriculation by allowing them, at the cost of the college, to attend a course of lectures on chemistry in University College.

The publication of the roll of students in the college from its foundation in 1786 to the present time, alluded to in the last annual address, has been postponed from a desire to render it as complete and accurate as possible. It is, however, now ready, and will be issued with the present report.

In connection with this subject, it may be mentioned that by the death of Mr. Joseph Stanfield Grimshaw, of Gorton, a student of Manchester College, in 1797, the last link of connection with the first Manchester period has been broken.

The annual examination was held in University Hall, London, on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, June 22, 23, 24. At the close of the examination, the Visitors' address was delivered by the Rev. J. H. Thom. On the evening of Thursday, June the 25th, a valedictory service was held in Little Portland-street Chapel, conducted by the Rev. James Martineau, the Rev. J. J. Taylor, B.A., and the Rev. J. H. Thom. The divinity students who have completed their course, and were thus formally welcomed into the ministry, were Mr. John Russell and Mr. O. T. Poynting, B.A. Mr. Russell has since accepted an invitation to take charge of the congregation at Kendal.

During the session 1867-8 the number of divinity students was 12.—Messrs. John Russell, C. T. Poynting, B.A., 6th year; Messrs F. H. Jones, B.A., P. M. Higginson, B.A., 5th year; Messrs. T. E. Smyth, B.A., E. B. Hulme, 4th year; Mr. J. C. Odgers, 3rd year; Messrs. William James, D. Walsley, 2nd year; Messrs. J. H. Smith, E. Parry, T. Dunkerley, 1st year. Mr. Gabriel Uzoni, free to lectures. Mr. W. M. Ainsworth, lay student.

Since the publication of the last report Mr. J. C. Odgers, Mr. W. James, and Mr. D. Walsley have passed the first examination for the degree of B.A., in the University of London, all in the first division. Mr. Odgers taking honours in the second class. Mr. J. H. Smith, Mr. Dunkerley, and Mr. Badland have matriculated in the first division.

The following distinctions in the classes of University College have been gained by students of Manchester New College:—

- MATHEMATICS.—Junior Class.
- T. Dunkerley, 3rd certificate.
- LATIN.—Higher Division.
- J. C. Odgers, 3rd certificate.
- Lower Division.
- D. Walsley, 2nd certificate.
- GREEK.—Senior Class, Division A.
- W. M. Ainsworth, 2nd certificate.
- J. C. Odgers, 3rd certificate.
- D. Walsley, 3rd certificate.
- GREEK.—Senior Class, Division B.
- D. Walsley, 3rd certificate.
- Junior Class.
- E. Parry, 4th certificate.
- J. H. Smith, 5th certificate.

As Mr. E. B. Hulme failed in July, 1868, to pass the first examination for the degree of B.A., which he ought, in accordance with the regulations of the college, to have taken two years previously, the committee, with the concurrence of the professors, have suspended his exhibition until he qualifies himself for taking his proper place in the studies of the college.

The trustees of the Hibbert Fund have elected Mr. Jones and Mr. Poynting to scholarships upon that foundation.

The session of 1868-9 opened with the following students on the foundation:—Mr. Jones, B.A., Mr. Higginson, B.A., 6th year; Mr. Odgers, 4th year; Mr. Jones, Mr. Walsley, 3rd year; Mr. Smith, Mr. Parry, Mr. Dunkerley, Mr. Chas. Davis Badland, 2nd year; Mr. James Harwood, Mr. D. Agate, Mr. John E. Manning, Mr. Henry M. Dare, 1st year.

Since the beginning of the session Mr. Henry Shaen Solly, B.A., has applied to the committee, and has been admitted by them a divinity student on the foundation, in the 3rd year. Mr. W. M. Ainsworth continues to attend as a lay student on his own foundation.

SAMUEL ROBINSON, President.

The various officers were then appointed for the ensuing year. In compliance with the earnestly expressed wish of the committee and others of the trustees, Mr. Robinson consented to continue President for another twelvemonth. Thomas Ashton, Esq., was re-elected Treasurer; Rev. William Gaskell, M.A., Chairman of the committee; and R. D. Darbishire, Esq., B.A., and Rev. C. Beard, B.A., Secretaries, and, with only two changes, the members of last year's committee were re-appointed. The proceedings closed with a warm vote of thanks to the chairman.

INTELLIGENCE.

DUNDEE.—On Thursday evening, the 21st inst., a lecture on "The Last Judgment," was delivered by Mr. Chas. Dand, a member of the congregation. He controverted the prevailing doctrine of a general day of judgment after death as both repugnant to reason and unwarranted by Scripture, and maintained that every day is a day of judgment, and that every deed inevitably brings with it its own reward or punishment in the present life. He also touched upon the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, and gave arguments to show how improbable is the common assertion that the identical body which we now possess will at some remote period be reorganised from its scattered elements. He believed that the spirit in its future existence would find another body adapted to its new mode of life. Although the audience was numerous, and the discussion which was allowed was animated, no objections bearing directly on the principal points advanced were brought forward.

GREAT YARMOUTH.—Two sermons were preached last Sunday by the Rev. T. L. Marshall, of London, on the occasion of re-opening the organ after extensive improvements. Special musical services were rendered by the choir in a very effective manner. The congregations were good, and much satisfaction was expressed at the increased beauty and efficiency of the organ.

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION.—The annual sermons on behalf of the Sunday schools connected with this mission were preached on Sunday last to large congregations, by the Rev. John Wilson, of Birmingham. On Monday the annual congregational tea meeting was held, when nearly 250 were present. After tea, the Rev. Thomas Jones took the chair, and made a few observations on the spirit in which missionary work ought to be undertaken. Mr. Gabriel proposed, and Mr. Bryce seconded a vote of thanks to Mr. Wilson for his services, and took occasion to remark that the Sunday schools were much increasing in numbers both morning and afternoon, and that great need was felt of additional teachers to make them more efficient. The meeting was addressed by Revs. J. Wilson, J. Shannon, Alexander Gordon, B.A., Brooke Herford, of Manchester, C. B. Upton, B.A., J. Alsop, J. Cuckson, and Mr. Wm. Harrison, student of the Home Missionary Board. All the addresses were earnest and stirring, and the speakers endeavoured to impress upon the audience that missionary ministers must not be left unaided—that the members of their congregations must not only encourage them by attending the Sunday services regularly, but by assisting according to their ability in the various benevolent agencies of the mission.

LONDON: PENROSE-STREET, WALWORTH.—The annual social meeting was held last Monday evening, under the presidency of the Rev. T. L. Marshall. The attendance was very good. Addresses were delivered by the Revs. H. Ierson, M.A., D. Matte, H. Cooper, M. C. Gascoyne, Messrs. S. S. Taylor, Green, Jenks, Swirles, Francis, and other gentlemen. The speeches were pleasantly alternated with well-executed musical selections by the choir. A very pleasing incident was the presentation by Mr. Warren, in the name of the congregation, of a beautifully-illuminated address, accompanied by a purse of £15, to Mr. George Carter, the lay preacher in charge of this station, in token of the estimation in which his gratuitous services are held by the members.

SWINDON.—On Sunday evening, January 24th, the Rev. F. R. Young delivered a lecture on "Some of the difficulties in the way of understanding the Scriptures," the first of a series of monthly sermons in the Free Church.

LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY IN SCOTLAND.

To the Editors.—That a great revelation is silently working its way in the religious mind of Scotland, no one with his eyes open can doubt. Literature that fifty years ago would have been gathered together in bundles to be burnt is gladly read and eagerly sought after. And whenever sentiments are uttered by our popular teachers of a more liberal tendency than is embodied in our authorised creeds and catechisms, such sentiments are hailed with approbation and delight. It astonishes me how men, and some of them of great eminence, can so frequently give expression to such free and liberal opinions, and yet remain in a creed-bound church. Yet I have no doubt but these occasional statements of advanced views from the platforms of the popular churches, rather than from other quarters, do more to prepare the people's minds for a new reformation, which, I believe, is already beginning to dawn upon Scotland. And for the bringing about of this great change, the Unitarian Church, in my opinion, has its part to perform; and I believe in fifty years hence the opinions held by us will prevail in Scotland to an extent little anticipated; for, without doubt, many great minds are already going in that direction, and wherever the Unitarian missionary can find an opportunity to speak to the people great numbers of them hear him gladly. The effects produced in Forfarshire and elsewhere by the labours of our zealous and indefatigable missionary, the Rev. H. Williamson, make me say in respect to Scotland, "Truly the harvest is plentiful, but the labourers few." I can say with regard to Mr. Williamson's labours in Forfarshire, they are most assiduous, and producing results most encouraging. In Dundee where he is stationed, good and lasting work is being done, and I believe in that important town a permanent church is established. I had a call from a friend who is a member of the church there, and the accounts he gave me of their position were most cheering; and I am sure if Mr. Williamson had heard the statement he made to me regarding his own happiness since he came under his ministry, and left the dogmatic teachings of the so-called orthodox, he would have considered it in itself a sufficient reward for his labours. But Mr. Williamson's labours have not been confined to Dundee. In Montrose, Arbroath, Forfar, and Kirriemuir, in Forfarshire, and also in Perthshire and Fifeshire, he has been making our principles known, and in many cases with much acceptance. But with these cheering accounts, let it not be supposed that our work is all roses and no thistles; there is a great deal of opposition to encounter, and the worst type of it. It is not the bold enemy, who would come face to face in open day, we have to contend against, but the cowardly assassin who stabs from behind in the dark. In all our meetings discussion is invited, which in most cases meets with but a feeble response. Our opponents seemingly prefer to use their endeavours to shut us out of the halls, to keep the printers from printing our bills, and from their own pulpits and platforms to consign us all to eternal perdition as infidels and enemies of Christianity. Such methods of opposition, however, may in certain minds cause a spirit of inquiry, which will ultimately result in doing our cause more good than evil. In conclusion, I would say to all my brethren in the faith be firm and true, act openly and manfully, and no doubt our cause will triumph.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES SPENCE.

OWING to the Ravages of the Vine Disease,
the Production, and, consequently, the Importation into this country of WINE from the island of MADEIRA, for a number of years all but completely ceased. The ground formerly devoted to the Vine plant was turned into sugar plantations, Sugar being a less precarious crop, and sooner available for the market than Wine.
Since the disappearance of the disease, the Culture of the VINE has again attracted attention, and for a few years past
the quantity of WINE made has increased. Thinking there might be a trade done if a good WINE, at a moderate price, were offered, we have been at considerable pains to OBTAIN SAMPLES FROM THE ISLAND,
and have selected one which we can offer at
42s. PER DOZEN.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A new Indian pretender to divinity has appeared in Guzerat, and seems to be attracting a considerable number of votaries. His name is Hari Krishna. He is now about 30 years of age, and was first heard of some twelve years ago, as the teacher of a Vernacular school, and was noted as a clever youth, with marked powers of disputation. Having resolved to assume the attributes of divinity, he dismissed his wife, and for six months practised the most rigid austerities. As an exponent of the Shasters he is held in great repute among the Hindoos. The high priest of the Shajanand sect, to which he belonged, was so struck with his power that he issued an order to the priest in charge of the temple at Chura to consult him on all occasions. Hari Krishna thus became the head of the local temple, and, to the dismay of his patron, he began to denounce the corruptions of the sect, and proclaim himself the restorer of the faith. All attempts of the orthodox party to crush him were unavailing, and he soon acquired so much wealth from his devotees as to be able to build a temple at Sojitra, where he lives with the pomp and luxury of a Maharaj. His followers now amount to thousands, including some of the Kattiawar chiefs, and their devotion to him was not interrupted by his imprisonment in the common gaol at Rajkote for a breach of the laws. He has lately pretended to work miracles, and intends to preach his faith beyond the confines of Guzerat.

It is stated that not a few of the wealthy merchants and princes of India are giving up their idols and Shasters, and taking to the study of Theodore Parker's writings, which appear to be exerting a marked influence on the more educated Hindoos.

As our readers will have seen in other papers, the civil governor of the province has been assassinated in the cathedral of Burgos, while in the execution of the duty imposed upon him by the Government, of making an inventory of the different matters connected with literature and art contained in the cathedral. The immediate object of the measure was the "secularization of scientific, literary, and artistic property existing in ecclesiastical institutions;" and there can be no doubt that he was assassinated by or at the instigation of the priests by way of protest against the principle which his act was intended to assert, of the right of the laity to take charge of ecclesiastical property, and dispose of it as might seem most for the interest of the nation.

As we mentioned in our last, a Protestant service had been publicly conducted for the first time in Madrid on the previous Sunday. On last Sunday hundreds of persons, among whom were several priests, were unable to obtain admission, owing to want of room. There is much excitement in the reactionary party, as might be expected, and the owner of the house in which worship is held has received an anonymous letter threatening him with assassination; and the Regeneracion promises Colonel Fitch that if men cannot be found to pull down his Protestant church, the women will do it for them. On Sunday evening, however, when there was a manifestation in Madrid in favour of religious liberty, perfect order prevailed. General Pim and Senor Ortiz addressed the people, and said that freedom of worship was an accomplished fact, but added that the Provisional Government preferred leaving to the Cortes to decide the question of separation between Church and State.

The testimonies to the worth of voluntary principles in religious matters are multiplying every day from quarters most unexpected as likely to contribute such evidence of their truth. While Mr. Mackonochie and others of his school are calling aloud for the separation of church and state as an adulterous pair, we hear that the Roman Catholic Bishop of Trieste, having quarrelled with the Ultramontanists at his own see, went on to Capo d'Istria, and, mounting the pulpit, clearly demonstrated from the text, "My kingdom is not of this world," that temporal authority is incompatible with spiritual power, whether it be Henry the Eighth claiming ecclesiastical supremacy within his own dominions, or Pope Pius the Small holding fast by secular sovereignty to the states of the church.

One of the most learned priests in Italy, Father Vercellone, died about a week ago. He was a Barnabite, and, as the most proficient Hellenist of that brotherhood, edited the Greek Bible of the Vatican.

Disappointed of the cardinal's hat, he yielded to a constitutional depression, which is said to have accelerated his death. The hat was promised by the Pope, but, attaching himself to liberal views, Father Vercellone provoked the opposition of the Jesuits, and the Pope yielded to their arguments. The same influence has intercepted the purple from another learned priest, Father Augustin Theiner, author of the "History of Clement XIV." Several attempts have been made to poison this priest, which, though nothing is known of the particulars, the Romans universally ascribe to the Jesuits.

A Belgian journal devotes five columns to a description of a new Ecstatic, named Louise Lateau. It appears that for some months this young girl has presented every Friday the phenomena which are called the stigmata of the Passion. She has on her hands, feet, and over the heart sanguineous blisters which exude abundantly. The ordinary functions of life are suspended. The eyes, open and turned obliquely towards heaven, appear to be attentively fixed on some object. The pupils are dilated, the face is pale, the mouth partially opened, and the features express a sentiment of admiration, mingled with a sweet sorrow. At times the object she seems to contemplate produces a painful starting. When not in ecstasy, she is in catalepsy. At three o'clock she starts up all at once, and suddenly flings herself on the flags, without the least attempt to protect her face with her hands; yet she receives no injury. She remains for an hour in this horizontal position, her arms and feet crossed. About 4.30 she raises herself quickly, without any assistance, her arms still in the form of a cross, as if some invisible power had placed her in this vertical position. She then falls on her knees, next sits down, and in about ten minutes the body is subjected to a kind of torsion, and the Ecstatic of Bois d'Haine—for so she is called—throws herself supine on the ground. Then it is that she is waked up; but to accomplish this the persons about her must belong to the Order of the Passion. How, after the exposures which have been made of many similar exhibitions, any one can be imposed upon by such phenomena is a mystery to us.

The "Congregational Year Book" furnishes us with the following statistics of Independent Churches in Great Britain and the Colonies:

England	2003
Wales	866
Scotland	102
Ireland	27
Islands of the British Seas.....	16
British and North America.....	125
Australia and New Zealand.....	158
Cape Natal, &c.....	12
Foreign Mission Churches, independent of numerous outstations.....	133

Total..... 3442

The approximate number of Home Mission stations and preaching-rooms connected with the English churches in the country is 1,847. This does not include those belonging to the churches in the large towns. Last year 49 new chapels were opened, and the foundations of twenty-four others laid. Twenty new school-rooms were opened, and the building of four others begun.

It is said that the largest Bible-class in the world is that conducted by Mrs. Bartlett, in Mr. Spurgeon's Church. It has 700 pupils.

Considering that, according to the Bishop of Oxford, it is "the bulwark of Protestantism," the Church of England, judging by results, must need repairing somewhere. As everybody knows, it has just given the Marquis of Bute, with his £300,000 a year, to Romanism; and, according to the Weekly Register, which ought to know, the number of persons who last year left the Anglican for the Romish Church was between 2,100 and 2,200. Among these are two peers, nineteen English clergymen, and seven or eight university graduates.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Monday, application was made for a rule calling upon a Mr. Oldham to show cause why he held the office of town councillor of Wallingford when he was a "regular minister of a Dissenting congregation," and so disqualified under the Municipal Corporations Act. It was contended on behalf of Mr. Oldham, who is a deacon of a Dissenting congregation, that, though he had been in the habit of preaching in villages, and had for some time preached every Sunday in a chapel at Pangbourne, he had never been elected a regular minister of the congregation. Mr. Justice Blackburn observed that it was a question of degree. No one could say that Oliver Cromwell was a Dissenting preacher, and yet he had often ministered to Dissenting congregations. On the other hand, no one could deny that John Bunyan was a Dissenting minister, though he carried on business as a cobbler. He thought that the question was whether the person had been de facto in the position of a regular minister—answering as far as possible to the case of a beneficed clergyman in the Established Church. If it had appeared that Mr. Oldham had been really in that position, even for a short period, and especially if he had received any salary, however small, he would have been disqualified. But upon the facts it appeared to be otherwise, and there was no reason to disturb the election. Mr. Justice Mellor and Mr. Justice Hayes concurred, and the rule was refused.

The Canterbury Convocation assembled on Tuesday. In a Latin speech, Archdeacon Denison trusted that the Lower House would ever be found fighting for the maintenance of the true faith, the integrity of the Scriptures, and the privileges of the Church. He blamed those who had gone to excess in ceremony in honour of the Sacrament, although he admitted that both in Baptism and the Lord's Supper the utmost reverence ought to be observed. But from both those Sacraments many greatly detracted. The decrees of the Catholic and Primitive Church were clear upon these matters, and yet no remedy was to be obtained by those who were desirous of upholding the Church's laws. With regard to the Episcopate of the Church of England, he said it had twenty-seven bishops, of whom some were disabled, while there was work for eighty. In consequence of this defect diocesan synods languished, and the just plan of the laity of the Church taking counsel with the clergy was hindered. He warmly advocated the necessity of maintaining in its integrity the Irish Church, and urged that if the branch of the United Church established in Ireland were given over to the designs of men, however astute, however perverse, or however inflated with the vanity of philosophy, the branch of the Church established in England would be in imminent danger. He urged also a more efficient representation of the clergy in Convocation, and a reform of the present court of ecclesiastical appeal. After a short speech from the Primate, the business, or rather talk, of the Convocation, was adjourned to the 23rd instant.

At a meeting of the Christian Knowledge Society on Tuesday, the Ritualists suffered another defeat, their candidates for appointment on the Committee being rejected. Dr. Miller was one of the Evangelical party that was chosen.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

Referring to the assassination at Burgos, the Telegraph thinks the predisposing causes have simply been ignorance and barbarism among a section of the priestly class as far removed in mental status from the respectable and enlightened clergy of the great cities as an English Ritualist clergyman is removed from the benighted half-caste Mexican cura, mumbling and stumbling through his mass in the chapel of some mud village. It is in the silent, indolent, grass-grown, crumbling cathedral cities of Spain that ignorance and barbarism among the clergy are most flourishing. Broods of heavy-jowled, beetle-browed, saw-toothed men lead there a dull, soggy existence, alternating between the eternal cup of chocolate and the sempiternal cigareto—crouching lethargic in the carved stalls of the choir, or crooning out, day after day, the same monotonous chants, of which they have long since forgotten the tune and signification. There they sit like owls, blinking at the wickedness of the world, which presumes to call for light. There they sit in holes and corners, cursing progress sotto voce. And even a denser generation of children of darkness surrounds them—silly women "much bemused" with sham miracles, and lying stories about saints; fatuous old men, who think to atone by a year of superstition for fifty years of vice; hangers on and underlings, the plate-washers and candle-snuffers of the sacristy, flunkies in shovel hats. Long ago Stendahl told us that there was one person more orthodox than a cardinal, and that was the cardinal's footman. These are the kind of doleful creatures who vegetate in the dark shadows of the old Spanish cathedrals. The acolytes and the thurifers; the man who carries the banners; the brawny rogue who swings the censor, and has not the slightest objection to bang it over the head of the heretic who does not like incense; the man who holds the holy water whisk, or sweeps out the confessional box—these are the sort of people who, because they are ignorant and barbarous, fly howling from the light in the fashion of a wild beast, but, when they can get their prey down in the dark, tear him with their claws and suck his blood.

A rumour has been in circulation that Archdeacon Stopford, whose pamphlet on the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, we lately referred to, had had overtures made to him by Government to assist them in the preparation of a Bill for this purpose. Writing to contradict the rumour, he says:

"Opposed on principle as I am to disestablishment, I yet see that the battle will be fought upon a Bill. I desire to see the issue taken on intelligible grounds. I think a party fight on mere mistakes would not serve the interests of the Church. Knowing that other parties are working hard to have the Bill drawn as hostile as possible to the future efficiency of the Church, and knowing, too, that nothing is being done on our side to counteract them, I have made representations to the Government that they should abstain from needless injury to the Church. Of the result I, of course, know nothing. But I have the satisfaction of knowing that wise and able men, who do not see their way to joining with me at present, are yet disposed to hope that even from such humble efforts some good may arise in the future. I believe Mr. Gladstone is desirous to do the Church as little injury, and to leave it as efficient for spiritual work, as political circumstances will admit. Others are striving for the extinction of a Reformed Church. I think our duty is to leave no means unused to secure the efficiency of the Church in the future; and to this I strictly confine myself."

The Dean of Carlisle has published a letter addressed to him five-and-twenty years ago by Whately, in which the Archbishop says:

"I know that many of the opponents of the Tractites, and not a few of the supporters, expect that a church government would establish and extend Tractism. I am convinced they are mistaken. Of this, at least, there can be no doubt: that hitherto the Tractites have made their advance by insinuation, by doubling, and dodging, tractation, and retraction, phenakism, and economy, and, in short, every kind of indirect, concealed, and disguised procedure, and have ever shrunk from full, fair, open discussion. And my belief is that that is their wisest course; and that a regular Church Assembly would be fatal to their schemes. Theirs is 'a pestilence that walketh in darkness.'"

In another address at Sion College, the Dean of Westminster has again been saying his say for the Irish Church. Why, he asks, alter its position towards the State? It is an established church, if you please to call it so; but then the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian communities are established churches too. What interest have they in an alteration of its internal polity, or what right to call for such a change? The Guardian very properly says:

"The answer is, that the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians are not Established; that there is a difference between their legal relation to the State and that of the Anglican Church; that the laws of the latter society are laws made or enforced by the State as its own and as a matter of public concern, and not as merely portions of a private voluntarily created trust, and that this point of difference, which is denoted by the word Establishment, is the thing which it is proposed to remove. If Anglicanism is now no more established than they are, it will then be no less established than they are."

In an article on Lord Kingsdown's "Recollections of the Bar," the Edinburgh Review gives the following anecdote, which the Pall Mall knows to be true, and which furnishes an excellent illustration of the almost childish impatience with which the dominant ecclesiastical faction in Oxford is accustomed to regard all who, whatever their character, station, or attainments, seem in any way to have been instrumental in thwarting the ends of their party:

"A few months before Lord Kingsdown's death, when he was already known to be suffering from a mortal disorder, it was proposed in the Hebdomadal Board at Oxford to confer on him by that university the degree of Doctor of Laws, by accepting which he would have reflected at least as much honour on the university as the university could bestow upon him. The proposition was eagerly adopted by a large majority of the board, but it was opposed by Dr. Pusey and one other ecclesiastic, and to avoid the scandal of offering to so eminent a man a disputed honour, the motion was dropped. Oddly enough, Dr. Pusey himself thought it his duty to inform Lord Kingsdown of this occurrence, and to add that his opposition had proceeded from no want of respect to his lordship, but solely from the conviction that Lord Kingsdown had contributed to sustain, by his high judicial authority, judgments adverse to what Dr. Pusey is pleased to consider the spiritual interests of the Church. The anecdote is hardly worth preserving, and the mind of Lord Kingsdown was not so constituted as to be at all annoyed by it; but it may serve to show the irreconcilable hostility of some priests to the law of their country, and that they considered, with reason, Lord Kingsdown as one of its most fearless and honest interpreters."

The Rev. Llewelyn Davies writes to the Guardian to ask the following questions relating to what is called (by a disagreeably technical term) the Real Objective Presence:—

"When our Lord says, 'Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them,' is the presence intended a real objective one, or is it only subjective, in the sense of being created by the imaginations of those who are assembled? If the presence is objective, and the promise is a true one, must there not be a Real Objective Presence even when the Eucharist is not celebrated?"

"Could any presence of Christ under the form of a wafer equal in value His presence in the flesh with his disciples? And did Jesus say of that, 'If I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you?' When He had gone away and the Comforter had come, did not the believers—St. Stephen and St. Paul, for example—at other times than those of the breaking of bread, realise a more blessed presence in the Spirit, not subjective merely but objective, than any which had been felt by the Twelve whilst their Master was visibly with them?"

Mr. Davies adds:—

"It seems to me that a true Churchman must believe in the Real Objective Presence, but that he cannot confine it to the Eucharist."

A correspondent of the English Independent sends an account of a sensible sermon, delivered by the Rev. E. Abbott, in Mr. Davies's pulpit, on the text "Give us this day our daily bread." In his concluding remarks the preacher asked—What is a man's daily bread? Much more than his food, and that which conduces simply to his physical well-being. The man most to be pitied is he who sins and prospers, with whom all goes well, and who covers with his smiles a wrangling conscience. To be a walking sepulchre after this fashion is terrible indeed. There is very much necessary for a man besides worldly prosperity. The true daily bread is—work. To have, not an aimless and purposeless life, but a life-work for God—to know and feel that you are about the business for which God intended you—this will buoy a man up and make him happy—this is the only daily sustenance. "In saying this," added the preacher, "I have just been telling you in common language what some other preachers often tell you in Biblical language—that Christ is the Bread of Life, that he must be your daily bread. The real presence of Christ in the heart—and that is the only real presence I know of—will supply faith, love, and hope, by which you can do a life-work for God." In inviting the congregation afterwards to remain for the Communion, Mr. Abbott said that, whatever mysteries others might see in this Sacrament, he could see only the emblems of the Saviour's love and sacrifice.

The Life of Lord Liverpool which has just appeared contains several anecdotes illustrative of the abuses of State patronage in connection with the Church. Here is one. On the solicitation of a certain great marchioness, then supposed to be all-powerful, George IV. wanted to appoint a certain gentleman to a canonry at Windsor. Lord Liverpool replied grandly, "that it is his conscientious opinion, on inquiry, that the appointment of — to a canonry at Windsor, under all the present circumstances, would be most injurious to your Majesty's interests, and would give great umbrage to that part of the Establishment which is so strongly and deeply attached to your Majesty and your Government." "But," he proceeds, in gentler tones, "Lord Liverpool is most sincerely anxious to relieve your Majesty from any difficulty in which your Majesty may be involved in this most painful business; he will be desirous, therefore, of recommending — for a valuable living in the gift of the Crown as soon as there is an opening."

Under the heading "Livings v. Lights; or the rev. Ritualists' dilemma," Punch has the following: "To leave Rites in the lurch, or secede from the Church?"

Our lights or our livings to drop?

The Law (shame and woe!) says, 'Obey me, or go!' But the Profits advise us to stop.

"The Law and the Prophets we're bound to obey; As they differ, our duty's to doubt: So we think, on the whole, in our livings we'll stay, Until we are forced to turn out."

Were we to judge from a score or two of learned letters which have appeared in the Guardian, we might be led to think that Christianity was a matter of place and posture. The two points treated as of vital moment are, what is the right interpretation of "standing before the table," and ought the "priest" to kneel or not at his own communion. In regard to the former of these the great question is whether the celebrant should "face eastwards" and so turn his back on the people, as High Churchmen contend; or whether he should stand at the north end of the table, and so what he does be done "before the people," as Low Churchmen maintain. As this is a day of compromise, we would humbly suggest that both parties should meet each other half-way, and agree to have the table placed, as Lancashire people would say, "connywest."

The new number of the Fortnightly Review has an article on "The Physical Basis of Life," by Professor Huxley, in which he thus epigrammatically gives his estimate of Comtism:

"In so far as my study of what specially characterises the Positive Philosophy has led me, I find therein little or nothing of any scientific value, and a great deal which is as thoroughly antagonistic to the very essence of science as anything in ultramontane Catholicism. In fact, M. Comte's philosophy in practice might be compendiously described as Catholicism minus Christianity."

And in another part of his article he says:

"The man of science, who, forgetting the limits of philosophical inquiry, slides from these formulæ and symbols into what is commonly understood by materialism, seems to me to place himself on a level with the mathematician, who should mistake the x's and y's, with which he works his problems, for real entities—and with this further disadvantage, as compared with the mathematician, that the blunders of the latter are of no practical consequence, while the errors of systematic materialism may paralyse the energies and destroy the beauty of a life."

REVIEWS.

The Quarterly Review. January, 1869.

THE article most attractive to theological readers is one on the Ultra-Ritualists. It commences by showing that though the composition of the royal commission appointed on Ritualism in June, 1867, was generally thought to be too friendly to the Ultra-Ritualists, they were of a different opinion, and considered that they ought to have had about one-half of the commission favourable to their views. No wonder then that Dr. Littledale objects to their two reports.

The Ritualists' claims are next discussed. They "invest their fashion of service with a divine sanction, as being modelled after the celestial worship which was beheld by St. John in vision, and is described in the Book of Revelation." They seek to restore the Seven Sacraments, and especially to include Penance and Unction, which some would make extreme, with the Roman Church; and others would apply, with the Greek, for the benefit of ordinary sickness. They also favour the Invocation of Saints and Angels; the doctrine of Purgatory; and, by natural consequence, of Masses for the dead.

Various editions of the Prayer Book and other manuals seek to restore, as far as possible, the Roman Catholic usage, on the ground that the authorised Prayer Book avows what it omits to condemn. But the Ritualists are quite ready to interpret both its speech and its silence in their favour. This "spirit of disingenuousness and evasion . . . runs throughout the proceedings of the party;" and some instances of their shifting policy are given in the article.

They are further marked by a want of submission to authority. The Bishops are set at naught. The opinion of Convocation is denounced as of no value. The rule of the Primitive Church is to be taken; and each little company interprets that rule for itself; so that one set follows one rule, another another, and they might very safely have been let alone to ruin their own cause. They extol their own doubtful successes, and praise their own zeal with unusual want of good taste. Their progressive development of Ritualism has made them increasingly obnoxious—and yet more opposed—to the legal enactments for the government of the Church. Their reception of the recent judgment is finally noticed, with the expression of an opinion that some of the clergy will go to Rome; some be "carried by a violent recoil into latitudinarianism," while many, it may be hoped, will sober down into the ways of a truer English churchmanship. The article concludes with praising the spirit in which Dr. Miller advises his own (the Evangelical) party to consider the bearings of the recent decision on their own observances, with which the judgment will not (the reviewer thinks) interfere so seriously as was, at first, supposed.

Biographical Sketches. By Harriet Martineau. London: Macmillan and Co., 1869.

We hold Miss Martineau to be, unquestionably, one of the most remarkable women of the age; and whenever her life comes to be fully made known, this cannot fail to be acknowledged and felt. A few may have excelled her in fiction, and one or two have equalled her as a writer of history or of travel, but in the varied services which she has rendered to literature, from the time when her "Illustrations of Political Economy" first brought her into general notice, there is none, it seems to us, that can justly be placed beside her.

These Sketches, which appeared, at various times, in the Daily News, from 1852 to 1868, were much too good to be allowed to rest under the pall of oblivion which falls over the articles of a newspaper, and our thanks are due to Mr. J. R. Robinson, at whose suggestion these have been republished in their present form, and who most generously, as Miss Martineau informs us, "charged himself with all the trouble and responsibility while leaving her all the advantages of the publication." The number of sketches altogether is forty-six; of which five are of Royal personages, eleven of Politicians, ten of Professional men, two of Scientific men, four of Social, and fourteen of Literary celebrities. When we consider the circumstances under which they had to be written, often in haste, and generally while the authoress was suffering from the depressing effects of an incurable malady, they are wonderfully fresh and vigorous, and afford a striking testimony at once to the energy and activity of her mind. Our own acquaintance with two or three of the individuals whom she has described enables us to appreciate the skill with which those features of character are seized hold of and brought out that were best fitted to give a clear conception of it; and it is no slight proof of insight and discrimination that the years which have since elapsed have only tended to confirm the judgments given on so many public men at the time when they passed away. Of the force and ease with which Miss Martineau writes we need say nothing to those who are acquainted with any of her works; and we feel confident that our readers will find these Sketches both interesting and suggestive. It is just the kind of book to take up in those "unconsidered trifles" of time—those odd ten minutes, which are so often idly squandered, and to afford subjects for profitable thought.

We had marked several passages for extract, but can only make room for two. In an appreciative notice of the Duchess of Kent, to whom the nation is so greatly indebted for the wise bringing-up of the Queen, we meet with this:

"For the first ten years of her child's life she had lived retired, and had provided for the physical health and educational training of the Princess with all simplicity as well as completeness. All that was known was that the Princess was met, even in cold and windy days, dressed and in exercise in good pedestrian style—crossing a heath perhaps, with her young companions, in thick shoes and stout duffle cloak—and that she was reared in as much honesty and care about money matters as any citizen's child. It became known at Tunbridge Wells that the Princess had been unable to buy a box at a bazaar, because she had spent her money. At this bazaar, she had bought presents for almost all her relations, and had laid out her last shilling, when she remembered one cousin more, and saw a box, priced half-a-crown, which would suit him. The shop people of course placed the box with the other purchases; but the little lady's governess admonished them, by saying, 'No; you see the Princess has not got the money, and therefore, of course, she cannot buy the box.' This being perceived, the next offer was to lay by the box till it could be purchased; and the answer was 'Oh, well, if you will be so good as to do that—' and the thing was done. On quarter day, before seven in the morning, the Princess appeared on her donkey to claim her purchase. Anecdotes like these, apparently small, have large meanings; and in such traits people saw promise of the rectitude and elevated economy which have made the mother of our large royal family respected by the people whose need and convenience she has so admirably respected."

This is the touching conclusion of the sketch of poor Charlotte Brontë:

"'Shirley' was conceived and wrought out in the midst of fearful domestic griefs. Her only brother, a young man of once splendid promise, which was early blighted, and both her remaining sisters, died in one year. There was something inexpressibly affecting in the aspect of the frail little creature who had done such wonderful things, and who was able to bear up, with so bright an eye and so composed a countenance, under not only such a weight of sorrow, but such a prospect of solitude. In her deep mourning dress (neat as a Quaker's), with her beautiful hair, smooth and brown, and her sensible face indicating a habit of self-control, she seemed a perfect household image—irresistibly recalling Wordsworth's description of that domestic treasure. And she was this. She was as able at the needle as at the pen. The household knew the excellence of her cookery before they heard of that of her books. In so utter a seclusion as she lived in—in those dreary wilds where she was not strong enough to roam over the hills; in that retreat where her studious father rarely broke the silence—and there was no one else to do it; in that forlorn house, planted on the very clay of the churchyard, where the graves of her sisters were before her window; in such a living sepulchre, her mind could not but prey upon itself; and how it did suffer, we see in the most painful portions of her last novel, 'Villette.' She said, with a change in her steady countenance, that she should feel very lonely when her aged father died. But she formed new ties after that. She married; and it is the old father who survives to mourn her. He knows, to his comfort, that it is not for long. Others now mourn her in a domestic sense; and as for the public, there can be no doubt that a pang will be felt, in the midst of the strongest interests of the day, through the length and breadth of the land, and in the very heart of Germany (where her works are singularly appreciated), France, and America, that the 'Currer Bell' who so lately stole as a shadow into the field of contemporary literature has already become a shadow again—vanished from view, and henceforth haunting only the memory of the multitude whose expectation was fixed upon her."

THE RULE OF FAITH IN INDEPENDENT CHURCHES.

THE following letter recently appeared in one of the York papers, addressed to the editors:—

Your "Correspondence" of last week contains a letter signed "J. H. Teesdale," upon one part of which I shall be glad to be allowed to make a few remarks—inasmuch as the point involved is one of public interest, and has an immediate bearing upon the great question of religious liberty. I refer to the words, "What, then, is the Rule of Faith of Independent Churches? My answer is, the trust deeds of the Chapel. These are not all alike, but are all alike in stating that the Bible is the only rule of faith and practice."

This statement, I take leave to submit to Mr. Teesdale and your readers, cannot be received without considerable qualification. Doubtless the former part of it is correct. The latter part conveys an altogether erroneous impression of the facts of the case. The model trust deed, which has been extensively used among the Independents, is a well-known document. It is published, and may be bought for a shilling. This deed contains a schedule of doctrinal articles, seven in number (formerly eight). It also contains a clause providing that no one shall be permitted to officiate in a chapel as the stated minister "who shall be guilty of immoral conduct, or who shall cease to hold, teach, and preach the doctrines contained in the annexed schedule"—immoral conduct and reputed unsoundness in regard to the schedule being thus, curiously enough, classed together as of like importance.

Now it is quite true that the first of the seven articles declares the "supreme authority" of Holy Scripture, "as a rule of faith and practice." But it is equally true that this proposition is only affirmed as a dogma to be assented to, not as an article designed to confer on ministers and people the right to judge for themselves as to what the Scriptures teach—a most material difference, and one which is seen also in the Thirty-nine Articles. The doctrines deemed essential are carefully defined in the schedule, and no liberty whatever is reserved to any one to diverge from what is thus laid down.

I need scarcely add that I look upon this as a serious and unwarranted interference with the religious liberty of future generations of worshippers. In effect, the churches in which this course is followed allow and encourage the founders of a chapel to define for others what is a true faith, and to forbid any departure from it for all future time. If these founders were known to be infallible no objection could reasonably be made to such a course. They may, by possibility, be ill-informed or narrow-minded persons, quite unqualified to act the part of creed-makers for those who are to come after them. But, whether well or ill qualified, they obviously exercise a power which does not legitimately belong to any human being; and in the same degree they withhold from their congregational successors a privilege to which every man ought to attach the highest value—the privilege of judging for themselves in regard to the doctrines so imposed.

In thus proceeding, they appear to me to be doing for future ministers and congregations exactly what the State has done by Acts of Parliament for the established clergy. In both cases, I venture to say, there is the same failure to allow to others their Protestant right of private judgment; in both cases, the same imposition of extra-scriptural articles—articles, I mean, nowhere to be found in so many words in the Scripture, but drawn up by fallible men, who, whatever their personal respectability, or their donations towards a building fund, can have no right to prescribe to their successors for all time to come the precise terms or substance of their Christian faith.

I hope that Mr. Teesdale will excuse the freedom with which I have expressed myself. The subject is one of evident importance, especially in the present state of religious parties among us. It seems therefore to be right and necessary, as opportunity offers, that attention should be called to the marvellous inconsistency so widely prevailing, in this matter, between profession and practice. For, in truth, with most of the "denominations," it would almost appear as if the Reformation consisted mainly in the liberty, which they think it has given, to put their own doctrinal schedules and articles and confessions of faith in the place of the Pope.—I remain, &c., G. V. S.

UNIVERSITY HONOURS AND EXCLUSIONS.

ONE of the most powerful of the influences which are aiding in breaking down the entire exclusion of Dissenters from the higher honours of our National Universities is presented by the yearly publication of the examination lists. Many who would be impervious to arguments founded on abstract theories of religious equality cannot resist the instinctive sense of wrong, when they see men who have fairly beaten them in the competitions of the schools unable to receive the prize because of a difference of creed. And this is the appeal of facts which is now made almost every year. It was always one of the arguments for not making the changes required to throw the universities open, that the Dissenters who would avail themselves of such a change would be an insignificant minority, hardly worth taking into account. Undoubtedly they are a minority, but as undoubtedly they are not insignificant. They may not be conspicuous in the amusements, but they are unmistakably conspicuous in the studies of the University. We do not know how this is to be accounted for—perhaps the very fact of a young Nonconformist being at Cambridge argues that he must be a man in some way above the average—but the number of such men who appear in the Tripos is quite out of proportion to their number in the colleges. Again and again, of late years, the very highest honours have been notoriously carried off by Nonconformists. Both last year and the year before, the senior wranglers at Cambridge were Nonconformists—last year the son of a Wesleyan minister; in 1867 a Scotch Presbyterian; while in 1866 the second wrangler was the son of a Baptist minister, and the senior also a Scotchman, though we are uncertain as to his denominational position. This year the facts are even more striking; the list is headed for the first time by the name of a Jew, Mr. HARTOG, while among the wranglers are also several other names which point the same argument, the fifth place being taken by Mr. R. T. WRIGHT, the son of our friend, the Rev. JOHN WRIGHT, of Bury, who had already distinguished himself at Owens College, and several other names which we recognise as those of well-known Nonconformists appearing only a little lower on the list. Now these are positions which in University life almost certainly carry with them a Fellowship. A fellowship means an income of £200 or £300 a year when the University course is finished—a substantial help for the years which must pass before men can win much success in those higher professions to which such students naturally aspire. But from this these men are debarred, unless they will to a greater or less degree forego their religious scruples. They may enter the colleges, they may gain some of the minor honours in the way of degrees, but they may not hold a Fellowship unless they will sign a declaration of assent to the Thirty-nine Articles. In some cases this exclusion involves consequences peculiarly absurd. The University knows no distinction between Scotchmen and Englishmen, and the fellowships are equally open to all persons born in the Queen's dominions; but all must be members of the Church of England; so that the University which only admits an Englishman if he belongs to the church which the Queen has sworn to defend in England, admits a Scotchman only on condition of his being a Dissenter from the church which the Queen has equally sworn to defend in Scotland.

One of the most hopeful features in this matter is that even in the Universities themselves these facts are evidently telling. Dissenters may now and then find themselves a little at a discount among the multitude of ordinary students, whose chief notion of the Church of England is that it is the only religion fit for a gentleman; but among the real workers of the University there is a growing sense of shame at those who have fairly won the victory being excluded from its prize. In such quarters anything like jealousy of these men is almost unknown. Their fellow-workers honour the pluck and perseverance which have brought such men to their leading position in spite of difficulties and disadvantages. The professors, too, are proud of them, and feel aggrieved at having to lose men who, as Fellows, would for years have remained ornaments to their colleges. A signal illustration of this feeling has just been given at Cambridge. The form of admission to the degree of B.A., involves the invocation of the Trinity, not, indeed, by the graduate on whom the degree is conferred, but still in the form to which he is a party. Mr. HARTOG took exception to this, and begged that the reference to the Trinity should be omitted. A few years ago such a proposition would have been scouted, and we shall still be curious to see what the Mrs. GAMPS of the orthodox press have to say upon the matter. The authorities of the university have, however, granted his request, and the fact of their doing so constitutes an important precedent. They have, indeed, no power to relax the restrictions upon the Fellowships, but what they have done shows which way the highest public opinion is setting, and Mr. HARTOG's success is another powerful argument laid by in store for the time when the bill for throwing open university Fellowships shall be again brought forward in Parliament.

DR. MILLER, VICAR OF GREENWICH.

We take the following, with a few abridgments, from the Christian World:—

In the Saxon times there was brought to "the green village," as it was then called, an Archbishop of Canterbury of the name of Alphege. The Black Danes, who had their head-quarters here, fancied the archbishop to be a goodly prize. When a large ransom was demanded, he meekly answered, "My poor peasantry would be ruined to raise it." When they threatened to kill him, he replied that his life was not worth so much as that his people should be ruined for his sake, and so the Danish chiefs, flushed with wine, in a mad moment murdered him. The citizens of London brought the dead body and buried it in St. Paul's Cathedral, whence it was moved by Canute to Canterbury. The archbishop was, according to the fashion of those times, transformed into a saint, and where he fell the church of St. Alphege is erected, which is the parish church of Greenwich, and of which, in March, 1867, Dr. Miller, of Birmingham, became the rector. Here he had been extensively useful, and won for himself general esteem and love. On his departure the town presented him with one thousand guineas, and his congregation contributed six hundred guineas and a chest filled with silver plate; the volunteers subscribed a handsome vase, and other bodies sent addresses of more or less flattering character.

Of the Evangelical party in the Church Dr. Miller may be reckoned one of the leaders. In 1839, while still a young man, he was appointed assistant-minister of Park-street Chapel, Chelsea. There he laid the foundation of his popularity as a preacher, and published several volumes of sermons which added to his reputation. As an eloquent advocate of the claims of religious and philanthropic institutions he also attained to more than metropolitan fame. As a public speaker, lecturer, and preacher, he has ever taken a high stand; Exeter Hall is familiar with his name, and on several occasions he has had the honour of preaching before his own university—that of Oxford. In Greenwich he has already become almost as much of a power as he was in Birmingham. At first he had many difficulties to overcome. Under the old vicar things had gone on in a very quiet way, and people were not prepared at once to fall in with Dr. Miller's activity, or to appreciate his energy, and warmth, and Christian zeal.

As a preacher, Dr. Miller possesses qualifications of a high order. There is considerable originality in his sermons, which are delivered extempore, and with much animation. His knowledge of Scripture is great, and his argument is everywhere based upon it. He deals with the Bible as a barrister with his law reports—that is, he quotes chapter and verse. He is also much in the habit of repeating some of the choicest sayings of the old divines. Beyond most popular preachers of our time, he is simple, and easy to be understood by the lowest and most uneducated of his congregation. In the widest and fullest acceptance of the term, his preaching is evangelical—evangelical of the school of Simeon and others who first roused the Church of England from its sleep of centuries. Bunson complained of the Evangelicals that they go on thrashing the old straw. There may be something in this complaint, but the fact undoubtedly is, that if you want a church filled you must place in it a preacher of Evangelical life and power—a man who will know nothing but Christ and him crucified.

In habit, in appearance, Dr. Miller might be taken for a Dissenting clergyman. He is Low Church, of the lowest, yet his churches, for he preaches at one in the morning and at another in the evening, are as well filled as if you heard in them the most gorgeous music or saw in them the finest effects of man-millinery and Ritualism. Let not the reader go away with the idea that Dr. Miller is no Churchman. In his way he is a warm and enthusiastic one, and believes in the Church of England as it is, Biblical and Protestant and Catholic. He loves it as the outward organisation of those who have been renewed by a common spirit through faith in a common Redeemer and Head. Thus he has more sympathy with many outside the pale of his Church than he can have with many inside, with those, for instance, who put the Church in the place of the Bible, who prefer the means to the end. With such preachers as Dr. Miller there is no need to cast about for reasons for the Church's claims in State necessities, or in an apostolical succession which has never existed, and could have but little virtue if it did.

Personally Dr. Miller may be described as a powerful, well-made man, with a physiognomy indicating strength of character and love of hard work. Nature has favoured him with a powerful voice, so that there are few occasions when the reporter has to write, as he occasionally does of others, "Here the reverend gentleman was almost inaudible." Perhaps never had he a grander audience to preach to than on Sunday night (Jan. 24), under the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, yet his voice filled that enormous space, and he preached for nearly fifty minutes without the slightest appearance of difficulty or distress, and, what is better still, with a simple gospel spirit of affection and entreaty admirably fitted for the time and place. "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." Such was his text, and the plan of the sermon was simple enough—the demand made, and the twofold reason given for it; "the mercies of God," and the fact that it was a "reasonable service;" and to this arrangement, either by way of illustration, or argument, or appeal to be deduced from it, did the Doctor strictly confine himself. Of human philosophy we had little, of the Gospel much. There was no wide survey of human history, or of man in relation to the universe; the theme illustrated and enforced on the head and heart of the hearer was what God had done for the sinner, and the duty of the latter to God. I don't fancy the theme was a novelty to that great crowd; I judge, in spite of considerable violence, and roughness, and unseemly crowding at the gate on entrance, the hearers were regular church-goers; evidently they were not from the streets and corners and by-ways of the city—human wails for whose souls no one cares,—nevertheless the audience was as miscellaneous as it was large, and the Doctor could not well have selected a better subject for his solemn, and faithful appeal.

AMERICAN NOTES.

A correspondent of the English Independent who writes from Iowa College, maintaining that "a secular education is not synonymous with an irreligious one," says:

"I found it impossible to comprehend, when in your country, how you had gotten into such a dead lock among yourselves on the subject. It seemed then, and it seems to me still, that too much was made of an apparent necessity for teaching Nonconformity in day-schools to counteract the schools 'nationally' subject to the Establishment. And I thought I foresaw that when the end of the Establishment approached—as Mr. Goldwin Smith prophetically assured me if would, ere long—that necessity would prove and seem to be no necessity at all, and you would all easily and logically come to the ground of evangelical people in America on the subject. No class of Christians amongst us would think of demanding or arguing that our elementary schools should teach religious tenets, except High Churchmen. You had an example of this sort of extreme sectarianism at the Wolverhampton Congress, in the person of a silly Western bishop, of the name of Whitehouse, who has shown so ridiculous and un-American an aping of lordly foreign ways—his weak head having evidently been turned by being dubbed 'My Lord Bishop' at the Pan-Anglican Synod—that secular journalists propose that the vacant Canadian mitre should be offered him, and openly declare that Chicago would be very happy to furnish a candidate for it, and be rid of him. His recent childish ambition to create a chapter in his 'Bishop's Church' at Chicago would doubtless be fully satiated in Canada. The man who could tell Englishmen that if he were an English Churchman he would fight for the State Establishment to the bitter end, might be expected to have so little judgment on American feeling as to assert that our school system is fatally defective in not having incorporated the religious teachings of his insignificant but pretentious sect."

The pew-letting in Mr. Beecher's church, at Brooklyn, seems to be conducted on most tradesmanlike principles. Here is a sample of the modus operandi, Mr. Pillsbury acting as auctioneer:

"Well, gentlemen, you can take the choice of any seat in the house—except Mr. Beecher's. How much am I offered, gentlemen? Two hundred dollars! twenty-five, fifty, seventy-five, three hundred, three-fifty, four hundred dollars, gentlemen, five, ten, fifteen, four hundred and fifteen dollars, gentlemen. Who is the happy man? Going at twenty, at twenty, at twenty, at four hundred and twenty dollars! Four hundred and twenty! Have you all done at four hundred and twenty dollars? Sold to Henry C. Bowen, for four hundred and twenty dollars." Mr. Bowen took No. 89, the second pew directly behind the pastor's. It should be understood that the amounts bid were premiums in addition to the assessed value of the pews. Mr. Bowen's pew being 120 dollars, cost him 540 dollars. The other pews were disposed of in the same manner, twenty having been sold consecutively for three hundred dollars each. The total amount of this year is 54,500 dollars for pew rent alone. Last year the amount was 48,700 dols. The premiums alone this year are 42,500 dols.

Our readers may remember that the Rev. Mr. Hubbard, rector of Christ Church, Westerley, some little time ago was charged with violating his engagement as a clergyman of the Episcopal Church, by allowing Mr. Denison, a non-episcopally ordained minister, to officiate in his church, and inviting and directing him to read the Absolution. The Ecclesiastical Court of Rhode Island, to whom the case was referred, have decided in his favour, and declared him "Not guilty."

At a meeting of the Synod of New York and New Jersey, a series of resolutions were passed relating to the Pope's encyclical letter, as addressed to "all Protestants and non-Catholics throughout the world." After referring to the assertion therein made of his "authority to govern the persuasions of the human intellect, and to direct the actions of men in private and social life," the resolutions proceeded as follows:

"Whereas, all such claims and assertions on the part of the Pope of Rome are to the last degree unfounded in fact, contrary to the truth, reason, Scripture, and the whole genius of Christianity, and if allowed, must prove subversive to all human rights and liberties:

"Whereas, recent movements, especially in Austria and Spain, nations long in subjection to the monstrous pretensions of the Papacy, command the prompt recognition, sympathy, and support of all friends of humanity, freedom, and religion throughout the world—therefore be it resolved, that the facts here recorded furnish and present a proper and fitting occasion, for all Protestant Churches throughout Christendom, each in the mode which its own wisdom shall suggest, to prepare and set forth for general distribution, through the same channels which the Pope himself has chosen, a suitable response to his letter, which response shall contain a statement of the reasons why his claims can in no wise be recognised, as being inconsistent with a Catholicity more Catholic than Rome, the authority of infallible Scripture, and the glorious supremacy of Jesus Christ:

"Resolved, that a committee be appointed by this synod, whose duty it shall be to consider the expediency of corresponding with other Protestant bodies in this country and in Europe, as to the propriety of such timely action for the furtherance of free, Biblical, Protestant Christianity.

"Resolved, that it be referred to the same committee, to prepare and publish a reply to the said letter of the Pope, which shall be regarded as an expression of the sentiments of the synod, concerning the matters therein contained, as being of vital importance to all civil and religious liberty throughout the world, and to the salvation of the human race."

The question of the adequate support of the ministry is exciting attention in the States, as well as here. The Nation has the following remarks on the subject:

"The salaries of clergymen now are much lower, as compared with the salaries of thirty or forty years ago, than people imagine who judge merely from the amount in money. Setting aside the decrease in the value of gold and silver coin within that period, which is considerable but uncertain in amount, we must take into account the depreciation of the paper currency as well as the loss of the social consideration in which the ministerial office was once held, and the great increase in the demand made on it as regards culture and mental activity. When clergymen were almost the only cultivated men in the community, and its principal guides, even in political matters, of course the deference with which they were treated exercised its usual influence in making the profession attractive independently of the salary. They no longer occupy this position, and no attempt has been made by congregations to make up for the loss of it in fixing the amount or nature of their remuneration. Then, also, a clergyman's literary and professional training at college one hundred, or even forty or fifty years ago, nearly carried him safely and successfully through his professional career. A few books of reference added to the standard text-books of the divinity school enabled him to meet the intellectual demands of his time. Dogmas were tolerably well settled, and the mind of the community, if active on religious matters, kept within very narrow bounds. All this is now changed. In our time the best school and college training only very slenderly fits a man for the teacher's office. He can only keep up with his work, and make himself feel equal to his work by incessant labour and keeping constant watch of the social and intellectual movements of the day in all countries. This means, when you come down to hard facts, that he must keep constantly buying books and periodicals, and must enjoy now and then the means of intercourse with other men of intellectual tastes and habits, and some practical acquaintance, however slight, with the great social forces. Ministers of real power, and animated by a high sense of duty, feel and know all this, but are not sufficiently well paid to help themselves. The consequence is, that hundreds and thousands of them pass their lives in what is, to a man who takes just views of life, the saddest of all positions—that of a labourer who has undertaken to do work which, through no fault of his own, he finds he cannot do well, or cannot do at all. Seeing this, it is no wonder that the best young men avoid the profession, or only enter it in small numbers. The remedy will come when the well-to-do Christians who compose their congregations make the demand for ministers and missionaries effective by offering to set apart a larger portion of their own gains for the use of those whom they ask to help them in solving the great problems of existence. The argument that ministers ought not to want more money, and therefore do not need it, is an argument which one meets with frequently both in political and social discussion; but the proper field for its use is the nursery. Ministers are men, and you cannot make anything but men of them by any course of training. That the Catholic Church does not suffer from this difficulty does not affect our position. Priests have neither wives nor children; and it is human to be willing to take less pay for an office in which you exercise the power of forgiving or retaining sins, are confessed to as the representatives of the Almighty, and meet a congregation as its spiritual master, than for an office in which your business is simply to teach, and perhaps bears as much unmanly and ignorant criticism as the constitution of a sedentary man can stand."

PRAYER BOOK REFORM.

THOUGH the leaders of the two great parties in the Church, from their nervous dread of change, are alike opposed to a revision of the Prayer Book, there is evidently a feeling springing up which the late decision of the Privy Council has done much to quicken, that considerable alterations will ere long have to be made. This feeling is manifesting itself in various quarters, and is forcibly expressed in a leading article of last week's Echo, from which we make the following extracts:

"No one can have studied the rubrics with any care without seeing that they are very imperfect; that some of them are contradictory; that others are vague; that others are wholly inadequate to provide for the unforeseen contingencies which have since multiplied upon us. Now no one, not even Mr. Purchas or Mr. Going, can imagine that there is anything very awful in the majesty of the rubrics, or that they possess the slightest breath of inspiration. They are in no respect more sacred than those wretched and repulsive services for King Charles' 'the martyr' and the Gunpowder Plot, which, with their fawning and blasphemous flatteries, might have been sufficient even to disgust a partisan of 'the right divine of kings to govern wrong.' Thanks to Lord Ebury and others, these miserable compositions no longer deface our Book of Common Prayer. Will there never be enough charity, enough mutual forbearance, enough public spirit, enough common sense among us, to make some half-dozen other alterations which would turn many lukewarm supporters into zealous friends, and many professed enemies into neutrals and admirers? Let us not forget that the Church of England has twice been within an ace of securing this most desirable consummation—once at the Savoy Conference, in the reign of King James, and once in the reign of William and Mary. The records of the Savoy Conference are one of the most deplorable proofs of the petty narrowness and Laodicean worldliness which then disgraced the English Church. Had the Episcopalians been large-minded enough, or spiritual enough, to recognise the learning and holiness of such men as Baxter and Lightfoot, how different, even now, might the position of the English Church have been! A single story will show how illiberal was the Episcopal spirit. The eminent Nonconformists whom we have named, and their colleagues in the conference, had mentioned the inconvenience of reading the Burial Service beside the grave in stormy weather, and when the officiating minister was in weak health. The good sense of the remark has been confirmed by the fact that many and many an English clergyman has since died of colds or other disorders incurred by this exposure to the air, uncovered in inclement weather. But the only answer that the Bishops deigned to give was, that 'the objection being, not for the sake of tender consciences, but of tender heads, might be helped by a night cap rather than a rubric.' No good thing in the way of reform could be expected to come of a spirit at once so contemptuous, so uncompromising, and so silly; yet once more, years afterwards, one last attempt at improvement was made. At the suggestion of Tillotson, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, a commission was appointed of the most eminent clergymen 'to consult together on such alterations as would best tend to the edification of the Church, and the reconciling of all differences.' Some new collects were composed by Bishop Patrick, who possessed the rare gift of writing beautiful and appropriate prayers, and were corrected by writers so eloquent and graceful as Burnet, Stillingfleet, and Tillotson; a new and more accurate version of the Psalms was made by Bishop Kidder, who was an excellent Hebraist; and every word or expression in the Prayer-book which had given offence was collected by Tenison, and others substituted with the exactest judgment. Never was the Church of England more near the fruition of a wise and memorable hope. But, unfortunately, the proposed revision was submitted to Convocation; the jealousies of the High Church party were aroused then as now; the two Houses disagreed, were repeatedly prorogued, and were finally dissolved. The kind of cackle took place for which Convocation is chiefly distinguished, and one more historical proof was furnished, if any proof were needed, that there is no existing body of men so utterly unsuited for all purposes of real business and calm discussion as a body of clerics like that which, if Mr. Mackonochie and his party had their way, would now be arbitrating on our religious beliefs, and would soon improve all liberal and able Churchmen off the face of the earth."

While maintaining that the Prayer Book is wholly unsuited for a doctrinal document, and referring to the contrast which must strike every one between the Calvinistic articles and the Arminian liturgy, still the Echo fears that, in the present state of the Church, there is not the slightest chance of reasonable concession on the part of either Evangelicals or Ritualists. But, it continues,

"There is one change which ought to be made at all costs, and which we are quite sure that a Liberal Government like the present could carry with the all but universal approval of all thoughtful laymen, and that is the expulsion from the Prayer Book of the Athanasian Creed; or, if not its expulsion, at least its relegation to some less prominent position; or, if not even that, at least a permitted option as to its use or omission. It is impossible to speak too strongly on this matter. In the first place, as every one knows, the Creed is not the work of St. Athanasius at all, but was written long after his death. It cannot be necessary, because during four centuries, at least, the Christian Church did admirably well without it. The use of it is in direct defiance to the anathemas of the four Ecumenical Councils against the adoption of any other Creed but the Apostles' and the Nicene. It is, in fact, an unauthorized and nameless forgery; but even this is hardly worth considering in comparison with the nature of the composition itself. There never was a more conspicuous instance of darkening wisdom by words without knowledge. It is held by some that it was written by an enemy of the faith as a perplexing and doubt-inspiring attempt to state with the most offensive particularity, and to reduce to the hardest logic, mysteries which infinitely transcend all logic, and which the Holy Scriptures purposely leave undefined, or state only in their practical relation to man's redemption. The fact is that no human being, except a few hopeless fanatics, believes the creed as it stands. No human being believes that every one will 'without doubt perish everlastingly' who does not believe a number of violently contradictory logical propositions of truths wholly incapable of expression in a syllogistic mould. The childish iterations of this unfortunate creed, its rigid needless persistencies, its sweeping, impossible, intolerable, uncharitable, damatory clauses,—the transparent hypocrisy of repeating it when we know it, in its plain and literal sense, to be glaringly in defiance of all our best beliefs,—all these, and many other circumstances, quite account for the gloom, the irritation, the despairing resignation, or the unconcealed disgust which we mark on many faces in every congregation when the clergyman self-complacently begins, or still worse when the organ revengefully drones out, the shudder-causing commencement of the Quicumque vult. Archbishop Tillotson wished the Church of England well rid of it. Archbishop Whately used, we believe, to boast that he had never read it in church, having purposely abstained from looking to see the days on which it ought to be read. The late gentle and saintly Bishop Lonsdale used always to be silent when the time came to utter the responses in its damatory clauses, and in those versicles also the deep resonant voice of Dr. Arnold, as Rugby men can well remember, used suddenly to be hushed. How much longer are we to be tortured, and our friends alienated, and our enemies embittered, by this incubus, which the Churches of Germany and America have long thrown off? If charity and common sense cannot rid us of it, will authority do nothing to ease our conscience of a yoke which neither we nor our fathers have been able to bear?"

OPEN CHURCH PAPERS.

By BROOKE HERFORD.

V.—CHURCH SUPPORT: SOMETHING BETTER THAN FEW RENTS WANTED.

WE are trying in the free and open churches a double experiment—are returning in two great matters to the principles which, until comparatively recently in the world's history, have been almost universal in the institutions of worship. The one is the principle of the open church—the maintaining the church, not as a proprietary place of worship for the accommodation of those who like to hire seats, but, as a temple of the living God freely open to the public use. The other is the principle of leaving the support of the church to the free-will offerings of the people—carried out in the plan of an offertory as a part of the regular service. These things are not necessarily connected. The open church plan might be adopted without the offertory. As a fact open churches are supported in various ways. Some are provided for by endowments; some by a fixed subscription list on the part of those permanently interested; though, in most I believe, an offertory collection at every service is adopted. I wish to put this distinctly, because though I believe that there is no way so simple, so convenient; no way so truly reverent and religious, as the offertory when it is worthily carried out, yet I cannot help feeling that the principle of having our churches perfectly open is even more important than any subsequent consideration of how they can be best supported. Once restore our places of worship to the old idea, let them be perfectly open places of public resort, and there will never be any great difficulty as to their maintenance! Nay, I believe, further, that instead of those already attached to them supporting them less liberally when they feel that their own personal proprietorship in them is merged in a larger dedication to the public use, they will feel drawn to maintain them in a far nobler way than ever they have done while thinking merely of providing the conveniences of their own worship. In every way, financially as well as religiously, that making of all churches perfectly free and open is calculated to ennoble and enhance our church life. Certainly some change is needed. Our places of worship are not supported as they ought to be at present.

The principle of the pew-rent which has come in later times to be the general mode of supporting places of worship—is merely this—a business payment for a certain proportionate accommodation. It needs not many words to show how poorly that must act. People feel that “business is business.” So long as the idea is merely that of a business payment or rent for certain accommodation people naturally ask, what will be sufficient? how little will suffice? As the object is to make it as easy as possible for people of all sorts to take sittings, the one question which settles what the managers shall fix as the seat-rent, is, how little will provide what is necessary. Things are a little better, where the seat-rent is fixed very low in order to make it easy for the poor to join, and the bulk of the support is met by voluntary guaranteed subscriptions. This indeed is a kind of offertory in its way, though an offertory in which only the rich can join, but still the initial mistake tells, people think of it, as supporting a place for their own religious wants, and they look upon it as a business matter, and cannot get out of the thought of—how much is actually required. Then the way in which these business payments have to be collected adds to the inconvenience of this plan. It may not matter to a rich man whether he gives something every week or draws a cheque once a year, probably, as simplifying a business matter he would prefer the latter. But it matters very much to the poor, and surely in His church whose glory it was that he preached the gospel to the poor, and that the common people heard him gladly, the arrangements ought to start from the scale of what the poor need, and what the poor are able to do. Now, supposing a poor man wishes to attend a place of worship regularly, he wants, of course, to do it on the same footing as other people: and the hardest arrangement for him is one which expects him to pay his share—even though it be only a few shillings—all at once. It is not only the poor who feel this, I believe all feel it except the very well to do. I will mention one way in which I have seen its injurious operation again and again. Among my old congregation in Sheffield there were many not poor, yet not rich—small masters or struggling tradesmen—many of them old attached members—with considerable families, having to rent five or six or more sittings. Now, even in good times I know these found their half-yearly or yearly pew-rent not always easy to meet; but when bad times came, times of struggle and difficulty, lasting, perhaps, for years, it constantly happened that some such families had altogether to give up their pews; they would try to keep them on for a while, but gradually got behindhand, and then the amount was only harder to meet, so that at last they had to leave. Because, after being accustomed to have places of their own, they could never be persuaded to keep on attending regularly when they could no longer do so on the same footing as other people.

I know nothing among the minor disadvantages of the pew system which troubled me more than this, and it continually uncoil my work at one end as fast as I was trying to build it up at the other. I felt it was so entirely a difficulty created by ourselves—an altogether unnecessary one—for if there had been a weekly offertory, these very same people could have given something, though only a little, and in good times they would have given more again; and even apart from that the great thing is, we should have kept them with us, and they would have retained their habit of worship just at the very time of difficulty and anxiety when it is most blessing to a man to be able to go up quietly to the house of prayer and there be helped to keep a good heart and cast his burden on the Lord.

Thus even for the mere support of the place of worship itself the modern pew-rent system is a bad one; but its worst effect is upon the various objects and agencies, necessary to healthy church life, but which can hardly be charged to men, as the cost of their sittings may be. These agencies have to support themselves how they can. People learn to consider that they have done the fair thing, all they can really be expected to do, when they have supported their own arrangements for their own worship as much as may be required. Everything else is a sort of extra—a matter of task and feeling—must make its own appeal, and squeeze what it can out of those specially interested. See what this involves. In the first place it causes almost all these church activities,—missions, Sunday schools, ragged schools, and so forth,—which a true Christian people would feel, are just as essential a part of their religious institution as their own preachings and prayers, to be more or less crippled for want of support. And, in the second, to secure even such inadequate support, all sorts of means have to be resorted to; special sermons, with importunate appeals for this and that object; special musical attractions, as if the church were a concert-room; children sent out into the streets with missionary cards; and, in addition, bazaars and other occasional resources for enticing people into reluctant giving. Even the least objectionable of these ways, special collections, is, to the extent to which it is now generally carried, little better than a mischief and a hindrance to true religious life. Surely it is worth considering whether the matter of church support is not on a wrong footing, and whether something better may not be found than pew-rents.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

UNION WITHOUT UNITY.

Two lives appeared to blend
Like confluent streams—meeting each other's need
With amplitude that oneness seemed to lend
To thought no less than deed.

And such increasing signs
Of unity did passing years afford,
We thought that not more closely, firmly twines
The strong Wisteria's cord.

Where drips the freezing rain, [sighs,
Or through dead leaves November's night wind
All loss and dust—one of this mated twain
A shunned remembrance lies.

A fireside's life and glow
The other's ready speech and smile reveal,
Whose costly, decorous semblances of woe
Bear fashion's strictest seal.

Hopes, pleasures, all of earth
One now deplores with humbling shame and grief;
One deems them still of unabated worth,
And craves their mean relief.

Yet, wisdom will not frown
Upon such poor affection as a lie;
'Twas simply shallow, and it reached not down
To things that never die,

To Faith in man and God!
Unfaltering Hope, and Love that will not cease
Passed on, to lead the way by dear ones trod
Up to eternal peace.

Ah! if these human ties
No heavenward mutual aim and help have known,
How brief and frail all kindest sympathies,
And we—O, how alone!

Yes, that is truly love
Whose helpful ministry death cannot sever;
Unseen, it guides us still, and waits above
To bless us there, for ever.

AN EASTERN HOUSE.

A NEW edition of Dr. Kitto's "Bible Illustrations," revised and enlarged by Dr. J. L. Porter, has been recently published from which we take the following description illustrative of "the paralytic on the house-top." (Mark ii. 1-4).

"As soon as the first excitement created by the cure of the leper had subsided, our Lord appeared in the town of Capernaum, where, in His own house, or perhaps in that of Peter, He declared His doctrine to those who repaired to Him. It being ascertained where He might be found, persons of consideration repaired to Capernaum, not only from other parts of Galilee, but even from Judea and Jerusalem; some, doubtless, in search of benefit to their souls, some from curiosity to see and hear One whose name was in every mouth, and others to watch whether any dangerous principles lurked in a doctrine so actively promulgated. Among these—and all probably belonging to the last mentioned class—were Pharisees and doctors of the law. With persons of this class sitting by, Jesus was one day addressing a dense congregation in the house, when a circumstance occurred which has been greatly misunderstood for want of an accurate apprehension of the difference between Oriental houses and our own, and which may therefore render some details on this subject necessary, so far at least as may be of assistance in explaining the transaction.

Our own houses usually front the street, towards which they display all their ornamental architecture; and, as our houses are double, or have one room or set of rooms behind another on each floor, together forming the thickness (or, as it is called, 'depth') of the house, there is another secondary front behind, with windows to give light to the back rooms, and looking towards a court or garden in the rear. All this is different in the East. There are no back rooms, and, consequently, no need of two fronts to a house. The front, instead of being towards the street, is turned towards an inner court, and the back is presented to the street in the shape of a lofty dead wall, of the height of the house, and generally constructed of mud. There is, however, a latticed window high up, or a kind of projecting balcony, screened with latticed work, belonging to an apartment called in Scripture 'the summer parlour,' and 'the chamber in the wall.' The outer gate, being of necessity toward the street, is, of course, at the back of the house. A person does not enter by this at once into the court, but goes through a low passage; nor when the door is open can one see through into the court or view any of the interior building. This is avoided by making the actual entrance into the court, not at the end of the passage, but in one of the sides near the end. Passing this we are in the court. We do not here find merely one front of building looking into it but two or three, as the case may be, though seldom four. The reason is that the Easterns do not build their houses in many stories, but lay out, side by side, the chambers which we pile up over each other; so that an eastern house, with not more accommodation than we, with our double rooms and floor above floor can rear upon a contracted foundation, and with one narrow frontage, will, in the East, require a large area, and a frontage extended around the sides of the court. There are usually but two floors—the ground floor and an upper floor. The ground floor comprises the kitchen, store-rooms, and various domestic offices; and the family lives in the upper floor, the chambers of which look into and open into a gallery, to which there is access by one or two staircases, usually of stone. The gallery is generally broad, and is covered with a boarded roof supported by wooden pillars. This roof effectually shades the inhabited rooms from the sun.

We are speaking of the house as having only one court, as that is sufficient for our immediate purpose. But it must be noticed that the better sort of houses have often two courts, one within another, and sometimes even three. In this case, as all but the outer court are the private parts of the house, to which no strangers or visitors have access, the transactions recorded could only have taken place in the outer court, if, which seems to us not likely, the house in which our Lord was, had more courts than one. The middle room of the principal frontage, which is commonly the one on the side of the court farthest from the entrance, lies wholly open, displaying the decorated apartment in which the master of the house receives and entertains his visitors. In this room, we suppose, the doctors of the law and other strangers, who are described as sitting by, were seated, for there was no other place for sitting, while Jesus stood forth in the gallery, with His disciples and other privileged persons, and thus addressed the persons assembled in the court below.

It was then that some persons, bearing a helpless paralytic in his bed, came to the house in the hope that Jesus would heal him. But the court, and even the inner door, being crowded, they could not get near to the place where He stood. What was to be done? Friendly zeal is inventive of expedients, and as the idea of going to the top of a house is as familiar to an Oriental as going to any room in it, it occurred to them that if they could get their afflicted friend to the roof of the house, it might be safely managed to let him down in his bed to the place where Jesus stood. But how were they to take him to the roof? Of the external stairs, leading to the house-top, of which some writers speak, we have no knowledge, the access to the roof being generally, as far as we have seen, from the interior of the court. It is often, however, near the door which opens into the court, and they might, with a little entreaty and some pushing, have gained access to it. But as there is said to have been a great crowd even 'about the door,' we incline to think they availed themselves of an easier and more obvious expedient. This was to go next door and ask leave to take their friend to the top of that house, where they could easily pass him over the parapet to the roof to which they desired to have access."

FIDELITY TO PRINCIPLE.

THE following striking example of resolute adherence to principle was given by a Friend, named Wm. B. Hockett, of Randolph, North Carolina, during the late American war. In June, 1863, he was arrested under the Confederate Conscription Act, and ordered to bear arms and serve in the ranks. This he firmly refused to do, as being contrary to the spirit and precepts of Christianity. The colonel of the regiment to which he was allotted was resolved to force him into submission. He therefore ordered him to be laid upon the ground, and a gun to be tied on his back. He refused to rise with the weapon. A party of soldiers were then ordered to stab him with their bayonets, but they only pierced his clothes. Hockett expressed his wish to be respectful to authority, but said that he was willing to lay down his life rather than disobey Christ. The soldiers were then drawn up to shoot him, and just as the order to fire was being given, he prayed aloud, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Hereupon the soldiers refused to fire, some of them exclaiming, "We cannot shoot such a man!" The enraged colonel then struck savagely at Hockett's head, but missed his aim. He then spurred his horse repeatedly to ride over him, but the horse sprang aside every time, and the Friend remained unhurt. The colonel then desisted from further assaults, but exclaimed that he would yet make Hockett fight or else kill him. Two days afterwards, the battle of Gettysburg took place; Hockett was too ill to move, but the colonel took part in the conflict and was slain. After the battle Hockett was found by the Federal cavalry, and taken as a prisoner of war to Fort Delaware. Some of the Northern Quakers, hearing of this, memorialised the Government for his release. A telegram was promptly sent from the War Office, ordering his release upon the usual promise of allegiance to the United States. Although very loyal he scrupled to promise to "defend" the Government in its military sense. He was told he must either promise this or be imprisoned till the end of the war. He chose the latter alternative. Eventually his true loyalty was explained and acknowledged; he received a full release, and was permitted to join his relatives in the Western States.

READY REPLIES.—III.

A STINGY husband accounted for all the blame of the lawlessness of his children in company by saying his wife always "gave them their own way." "Poor things, it's all I have to give them," was her prompt reply.

Henry Ward Beecher some time ago applied to Oliver Wendell Holmes, author of the "Autocrat of the Breakfast-table" and other works, to recommend him a remedy for asthma. "Gravel; it should be taken about eight feet deep," was the humorous physician's encouraging answer; a recipe which may be relied upon as a certain cure for most of the ills that flesh is heir to.

A gentleman complained to his shoemaker that he had made the soles of his boots too thick. "Oh!" said he, "you'll find 'em wear thin enough in a little while."

The Boston (U.S.) Advertiser says:—"A noted democratic politician of this vicinity was once asserting his entire indifference to the opinions of his opponents, and to their personal abuse. 'Why,' said he, 'a man likened me the other day to Judas Iscariot, but I don't care.' 'Yes,' said a bystander, 'but how does Judas feel about it?'"

"What is that dog barking at?" asked a fop whose boots were more polished than his brains. "Why," says a bystander, "he sees another puppy in your boots."

An Irish peasant being asked why he permitted his pig to take up its quarters with his family, replied, with a curious mixture of naïveté and satire, "Why not? Doesn't the place afford every convenience that a pig can require?"

"Mamma," said a little fellow one day, "have angels wings?" "Oh! certainly," says mamma, full of ideas derived from pictures, "they have wings." "Then what did they want a ladder for to get down to Jacob?"

INTELLIGENCE

ARDWICK: WHITFIELD-STREET.—The little band of workers at this place held their school anniversary on Sunday last, and it was the most successful one, in every way, that they have yet had. A sermon was preached in the morning by the Rev. Dr. Beard, and another in the evening by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, and the collections amounted to £7.10s. In the afternoon recitals were given by several of the children in a very pleasing manner, and afforded great satisfaction to a large number of their parents and others.

FORFAR.—On Tuesday evening the Rev. H. Williamson gave his second lecture in Forfar. An active local committee, which was formed at a former meeting, had made the necessary arrangements. The hall unfortunately proved too small.

There were about two hundred people inside, but the approaches and doorways were crowded. The subject of the lecture was the Doctrine of the Trinity. Several questions were put, and addresses were given by individuals. The meeting may be justly regarded as a success: several additional names were put upon the committee: a number of tracts were distributed.

KENTISH TOWN: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CLARENCE-ROAD.—The annual distribution of prizes and tea party for the Sunday scholars took place on Thursday, the 28th inst., in Milton (lower) Hall. After tea, the prizes (21 in number) were presented by the Rev. P. W. Clayden, who presided on the occasion. Medals were also presented by Messrs. F. Allen (superintendent) and G. H. Midlane. At the close of the presentation, Mr. Allen called upon the senior boy in the boys' first class to present Miss E. J. Gazeley with a handsomely-bound copy of the Chandos edition of "Longfellow's Poems," and an illuminated address, the work of Mr. Allen. This incident, which took every one by surprise, was received with loud and hearty cheers from those present, showing how much Miss Gazeley's services in the school for a lengthened number of years are appreciated. After this, short speeches were delivered by the chairman, and Messrs. Hockley, Midlane, and Allen, the remainder of the evening being devoted to amusement. The annual report, read during the evening, showed that the school was in a very flourishing state. The number of scholars during the past year was 119, and all the institutions connected with it were in a satisfactory condition. The number of scholars in 1867 was 80, so that the increase during the past year was a most decided one.

KIRRIEMUIR.—On Monday last the Rev. H. Williamson lectured in this town, about two hundred persons being present. The interest manifested in the principles of Unitarian Christianity was most encouraging. The movement has become developed sufficiently for the local expenses to be met on the spot. Copies of Mr. Glover's tract upon Unitarianism were distributed.

MIDDLESBROUGH.—On Wednesday evening week, the congregation met to welcome their newly-appointed minister, the Rev. W. Brunton, from the Home Missionary Board, Manchester. Mr. J. MacNay, in an earnest address, gave the welcome, after which Mr. Brunton responded in an energetic, practical, and touching speech. The Rev. W. Elliott, Stockton, followed, and after reviewing the history of the little church at Middlesbrough, appealed to the congregation to support their minister by their presence at the services, their sympathy, and their prayers. The meeting was afterwards addressed by Mr. Wetherley and other friends. W. Fallows, Esq., presided, and suitable pieces of music were given at intervals.

OLDHAM.—On Saturday, the 30th ult., the members of the Mutual Improvement Class, with a number of friends, held a farewell tea party in the Lord-street schoolroom, to take leave of the Rev. James Macdonald, who is about to enter upon his ministry at Nantwich. After tea the chair was occupied by the Rev. C. W. Robberds, who, on behalf of the members of his former class, presented Mr. Macdonald with "The History of Philosophy," by G. H. Lewes, in two handsome volumes.

OXTON FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—The anniversary Sunday-school services were held on Sunday, Monday, and Wednesday, the 17th, 18th, and 20th January. On Sunday the Rev. J. Page Hopps preached, morning and evening, and collections were made. In the afternoon 60 certificates were presented to 52 scholars, whose attendance during the past year had averaged 50 Sundays each, some taking certificates for both morning and afternoon schools. On Monday evening the parents of the scholars, to the number of about 100, took tea together, after which, J. Jones, Esq., being in the chair, addresses were given by Mrs. Morton, Messrs. Shaw (Park-lane) and Lewin, and Revs. C. Wickstead, B.A., A. Gordon, M.A., T. Jones, J. Cuckson, and J. Alsop, of Liverpool. The Rev. W. Oates, of Birkenhead, was present, but could not remain to take part in the meeting.

STAND.—The members of the Sick Society belonging to the Unitarian Sunday school and congregation held their annual meeting on Saturday, January 30, the Rev. W. C. Squier, president, in the chair. The report showed 92 members, of whom 74 are under thirty years of age. The income for the year had been £41.11s.1d.; the expenditure had been £23.11s.4d., the gain being £17.19s.9d. The members relieved during the year had been 10 males, who had had 172 days' sickness, at a cost of £9.10s.6d.; and 17 females, who had had 230 days' sickness, at a cost of £9.11s.6d. The society is in a very satisfactory state, having in hand £118.8s.7d.

SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA.—On Tuesday, November 17th, 1868, the fifteenth anniversary meeting of the Unitarian church in this city was held in the Temperance Hall, Pitt-street. There was a very large gathering at the tea, which was followed by a literary and musical entertainment, which elicited unqualified praise from an audience of nearly 400 persons. The Rev. James Pillars, minister of the church, presided, and referred at some length to their ecclesiastical position and prospects, which could hardly, he thought, be more encouraging. Their church, after working and paying its way for fifteen years, had now secured a strong and permanent position in the community. There, as in the old country, it was as clear as could be that the popular Christianity of the day was slowly but surely receding before the advance of a higher and nobler form of that faith of which the Unitarian church had long been the pioneer. It was, in truth, impossible not to note the silent but irresistible headway which their principles were making in all directions; and when they heard such men as the Bishop of London and Dr. Pusey publicly declaring that the disestablishment of the Church of England would strengthen and popularise Unitarian principles, it could not be doubted that thousands of earnest and thoughtful minds, both in that and other religious communions, were gradually coming up to our own standard of freedom and catholicity. Mr. Pillars then briefly reviewed the progress of the Sydney church during his four years' ministerial connection, which he hoped might be the prophecy of much greater progress in years to come.

THORNE.—A tea meeting in connection with the Unitarian chapel was held January 27. Seventeen friends from Doncaster attended, amongst whom were Rev. W. S. Smith, Messrs. Mitchell, Edgar, Key, and Kaye, who made speeches, and some of them sang and recited. The Rev. G. Woolley, the minister of Thorne, occupied the chair, and the chapel choir sang appropriate pieces. Some plain and striking remarks were made in the speeches on liberty, rational enjoyment, and the points of difference betwixt Unitarians and other denominations.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

T. B.—Received.
G. F.—Arrived too late. Next week.
A. P.—Next week.

AN EXPLANATION.

To the Editors.—I was grieved to learn from the report you gave of the missionary conference, recently held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, that a paper written by me on "Lay Preaching," and to be read at the conference, had failed to reach its destination. In justice to your readers, as well as to myself, I deem it right to explain that the manuscript was posted in ample time to be at the hall when required, and that nothing has since been heard of its whereabouts.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN WHITWORTH.

Sunderland, Feb. 3, 1869.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

According to the last accounts from Utah, it appears that, owing to domestic losses, Brigham Young has at present only 23 actual wives 'and 51 "spiritual" ones.

In an address at Stoke last Saturday, Bishop Selwyn spoke hopefully of the condition of the church in New Zealand, notwithstanding recent troubles. His Lordship also encouraged Churchmen at home not to despond because compulsory church rates have been abolished.

It is the custom for all the Madrid papers to publish a list of religious services for the day, under the head of "Cultos." In this list the people are told the particular saint to whom the day is consecrated, and the various churches in which attendance is rewarded by the "forty hours' indulgence." This list is as regularly studied as the "births, deaths, and marriages" in England. In some of the papers—the Correspondencia for instance—the advertisement announcing the Spanish Protestant services has appeared as part of the "Cultos" list, to the great horror of others. The Estandarte remarks:—"With real indignation we notice the Correspondencia publishes the following advertisement amongst the section of 'Cultos Religiosos,' and then, quite forgetful that it is giving the matter the benefit of a gratuitous advertisement, it copies the Protestant notice.—A plot of land has been bought from the municipality of Madrid, in one of the promenades, for the erection of a Protestant church, the building of which is to be commenced forthwith.

With reference to the suppression of porpoises and bottle-nose whales, the Naples correspondent of the Times writes:

"The plan adopted on the Mediterranean, where porpoises, or Feroni, as the natives call them, abound, is simple and inexpensive enough. Engage a priest, row him out to sea, and there let him curse the fish. I have known it done often and seen it done several times, but I cannot certainly guarantee the results. Whether Mr. Bright or his correspondent will be disposed to try the experiment is perhaps more than doubtful; at all events, it would require no parliamentary grant."

A writer in Macmillan estimates the value of the Irish Church property, if capitalised, as follows:

Yearly revenue, £632,000, at 22½ years' purchase	£14,220,000
Fines that would be paid for conversion of leases of church lands into perpetuities	300,000
Value of churches, glebe-houses, school-houses, &c.	2,500,000
	£17,020,000

And this is his estimate of what it is proposed to give to the Church:

The value of life interests at 4 per cent.	£6,700,000
If advowsons are to be paid for and curates compensated, that will be another	1,000,000
The life interests in the Regium Donum and Maynooth will make a further charge upon Church property of.....	1,000,000
And if Mr. Bright's proposal to give the churches and glebe-houses is also carried out, that will be a further deduction of.....	2,500,000
Leaving only a surplus available for national purposes of	5,820,000
	£17,020,000

This looks very unlike "total disendowment," and how far such a settlement will satisfy the four millions of Irish Catholics seems very doubtful.

The Rev. D. Vaughan, vicar of St. Martin's, Leicester, a clergyman rather more closely associated with the Liberal party in the Church than his brother the Vicar of Doncaster, has announced in a letter to his parishioners that, with the concurrence of his churchwardens, he proposes to make considerable changes in deference to the recent decision in the Mackonochie case. They are not influenced by any sentimental considerations; they only wish to obey the law. With this view pew-terms will be abolished, and a weekly offertory substituted, but the seats, though free, will not be unappropriated. The Geneva gown will be discarded, and the surplice worn in the pulpit as well as in the desk and at the communion table. As to the position (not the posture, which, it has been decided, must be standing) of the officiating minister at the communion table during the Consecration Prayer, Mr. Vaughan and his churchwardens think that neither that nor the vestments has been settled by the judgment. "They are quite sure that, if they were settled in a sense favourable to Ritualism, legislation must inevitably and immediately follow (a result to be exceedingly deprecated at present), in order to bring the practice of the Church into conformity with the feelings and convictions of the immense majority of Church-people of the country." They believe that the surplice (with hood, and perhaps stole also) is the only legal vestment for the officiating minister in the English Church; and it will be adopted accordingly in St. Martin's Church.

Mr. Wilson, a member of the Liverpool Revival Band, has been holding a series of meetings at Haydon Bridge for the purpose of religious excitement, and has drawn large audiences by the strange subjects announced for his discourses. Among them have been "Two moons, or a beautiful comparison," "The longest ladder in the world," "Fair play for the devil," "Haydon Bridge loves a Lord," "Much ado about nothing," "Bastard children," "Not for Joseph," "What a blind man saw," "There's one down, who makes two?" "Mind your P's and Q's," "Why is a pawnbroker like the devil?" "Paddle your own canoe," and "Haunted houses." It is said that Mr. Wilson has not only had crowds to hear him, but has done much good. We can only hope that this is so.

A committee, of which the Principal of Brighton College is the chairman, has been formed for the purpose of placing a memorial window in Trinity Chapel, Brighton, to the Rev. F. W. Robertson. It is proposed that the window, representing in medallions Scripture incidents referred to in Mr. Robertson's discourses, shall be placed over the communion table, with a brass at the foot bearing this inscription: "To the glory of God and in memory of Frederick W. Robertson, who preached in this chapel from 1847 to 1853."

Father Ignatius has settled matters amicably with Miss Robinson, the "Baptist Shepherdess," who had got possession, he said illegally, of his Norwich Monastery, and whom he went down to that city to expel. Instead of this, however, they seem to have kissed each other, metaphorically of course. One evening the Father had a service after his own fashion, with young ladies, choristers, acolytes, &c.; and the next evening Miss Robinson had her turn, the Father being present, shaking hands with the lady on the platform, and afterwards giving her his blessing, declaring that nothing but the love of Jesus could have made her behave so honourably. He added:

"I feel what has occurred in the last two days will work more for the glory of our precious Jesus than anything that has been done for many a long day. The devils had been astonished thereby, while the angels have rejoiced, and the fact of Miss Robinson, the lady preacher, and Father Ignatius, the despised monk, standing side by side as Christian children—brother and sister in Jesus—will go out to the world. The Pope of Rome will hear of it; the Patriarch at Constantinople will hear of it; and every crowned head in Europe will hear of it. A stand-up fight here was predicted by every one, but Jesus has conquered, and He is the Prince of Peace, and blessed be His holy name—glory be to Jesus."

From the "Handbook" of the Baptists, we learn that they have, in the United Kingdom, 2,447 churches, with a membership numbering 231,506, and 267,396 Sunday scholars. During the last ten years, the increase in churches has been 398, about 20 per cent. They have 10 colleges, with 246 students, and an income of between £14,000 and £15,000. Last year, 39 new chapels, capable of accommodating 14,940 worshippers, were erected, at a cost of £53,976, while 29 chapels were either enlarged or improved—some of them by the addition of schoolrooms—at a cost of £15,521. The Baptist building fund has an income of £4,081. 2s. 8d. and the sister society in Wales reports receipts to the amount of £665. 17s. 9d. It is stated that the sums contributed to building funds, local and denominational, probably about equal the new liabilities incurred, viz., £69,497.

The Pall Mall gives the following account of the regius professorship of divinity at Cambridge, and its fortunate holder:—

"Originally founded by Henry VIII. and endowed with £40 a year and rooms and commons in Trinity College, it was augmented by James I., who attached to it the rectory of Somersham, in Huntingdonshire. We learn from the report of the Cambridge University Commission that the gross annual income of this living is £2,121, which is reduced by the salaries of three curates and other charges to which a living is liable to about £1,300 a year.

The rector is non-resident. The present holder of this desirable piece of university preferment is the Rev. Dr. Jeremie, who in 1864 was appointed Dean of Lincoln. It was then expected that the professorship would have been vacated, for as the dean is not allowed to hold a living in connection with his deanery, it was supposed a fortiori that the duties of a professorial chair would be inconsistent with those of the cathedral. How fallacious were both the supposition and the inference the present dean has shown by continuing to fill the two positions. With his £2,000 a year from the deanery and his £1,300 from the professorship, he must frequently have been visited by the comfortable reflection that his lines have indeed fallen in pleasant places. But how fares the university by this comfortable arrangement? As dean he must reside two-thirds of the year at Lincoln. So that Cambridge can by no possibility enjoy his presence for more than four months. And even of this brief period she has but a shorn allowance. The present term is of necessity short in consequence of the early occurrence of Easter. It practically began with the beginning of last week, and terminates with the 19th March. But the Regius Professor of Divinity announces that his lectures will not commence till February 13, so that at most, by lecturing three times a week as he proposes, instead of twice as he did last year, he will deliver fifteen lectures. While for these and the incidental duties of the professorship he receives yearly £1,300, and at the same time holds another office still less onerous and still more lucrative, it cannot be said that theology goes unrewarded."

A correspondent of the Times furnishes a curious record, which bears on the question of the vestments allowed in the second year of Edward VI., which the rubric makes the authority on the point. It is an extract from the churchwarden's books of the parish of St. Lawrence, Reading, from which it appears that in 1549 (the second year of Edward), and in 1550 and 1551, various church ornaments were sold and the money accounted for, amongst them "St. John's alter and the copechest." But in 1554, as soon as Mary was in power, the entry is, "This year the crosses, canopies, censers, albes, and other ornaments of the church were restored." "A grete masse book" is also charged for.

The South London Journal gives an account of the following curious ceremony. In 1794, on August 3rd, Mary Wragg, relict of a city merchant resident in Beckenham, departed this life, leaving a bequest to the poor of the parish, who were annually to receive bread, flour, and coals on the 28th of January, on which day also a dinner was to be provided for the vicar, wardens, and tradesmen, out of money devised for that purpose. These benefits, however, were dependent on her coffin, which is deposited in a vault under the church, being yearly dusted on the day mentioned. Should this interesting operation be omitted on any occasion the bequest passes to the adjoining parish of Bromley. On Thursday, the 28th ult., the sexton, in the presence of the vicar, the wardens, and a large number of spectators, descended into the vault and dusted the coffin, which is of peculiar construction, the lid not being flat, but ridged like a church roof. It is made of cedar wood, strongly bolted together. The gifts were then distributed to the poor, and in the evening the vicar, wardens, and tradesmen dined at the George Hotel.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Pall Mall considers that the recent festivities in Egypt have a very significant aspect for all who are acquainted with the traditions and feelings of Orientals. It says:—

"There is very little doubt that Egypt is becoming Christianised, and it is more than probable that Turkey will ultimately follow her lead. The inhabitants of the fertile and wealthy lands on the banks of the Nile have always been in the advance of Eastern civilisation, and they still maintain their ancient supremacy. To those who candidly consider the Eastern question in all its bearings, it does not appear imminent that Turkey and her Mahomedan offshoots and dependencies will be conquered by arms. Nevertheless a great change is assuredly coming over them. There are powerful and warlike tribes of Mussulmans who are likely to hold the faith of their forefathers for some generations still to come; but they are diminishing daily, and they will be gradually swept away by the advancing and irresistible tide of new things and events. All progress reaches the East through Christian races; and in the present state of rapid communication between nations a Mussulman community can no longer keep up the proud isolation necessary to the preservation of those forms and ceremonies which are the essence of its religion. Railways, telegraphs, new invention, new ideas, are all the growth of Christian lands. The Sultan has horrified and alienated every fanatic in his dominions by his visit to the Western Franks; and it is believed that the Shah of Persia will be soon a guest of European monarchs, eating, drinking, living with them upon equal terms, and renouncing his immemorial pretension to be king of kings."

After referring to the serene complacency with which the Archbishop of Canterbury seems to view the "vain disputations" which are agitating the Church, and the indifference which he displays to the questions that made one Reformation necessary in the fifteenth century, and are making another necessary to-day in the Church over which he presides, the English Independent says:—

"But zealous Protestantism is fast dying out of the Church. Dr. Miller and Dr. McNeile, the two watch-towers of Evangelicalism, both counsel compromise and implicit submission to the bishops, let them order what they will, though the bishops under whom they both labour are known favourers of the Ritualists. To the scandal and dismay of their followers, they would meet the Ritualists half way, and make things pleasant. The Rev. Edward Garbett, another great authority among Low Churchmen, elaborately reviews the situation, and thus describes 'the true Evangelical policy': 'Do nothing, and wait till the events of the immediate future are further developed.' The Church nurses are all of one tune, 'Hush-a-by, baby, on the tree top,' but 'if the tree falls' what will happen?"

The following is a specimen of the kind of Christian courtesy with which the Church Times is in the habit of treating such ministers as cannot boast of "apostolical succession," though they can scarcely show less of apostolic spirit:

"On the other hand that small Brummagem metal, transpontine Popeling, Mr. Spurgeon, would appear from various indications to possess a clerical mind of the most portentous dimensions; though it must be confessed that amongst his less lucky brethren the phenomenon does not flourish. It certainly would be a strange mind, indeed, in which the discipline of 'Lord Deacons' left many traces of clericalism."

The English Independent says:

"It is an unfortunate result of the Dean of Westminster's dignified position and genial style that he recalls the acute observation of Becky Sharpe that nothing is so easy or so delightful as to be a Lady Bountiful if only you have five thousand a year. Dr. Stanley is indeed a thoroughly good man, whose benevolence and large-heartedness would have shone conspicuous in the lowliest spheres. But then the Deanery of Westminster is so comfortable, so enviable, so lofty and happy a post, that it is impossible to help attributing some of that rosy colour, which the Dean throws over all the institutions by which he is surrounded, to their own soothing and grateful influence on himself. In the conclusion of his late lecture at Sion College, for instance, he speaks of what he calls the 'magnanimous, imperial spirit of what had been for 700 years the United Church of England and Ireland.' Now, it is very natural in a Dean of Westminster to feel magnanimous; but do those who are not of his faith quite accept his testimony as to the magnanimity, during 700 years, of his Church? Does that institution, which, though clothed in purple in England, is so vividly orange in Ireland, and is still remembered as 'black prelate,' among the descendants of those whom Laud persecuted to the death in Scotland, seem quite such an image of 'magnanimous imperialism' to the whole inhabitants of these islands, as it does to the head of the Chapter of Westminster? We do not exclude or disclaim the judgment of those within the church. If one should rise up again within it who, like his Master, knew not where to lay his head; who, like the first Apostles, from whom he claims spiritual descent in unbroken line, 'left all to follow Him;' or who, like the greatest among them, laboured with his own hands, 'being a tent-maker,' rather than bring doubt on his motives or a burden on his disciples,—then we should accept with more than respect his witness that the church for which he laboured was noble and Divine. But it is a misfortune of Dean Stanley's position that he is so surrounded with this world's goods that he cannot escape the suspicion, not indeed of insincerity, but of natural and human bias, when he tells us that an establishment is necessary for Christianity, and that it is the chief safeguard of religious liberty in England."

Referring to the use made by the Bishop of Down and Connor of Mr. Gladstone's office, and of his sincere attachment to the doctrines of the Church of England, the Daily News considers that he is not in a position to negotiate. The present House of Commons is not bound by the resolutions of its predecessor, nor by the Suspensory Bill. But the Government is bound by them, and if in a matter which is one of perfect obligation there can be degrees, Mr. Gladstone is bound by them more rigidly than any of his colleagues. If any doubt could exist as to what is implied in disestablishment, the fourth resolution, to which Mr. Gladstone was an assenting party, though he was not its author, would remove all ambiguity on this head.

It declared that when the Irish Church shall be disestablished, the grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum shall cease. If disestablishment, as proposed by Mr. Gladstone, does not carry disendowment with it, where is the equity of this provision? A vague hope seems to be entertained that Mr. Gladstone's feelings as a Churchman may, if judiciously worked upon, prove stronger than his consistency, firmness, and honour as a statesman. Mr. Gladstone cannot feel flattered by the supposition that he is made of such soft and ductile stuff as to admit of his being beaten into this shape, or into that, as political exigency or ecclesiastical sentiment is brought to bear upon him.

The Irish bishops must be very simple if they expected anything but a polite refusal from the Government to their memorial, asking to be allowed to hold a Convocation to deliberate on measures affecting their Church, "in a crisis full of difficulty and danger"—that is, to concert opposition to the plans of the Government. The Times remarks that they show, by their own language, that they don't even know how to style the Establishment any change in which they hold to be sacrilegious. In the memorial of December they call it the "Irish Branch of the United Church of England and Ireland"—a newly-coined phrase, meaning either nothing or several absurdities. A few weeks afterwards they seem to have thought better of it, and adopted a new style—"the Irish provinces of the United Church of England and Ireland." In Ireland itself they are well aware it is called neither Irish branch nor Irish provinces, nor Irish anything whatever, but simply the English Church, which is the only name that even approximately describes its true character. But now these gentlemen, who are thus reduced to aliases which they cannot force upon their own friends at home, let alone their foes, desire that her Majesty's ministers shall give them for the present occasion, and in order that they may fight their bad fight rather better, a new, regular, and constitutional position, a totality they have hitherto little affected, and powers of deliberation they have neither possessed nor, indeed, yet asked for. The merest kindness, or rather instinctive compassion, would suggest the necessity of not complying with the request.

The Saturday Review points out that to summon an Irish Convocation would be to create a new clerical body, called together for the express purpose of resisting a bill founded on resolutions passed by the House of Commons. If, indeed, Convocation could have been used for the purposes of disestablishment, if it could have been made to furnish the Government with a body competent to organise the Irish Church as a voluntary community, it would perhaps have been wise to overlook the anomaly and absurdity involved in calling it together at the present moment. But it is evident that it could do nothing of the sort. No English statesman would think for a moment of leaving the constitution of a church to a purely clerical body. Besides, it would be wholly premature at present for the Government to take any steps towards the creation of a body charged with the organisation of the Irish Church as a voluntary association. The priests are certain not to be content, whatever is done, for it is their business not to be content. But although the Irish Church will be disestablished and disendowed, not to stop the agitation of the priests, but from a simple desire to do justice, yet the temper in which the Church is dealt with may in some measure depend on the course taken by the friends and enemies of the Establishment. And the bishops should bear this in mind.

In a sermon at Vere-street, on Sunday, Dr. Stanley, taking for his text, "I am the light of the world," said that during the past week they had observed the feast of "Purification," commonly called "Candlemas," in connection with which it had been in former times, as it was now in some places, the custom to give adoration to candles, as a part of Christian worship. That custom had its origin in two circumstances,—first, the offering of human remains, for which candles came afterwards to be substituted, as sacrifices; and second, in the search of the goddess Ceres for her daughter Proserpine. Out of these circumstances candles came to be lighted at the Holy Communion, which was at that time celebrated in the evening, and for the convenience of those who celebrated their ecclesiastical rites in the darkness of the catacombs of Rome, and were meant for the signification that Christ was the light of the world. The candles which used to express that doctrine had long been extinguished, and had passed away from the performance of divine worship; but not so the doctrine they signified, for Christ was still the light of the world. What was the meaning of that doctrine? It was simply that light, and not darkness, was the atmosphere in which the church ought to live. There were now, and had always been, characters to whom secrecy, mystery, and concealment seemed to be the breath of life—disciples, apparently, of that crafty French politician who said that language was given to man to conceal his thoughts. Against such a state of things he protested, contending that light should be the atmosphere in which all our practice and doctrine should be exhibited, for they might depend upon it, that in the Church of God the Spirit of God would brighten more and more unto the perfect day which was coming.

In his Lenten pastoral, Cardinal Cullen exhorts that prayers be offered for the Pontiff, in view of the General Council ("a spectacle worthy of Almighty God"), that those "may be brought back to the true fold who are straying in the path of error." Archbishop M'Hale, likewise, looks to the Council as a means of restoring the "happy age" of "one sheepfold by one pastor." He goes in strongly, however, against "a mixed education," the "seed of which being sown whilst the husbandmen were asleep, grew and fructified into the godless Queen's colleges by their congenial model schools," and has yielded a "motley harvest."

There was a great gathering of bishops and "ministers of other denominations" at Fishmonger's Hall on Tuesday night, on which the Pall Mall remarks:—

"Whatever may have been the secret motive of the Prime Warden of the Fishmongers in gathering together at his hospitable board bishops and Dissenting clergymen, and inciting them to after-dinner oratory, the result was certainly a happy one. The ecclesiastical guests seem to have kept the table in a roar. The Archbishop of York made a good joke about the bishops being the only 'truly liberal' element in the House of Lords. The Bishop of Oxford tickled the company by his professions of regret for ritualist practices, and the Rev. Dr. Binney, the well-known author of 'How to make the most of both Worlds,' was equally funny, chaffing the bishops with delicate humour on the divisions in their Church. Nor did the Bishop of Peterborough, though he rose when the guests must have been sore with laughing, fail in merriment. Now that Dr. Magee has got out of the Irish galley into a safer boat he can apparently regard the dangerous position of the crew of which he was lately a member with considerable equanimity. He likened Ireland to an old woman in the Dublin hospital. She was 'bad in her inside,' as Ireland was said to be now, and saw with dismay all the students, notebook in hand, round her bed. Turning to the head physician, she said, 'Och, yer honour, shure all thim boys are not going to doctor me all at once.' His idea of legislation for Ireland was summed up in the words of the man who went about the country with a happy family of birds and beasts. 'What,' said a gentleman, 'are the rules upon which you govern them?' The man answered, 'Well, sir, you see what I does is this: fust of all I treats 'em well; then I feeds 'em well; then, sir, if they fights, I wallops 'em well.' Most people will agree with the Bishop that these three operations have hitherto been very uncertainly administered."

THE CELESTIALS.

At the annual missionary meeting of the students of New College, the Rev. W. Muirhead, of China, gave an interesting address, from which we take and throw together the following particulars. The crowded population of the towns and cities is perfectly oppressive to the mind of one who has to labour among them. Towns equal to Liverpool and Manchester are very common, and many cities may be found containing not less than a million of inhabitants. The idea that the Chinese are a very dis-united people is far from correct. On the contrary their unity and similarity to one another are surprising. One hundred names are supposed to represent the nomenclature of the entire country. Their unity of sentiment is as remarkable. They are, so to speak, drilled in the same groove. In all parts of the country the same line of argument is to be used, the same objections have to be met, the same class of minds to be dealt with. As to the language and literature of the Chinese, they appear at first sight truly appalling. We possess 26 letters in all, and have only to combine them to form words, phrases, and sentences; but the number of the Chinese characters is 40,000, and all the learner can do is to con them day after day, week after week, month after month. A scholar is supposed to learn at least 5,000 of these. A literature has been formed which is perfectly amazing. The Chinese boast of it as being superior to that of any other nation in the world. The literature of highest value is their Classics. These are books of great antiquity, which inculcate the purest morality, and treat also on history, poetry, and politics. A certain knowledge of these books is essential as a passport to any office of respectability. In their universities titles are to be gained corresponding to English degrees. So rigid is their standard, that at one public examination the number of candidates was 10,000, and out of this number only 114 were allowed to pass. And in such esteem are graduates held, that to them is always extended the privilege of Habreas Corpus. Were a magistrate summarily to punish any one of them, the whole town would rise up in a body and indignantly turn him out of office. One very favourable feature in the Chinese, and one especially helpful to the teacher of religion is—that appeal can always be made to conscience. Whether high or low, all admit the existence and supremacy of conscience, or a “good heart,” as they call it. If the miraculous history of the Bible be presented it meets with no appreciation, but doctrine is always attentively listened to. As regards the religion of the Chinese, monotheism is distinctly taught in their Classics. The objection is never raised to the doctrines of natural theology. Belief in the existence of a Supreme Being is possessed by all; though the Supreme, however, is worshipped only by the Emperor himself, as the representative and high-priest of the nation. The question occurs, “Whom, then, do the common people worship?” In the first place, they worship Heaven and Earth; though, if asked for any information respecting these Deities, they say that that is a matter beyond their comprehension. Then, too, they worship the name of Confucius, which they inscribe in various parts of their houses, calling him the “Compeer of Heaven and Earth.” Every family likewise observes with religious care the worship of ancestors, the special reason of which is this:—All believe that man is possessed of three souls. The first goes with the body to the grave, the second goes to the ancestral hall, the third goes to some aerial world they know not where. Now, the departed spirit depends not merely for its comfort, but for its very existence, on the worship of its posterity. Then, again, the people pay adoration to idols. £80,000,000 sterling are computed to be spent every year on these. Though the Christian missionary sometimes meets with strong opposition, Mr. Muirhead having been more than once within an inch of his life, when followed by a yelling mob stirred up by the exasperated literati, there is much to encourage hope. When Mr. Muirhead first arrived at Shanghai there were only five converts there, while the last report of the London Missionary Society gives the number at 900, some of whom are men that had graduated and risen high to positions of respect.

A DISSENTER AGAINST HIS WILL.

UNDER this heading the Pall Mall notices a pamphlet by the Rev. Joseph Crompton, at one time minister of the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, and whom our contemporary represents as being “known as the antagonist of Archbishop Magee.” This certainly is news to us, and must, we presume, be a printer’s blunder, by which a distinction belonging to Dr. Carpenter is conferred on Mr. Crompton. It appears that, chiefly under Maurician influences, his sympathy with the Church of England has for some years been increasing, and his sympathy with Dissent diminishing; but there is one little obstacle which prevents his joining the former. Unlike his theological guide, he cannot discover the spirit of Christian charity in the Athanasian Creed, by which, as he says, he is “required thirteen times a year to damn the whole of the Greek Church, nearly all Independent ministers and congregations, a very large proportion of the Methodist body, all such men as Dr. Channing, Dr. Carpenter, and many members of the Royal family of past and even present generations, who have been known habitually to close their books at that part of the service.” On which our contemporary comments as follows:—

“Mr. Crompton is not exactly singular in his difficulty. School children generally repeat the damnable clauses with amazing unction, but the rest of the congregation, whether from regard to the Greek Church or to some members of the Royal family, is apt to shrink a little from the ‘without doubt he shall perish everlastingly.’ Of course numerous palliatives have been provided for tender consciences. Mr. Blunt says that only those who have learnt and know the doctrine of the Trinity, as here expounded, are damned by the creed. Wheatley says that all beyond the third and fourth verses is mere illustration, and ‘no more requires our assent than a sermon.’ Dr. Arnold divided the creed into a doctrinal and a moral part; and rejected the doctrinal whilst accepting the moral. Another author has discovered that the creed only referred to purgatory, as a place where full instruction will be given in spiritual truth. Dr. Vaughan considers that the clause is ‘tacitly repealed.’ Dean Goulburn thinks that the words are a mere quotation—not a sentence upon any individual. Mr. Llewellyn Davies says that ‘everlasting’ has nothing to do with duration; and some one else that damnation means only ‘ecclesiastical damnation.’ Meanwhile, another excellent divine asserts roundly that the creed is ‘the mildest breathed warning of a mother’s breast.’ If so, it must be confessed that she has had some very unreasonable children.

Mr. Crompton is so ungrateful as to refuse all these kind offers to help him out of his difficulty; and insists upon it that the creed should be taken out of the Prayer Book. The American Church has done so already, in a spirit, we presume, of Republican independence, and our bishops are only too glad to hold communion with its clergy. Why, he asks, cannot they do as much for their dissenting brethren? Why, instead of coquetting with the Greek Church and the Church of Rome, can’t they invite Independents and Wesleyans to union, by removing the one serious stumbling-block in their path? Why should not dissenting chapels become chapels of ease to the churches of the Establishment, and their organisation supply a corps of spiritual volunteers to co-operate with the State regulars? Overboard, he would say, with the Athanasian creed, which everybody dislikes and few can stomach at all, and you will find that you have rid yourself of an annoyance, and at the same time induced many Dissenters to return gradually to the bosom of the Church. Many people would be sincerely pleased at both results; but Mr. Crompton shows an almost touching simplicity in his estimate of the difficulty. Trifling as the concession looks from one point of view, it would involve the decision of fundamental questions. The average clergyman hates the Dissenters as the squire hates a poacher, or a regular doctor a quack practitioner. He would be glad enough of union, if the terms of union were that the Dissenter accepted everything and the Churchman abandoned nothing; and he rather likes the Athanasian creed, for the very reason that it supplies a good stringent unpalatable test. But even the most reasonable of the High Church clergy could not abandon the creed without abandoning their sacerdotal pretensions. How is the creed to be abolished? If Parliament does it, we have another sacrilegious assault upon the Church by the State, and what would become of Catholic tradition? In short, it is obvious that this is merely another side of the dilemma which the struggles of Church parties are forcing upon us. A State Church based on principles of the widest possible comprehension is incompatible with the claims of a Ritualist priesthood; admitting one party is, or soon will be, equivalent to expelling the other. If we are ever driven to choose between the two, we should hope that the spirit shown in Mr. Crompton’s pamphlet—which amounts to a dislike of damning anybody—may have a chance of manifesting itself more widely.”

OPEN CHURCH PAPERS.

VI. THE PRINCIPLE OF THE OFFERTORY.

BY BROOKE HERFORD.

I SHOWED in the last paper the unsatisfactory way in which the usual system of church finance based upon pew-rents ordinarily works, having a tendency to lead people to feel that all they are called upon to do in the way of pecuniary contribution to their church is to support what arrangements are necessary for their own worship. I am well aware that there are here and there exceptional instances, like that adduced by a correspondent, of congregations, while still holding to the system of pews and pew-rents, doing their work as churches of Christ in a thoroughly noble manner. Yet even this instance but strengthens the evidence that it is only when men rise to the idea of voluntary offering of their substance for God’s work, that they give at all as they ought to do, and the question still remains whether the Offertory is not the best means of fostering this thought, and of providing expression for it where it exists.

Now, if it were not possible to put the support of our churches upon any better footing than that of a business payment for keeping up a certain institution, there would still be no way in which people would be able to make that business payment so easily, as by giving it in small weekly portions. Put all sentiment out of the question for a moment; suppose no principle to be involved either way: suppose that the only question were—there being a certain place of worship and certain connected institutions to be supported by a given number of people, how shall the method of payment be so arranged as that all, even to the poorest, may do their part with the least difficulty or pressure—surely there could be no way found so simple, so easy, and so certain as the Offertory. This may be the poorest element in the consideration of the matter; still it is an element, and a high principle is none the worse because that which it enjoins also meets the requirements of ordinary business convenience. At the same time, it is the principle of the Offertory which has always seemed to me infinitely its noblest recommendation, and it is the principle of it which I am anxious to have considered. That principle is, the principle of associating sacrifice with worship.

It is the old thought of the human heart, it seems in one form or other to have arisen instinctively in every people, that it is a right and good thing to consecrate some portion of our substance to the direct service of God. Men have not regarded this as a drawback or a fine upon their prosperity, but as a privilege of it; and truly it does seem a privilege to be permitted to have part, as it were, in God’s work in the world—not merely to use all our possessions righteously and innocently—but to consecrate a part of them to those direct religious uses both of ourselves and our fellow-men, in which God permits us to feel vividly that we are serving Him and forwarding His work. Judaism carried out this idea of sacrifice very fully and formally: it set before every man the duty of giving a tenth of all he had for God’s service—besides occasional offerings as signs of thanksgiving or repentance. This was not, let it be remembered, a law of coercion, only a fixing for men what they ought to offer. It specified a tenth as a man’s duty, but it did not put it upon the footing of a tax; it asked him to offer it freely to God, bade him bring it with a “willing heart,” used no compulsion if he held it back. Now, some people fancy that Christianity has done away with everything of this kind. Not at all. What Christianity has done is this: it has taught man a higher thought about sacrifice, a better direction for it; and, has left the amount and method of it to every man’s own heart and conscience. In some directions, even the method must always be pretty much the same. With regard, for instance, to the support of the worship of God, it is just as much a true offering of our substance to God to help to make our churches beautiful, restful, happy places, associated with all that can cheer and strengthen man’s highest life—just as much a true offering, and just as much a needful offering, as when David set before the people what was in his heart about the temple, and asked them all to “offer willingly” the very best they had. With regard to other kinds of sacrifice there is more change. Instead of asking us to sacrifice of our substance that it may be consumed in burnt offerings upon the altar, Christianity asks us to sacrifice of our substance that it may be spent in Christ-like works. Where Judaism enriched its worship by a costlier adornment, Christianity enriches its church life, by a new school, or some other fresh agency for carrying on Christ’s work more fully in the world. But all this change does not in the least degree take away the beauty and appropriateness of the old idea of doing what is still needed, as a sacrifice and offering—is rather in the direction of making it still more appropriate, and still more beautiful to do it so! The maintenance of the old temple involved not only personal presence and worship, but money and means; and the old religion said to men, give of both in the same thought and spirit, let your hearts and your substance be both offered as one mingled sacrifice. Well, the maintenance of a Christian church involves exactly the same component elements—needs the worshipper’s heart, presence, voice, and also something of his means. Why not, then, still keep up the old idea and invite men to accompany the offering of their hearts with offering of their means? Why not still have the latter associated with the worship? In early times Christianity did this. It was the universal plan in the old days for every worshipper to bring some offering, however humble, when the Christians met for their despised worship. As the gospel spread, this idea of offerings to God took many forms, and how strongly it aroused the generous and loyal feelings of the heart is proved by the numberless and munificent foundations of those days, abbeys, colleges, cathedrals, and hospitals. It is sometimes said that the activity of our church life in these days takes more sensible and practical directions: so be it: but why, then, is it that those more sensible and useful objects are not supported at least as well? Why is it that instead of being well supported, they have most of them to struggle for their bare existence? For this reason: because the churches have let go that old idea of sacrifice being a fit and natural accompaniment of adoration, and have substituted business payments: because the support of the church and all its beautiful and varied life has been dissevered from its old place among the acts of weekly worship, and left to find what place it can among the quarter's bills.

Now, it is that older, nobler thought and way to which in the Offertory we go back. We restore to worship its ancient, universal, natural accompaniment of sacrifice. We take the support of God's worship and Christ's works out from its modern place among rents and taxes, and put it once more in its true and fitting place as one of the services of happy Sabbath worship.

ROMANISM MADE REPULSIVE.

It is well for Catholicism that the Ecumenical is not far off, which cardinals and bishops tell us is to cure all the ailments of their Church, for within the last few weeks it has received some ugly blows at the hands of its children.

First we had Mr. FOULKES'S damaging pamphlet, in which, besides denying the claim of his Church to be called Catholic, and showing that, in spite of its vaunted infallibility, it was unsound in doctrine and based on forgery and fraud; he also asserted that it was not particularly favourable to morality or religion, inasmuch as round Seville he found the priests openly keeping mistresses, and yet enjoying the respect of their degraded, ignorant flocks, and in France the Sundays given to shooting and hunting parties, and various unbecoming sports.

Then, as if priests, like STUARTS and BOURBOIS, were too blind to see or too dull to learn, the Archbishop of MALINES must needs improve the occasion of the death of the Prince Royal of Belgium, and at once wound the hearts of the sorrowing parents and shock the feelings of every truly devout and thoughtful mind, by presumptuously taking upon himself to declare, in a pastoral letter, that it was a sign of Divine anger against the liberal tendencies of the government and the country.

Next the Archbishop of Freyburg vented his spiritual wrath against the Burgomaster of Constance by pronouncing upon him the sentence of excommunication, apparently for some offence against the faith. It seems he is a man who is universally esteemed for his public and private character, and his fellow-citizens were not disposed to accept the archbishop's judgment upon him, or to think the worse of him because he had been debarred the rites of the Church, and solemnly proscribed by bell, book, and candle. They accordingly called a meeting in the theatre, which was thronged from roof to floor, and placed a common councillor in the chair. He opened the proceedings by reading out the archiepiscopal sentence of excommunication, and was frequently interrupted by laughter. Thereupon he read a public protest against the sentence, which was carried unanimously, and communicated at once to the burgomaster by the whole body of people present at the meeting. The burgomaster thanked the people from his balcony, and was loudly cheered; and then the multitude which had gathered to do him honour dispersed in perfect order, whether more or less disposed to honour the Church than before, every one may be left to judge.

Then on the heels of this comes the assassination of the Governor of Burgos, in the presence, and there can be no doubt at the instigation, of the priests; and while most men are shocked by the bloody deed, we have the Pope, in demented haste, sending his blessing to the Jesuit writers in the Monde and other ultramontane journals, that have had the audacity to defend it, and thus leading many to think what Romanism has been in the past, and to ask whether it might not be the same again, if it could only obtain the power.

As our readers are aware, the court of Queen's Bench has been occupied for upwards of a week with a case arising out of convent discipline, which, as the uncle of the plaintiff, himself a priest, justly said, is fitted "to bring discredit on every convent in the three kingdoms." As the Times observes,

"It appears to be almost the essence of the conventional system, as here revealed to eyes profane, that life should be deprived of all strength and substance by being broken into the smallest fragments, and time itself destroyed in a succession of trifles. Sister M. Scholastica had to be up at three in the morning, and immediately adjust her movements by a minute 'distribution,' which, besides the usual services, meditations, teachings, and so forth, included sweeping the schools and passages on her knees with a hand brush. The violations of discipline incident to such a course appear to have been innumerable. If the poor lady complained that the broom was worn out or filthy with scullery use, that was a sin to be confessed and atoned for. So, also, if she sat down, or rested her knees on a bench during a long, weary schooling; if she could not eat mutton, especially when fat or lukewarm; if she did not relish the broth or swallow the mouldy bread; if a biscuit was found in her drawer; if she cut up one 'tunic' to mend the rest of the half-dozen; if she used a pennyworth of calico lying about and, for the occasion, a pair of scissors within reach; if she exchanged a single word with a passing sister during the hours of silence; if she read something too fast, or rang a bell three minutes too late; if she wrote to her brother, mother, father, or uncle, or only wanted to do so; if she wished to hear from them, or to open their letters when they came—if she wished, in a word, to have a thought of her own, a friend, or a moment's liberty of action, it was sin—sin pardonable if public amends were made, with suitable acts of contrition, such as licking the floor,—sin unpardonable if not covered by these penances."

The system of petty persecution to which Miss SAURIN, "Sister Mary Scholastica," was subjected, apparently from a feeling of jealousy, by Mrs. STAR, the Superioress, who was a convert from Protestantism, was of a kind which may well cause us to wonder how any, by becoming what Rome calls "religious," can run the risk of having to endure the like; but when we are told that this poor Sister, then in a weak and suffering state, was not allowed to see her own mother, who had come all the way from Dublin to Hull expressly to visit her, or a brother that had not seen her for five years, we can only express our sense of the wickedness which there is in thus trying to abrogate the ties which God's own hand has formed.

And, to add no more, while this case is still going on here, there comes an account of one which is about to be brought before the law courts of Belgium. A nun, belonging to one of the best families in the neighbourhood of Louvain, had been confined in a damp, unhealthy underground cell, and kept there several days, when through the narrow opening by which her prison received a little light from the garden she succeeded in attracting the attention of a man working there, and who, at her entreaties, procured for her writing materials, and conveyed a letter to her brother-in-law. On receiving the communication, he proceeded to the convent, and asked to see his sister-in-law, but was told that she was in religious retirement and not visible. He returned three hours later, accompanied by a commissary of police, whom he left outside, and then repeated his demand. He received a similar reply, but he insisted, and the superior at length became evidently embarrassed. He then opened the door to the police officer, who compelled the directress to accompany them to the cellars underground, where they found not only the lady in question, but also five other nuns confined in the same manner, all of whom, on recovering their liberty, took advantage of the commissary's presence to quit the establishment and return to their friends.

Mr. Johnstone, the Orange member for Belfast, and his aide-de-camp Murphy, who are to have a great Protestant field-day in Manchester next Monday, will certainly be at no loss for materials wherewith to spice their speeches, and hold up Romanism to scorn and reprobation.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The First Universalist Church in Philadelphia has been renovated and re-dedicated. This society was organised in 1791; the present church was built in 1793, and Rev. E. Winchester, John Murray, and Dr. Priestley were among the first preachers in it. We presume it must have been in this place that, in 1796, the last-mentioned of these delivered his set of discourses on the Evidences of Revelation, which were listened to by crowded audiences, including most of the members of Congress, at that time assembled in Philadelphia, and of the executive officers of the Government, and which are said to have had a marked effect in counteracting the tendency at that time prevailing to unbelief.

The New York Citizen appears to have some original ideas about poets and poetry. Its critic has been reviewing Dr. Newman's recent volume, "The Dream of Gerontius," &c., on which he bestows "extraordinary praise." This it certainly is. The Citizen says of the poems:—"They unite the melodious versification of Sternhold and Hopkins with the delicate poetic beauty of Watts." And after quoting one of them as a specimen, winds up with this climax:—"Here we have an originality and strength of expression that really rival the beauties of Tupper!" "Melodious as Sternhold and Hopkins," and "original" and "strong" as Tupper! What more could possibly be said? Queer as it seems, the American Churchman assures us that the criticism is really penned in good faith and meant for serious commendation of Mr. Newman and his poetry, and adds, "how Mr. Newman likes it we haven't heard." It is not every day, he must feel, that he gets such praise.

As our readers have been apprised, Ritualism is causing trouble in the States as well as here. Bishop Eastburn, of Massachusetts, has issued a pastoral letter enjoining the clergy and congregations of his diocese to discard all innovations upon their "ancient and settled order of public worship." Our bishops, we suppose, dare not venture on so decided a step as this.

The following is given as a specimen of the kind of cartel which is sent by members of the Church militant in the present day:

"Office New Orleans Advocate, December 20th, 1868.—D. Bennett, Esq., editor Planters' Banner.—Sir—Perhaps you think a Northern Methodist cannot be goaded into a fight. I will stand the venom of your vile pen no longer. I will fight you. I will show you that religious and loyal editors are not cowards. The Lord of Hosts will stand by me. You must be humbled. The Lord will humble your rebel heart. David fought, and he was a man after God's own heart. Moses and Joshua fought. And none of them ever had to contend with such children of the devil as the rebels of this country are. You will receive a note from my friends arranging the details of our hostile meeting.—Respectfully, your obedient servant, D. D. NEWMAN, D.D."

The American Presbyterian gives an account of a revival movement in Galt, a town of Upper Canada, which seems more sensible than some on this side the water. The main feature of it is the meeting of large numbers of the people to read their Bibles, and converse with one another as to the meaning of the passages read. It commenced with street preaching by two laymen, recently arrived from Scotland. Soon the Methodist Church was thrown open, and then that of the Free Church, the largest in town. The latter even was too small to hold the crowd. The presence of two converted Jews, and their conversion as based exclusively upon the study of the Scriptures, are adding to the interest.

The Bible, complete, has now been printed in the Tahitian, Samoan, Rorotongan, Tongan, Fijian, and Hawaiian dialects—all branches of the Polynesian language. Portions of the Scriptures have also been printed in the Marquesan, New Zealand, Gilbert Island, Marshall Island, Ponapean, and Strong's Island languages. To accomplish this has required an amount of literary and linguistic labour which can scarcely be appreciated, except by those who have spent years in acquiring a foreign language, and additional years in the work of patient translation and revision; yet this has been done exclusively by the English and American missionaries in the Pacific, besides all their other labour. A new revised edition has just been printed by the American Bible Society. It is sold as cheap as 3 dols. a copy.

CHURCH PARTIES IN GERMANY.

A CORRESPONDENT of the English Independent furnishes us with the following sketch of theological parties in Germany: "Everything goes by threes, especially theological positions. Most of the German theologians, sitting this cold day in their hot studies, wrapped in their fur coats, belong to one of three parties—the Hyper-orthodox, the Rationalist, and the Mediating parties. These parties are quite distinct, sharply separated, violently antagonistic. Yet each party has men of various and greatly different shades of belief. Roughly described, the Hyper-orthodox party stands upon three principles—history, creed, sacrament. The Orthodox Lutheran holds fast to his Lutheranism because it has a great history, and because Luther has a grand halo around him. This is the romantic element in the Lutheran Church. But the Orthodox Lutheran still more holds to his Church because of her sacraments. He recognises in baptism the means of regeneration, and in the Lord's Supper the actual presence of his Lord's body and blood. The other great principle of orthodoxy is common to both Lutheran and Reformed, the creeds of the Reformation, especially the Augsburg Confession. The Orthodox Lutherans are a large and strong section of the German Church. Erlangen and Rostock are their Universities. Harless, Delitzsch, Kliefoth, are of this section.

The Rationalists take their stand not upon the past, or the creeds or the sacraments, but upon the present—reason, conscience, culture. The great present, they hold, is wiser than the past; cannot, if it would, repose upon the creeds; must obey the ever-mightier voice of conscience, and is compelled to see in culture and education the hope of our race. Of course this party, as well as the former, numbers men of various shades of belief. Their faith in reason separates them from the orthodox, and their faith in the Church from men of a more extreme tendency. To this second party belong such men as Schwartz and Schenkel. Tübingen, Heidelberg, Jena, are more especially their Universities.

The third party, the Mediators or Reconcilers, is not so easy to describe. It is a school that sprang up from seeds sown by the great theological seed-sower Schleiermacher. It once numbered amongst its adherents such men as Neander and Nitzsch, Rothe and Ullmann, and now boasts of its Dörner and Hase. The name by which the school is called points to its main position and aims. It maintains that no antithesis, no irreconcilable opposition, exists between reason and revelation, the natural and the supernatural. It holds that reason is revelation and revelation reason; that the supernatural is only a higher phase of the natural; that the God-man is the sum and embodiment of all human excellencies in one person. Against the Rationalists it defends the creeds and the Bible, against the Orthodox the reason and nature. The third party is also strong, having great influence in many of the chief universities, as Berlin, Göttingen, Leipzig. It opposes stoutly, and is as stoutly opposed by, both the Orthodox and the Rationalists.

Of course there are men who belong to neither party, men who stand aloof from the dangerous and hurtful influence of party-names and interests. Of these solitary and independent great ones the great Oriental scholar and Biblical critic, Ewald, is one. At the same time Ewald was one of the foremost leaders of the people of Hannover in their recent efforts to obtain a better Church constitution. And now the tyranny of Prussia does not suffer him to lecture at all in the University."

Since this was written, as our readers are aware, he has been tried for publishing a pamphlet entitled, "Praise of the King and the People," and been acquitted.

LITERARIA.

In a lecture at the Royal Institution Mr. Deutsch, whose article on the Talmud a short time ago excited so much interest, compared this work to "Hansard." He said, "like Hansard the Talmud is a collection of debates, bills, and resolutions; only in the Talmud the order is reversed, the act is the starting-point, the debates are its consequence." He added, however, that the Talmud, as a kosmos, ever revolves round one central sun, the Bible.

Mr. Mackonochie has published a penny pamphlet, addressed to his parishioners, in which he thus refers to the promoters of the recent suit against him—members, be it recollected, of the same church as himself: "Our Lord has allowed His enemies to insult Him by putting out the symbolical lights, just as in His passion He deigned to suffer not only the great torments of scourge, and cross, and crown of thorns, but also the smiting on the face, the spitting, and many other such lesser affronts. . . . No doubt the judgment was meant by those who began the suit to be against our blessed Lord in that which is dearest to Him—the Sacrament of His Divine love; but by the good Providence of our God upon us, the counsel of Ahitophel has been turned to foolishness, and the blow has fallen upon us."

An abridgment has just been issued (by Rivington) of Dean Alford's Greek Testament, with English Notes, intended for the Upper Forms of Schools and for Passmen at the Universities, but which, from its handiness, may be useful to others. The revised text of the larger work is given, but where two readings claim about equal authority, the alternative one is added below. At the beginning of the volume there are brief introductions to the several writings, in which the most important points connected with their nature and history are briefly but clearly given.

Samuel Bagster and Sons announce a new edition of what is known as "Bagster's Polyglot Bible." It is to be in two volumes folio, and is in eight languages, namely: the Hebrew of the edition of Van der Hooght, with vowel points and accents; the Greek of the Septuagint, and the Greek of the New Testament (the received text); the Latin of the Vulgate; the English of the King James version; the German of Luther's Bible; the French of J. F. Ostervald's version; the Italian of Diodati's; and the Spanish of Patre Scio's. To these is added the New Testament in Hebrew, by William Greenfield (Wilhelm Grünfeld), a converted Jew—a version which seems to be intended for missionary purposes. To this, again, by way of appendix, there will be added the Syriac New Testament, the "Peshito," the Samaritan Pentateuch, according to the edition of Kenicott; Various Readings of the Septuagint, and of the Greek New Testament drawn from the notes of Griesbach.

M. Neubauer, whose "Geography of the Talmud," as we mentioned a short time since, obtained a prize from the French Academy, has in preparation an historical volume of "Talmudic Studies," which every one interested in Jewish history and literature will be glad to see published.

The Late Mr. William Akroyd.

A SERMON, preached by the Rev. D. Maginnis, on Sunday, January 31st, at the Stourbridge Chapel, which was crowded on the occasion, gives us some very interesting particulars of Mr. Akroyd's life. After dwelling for a while on the texts, "None of us liveth unto himself, and no man dieth unto himself," and "The manifestation of the spirit is given to every man to profit withal," Mr. Maginnis went on to speak of Mr. Akroyd's character. He was no ordinary man. He, to use his own words, inherited from his father a hatred of dependence upon anything or anybody. After walking 600 miles on foot in search of employment, he came to that town, and setting himself to the task of raising himself above the necessity of labouring continuously for his daily bread, he accomplished it. And he came to be independent in worldly circumstances, not by any lucky venture which sometimes makes a man's fortune without any special merit or ability on his part, but by his innate force of character, his industry, prudence, and perseverance. He was never slow to acknowledge that, in his earlier efforts to rise, a friendly hand was extended to him, of which he could take advantage without compromising his stern sense of independence. To his honour, he himself largely practised the lesson of friendly help thus learned. He had paid back such friendly service many hundredfold to deserving young men who were struggling against difficulties too strong for them. Mr. Maginnis also referred to Mr. Akroyd's services as a guardian, to the efforts he made in connection with the extension of railway accommodation, and to his services to the political party with which he was connected. He only referred to these latter in order to mention that they were an additional testimony to that large heartedness which characterised him in every sphere of life. These services—so long, so onerous, so long-continued, and so important—were rendered from a pure love of the cause, and without fee or reward. Though his official position rendered litigation in the local Court to his advantage, yet few men ever did more to prevent litigation. His influence and efforts were always directed to promote amicable arrangements of differences; and in time he became himself a sort of court, judge, jury, and general adviser for the district. Few men had filled at one time so many distinct offices, and had laboured more successfully to discharge their duties. When he accepted an office he did the work. He was a self-educated man, yet his knowledge was large and varied. While learning much from his practical wisdom and from intercourse with men, he learned also much from books, and with his favourite authors he was very familiar. His appreciation of art was genuine; and in that 600 miles' walk, to which allusion had been made, he visited every cathedral in England, except one, and made it a point to see every old abbey that lay on his route. Moderate, almost to abstemiousness, in the enjoyments of the table, he was a very epicure for pleasant talk. In matters of religion he had a profound sense of the rights of the individual conscience. While for cant, and hypocrisy, and great sounding professions of religion without a corresponding life-service he had nothing but contempt; for every form of honest, intelligent conviction he had the sincerest respect. His last illness was induced by his self-sacrificing labour in the service of his political party. He died as he often wished he might die, in harness. During his illness, though at times very much tried, he was patient, and though desirous, naturally, to live some time longer, if God so willed, he was not unprepared to go. He had no shadow of fear; and when he knew the inevitable issue was nigh, he met it in a brave, trustful, and Christian spirit.

CONFIRMATION SERVICES.

THE following report of a sub-committee, appointed by the Mission Conference, to consider "the best manual for use in preparing young people to join our congregations, and the best form of service for their public recognition," was read at the annual meeting of the conference, January 21st, 1869.

The idea of the service here contemplated is, that young persons having arrived at years of understanding, and a sense of the obligations of Christian duty, should make a public dedication of themselves to a pious life, and acknowledge before fellow-worshippers their desire to learn and do the will of God, as revealed by Jesus Christ. The dedication prayers of parents and friends at baptism exactly represent the spirit of this service. The birth of an immortal soul is an event so solemn that Christian parents recognise in the presence of fellow-worshippers the new responsibilities that have fallen upon them, and dedicate the new life to God, with earnest resolves to do all that they should or can to bring up the child in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. The arrival of young people at years of understanding, when the sense of duty and accountability is sufficiently developed, is a period when they may voluntarily make a public profession of their personal desire to live quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty. The generous sentiments of youth will naturally incline the heart to seek for guidance, sympathy, and friendship, and there should be recognised methods by which they may obtain all these from the Christian Church. The conference is agreed that Recognition, or Initiation at Confirmation Services, is one suitable method, and we proceed to state the plan we think most likely to lead to their general acceptance.

THE MANUAL.

The age of candidates should be about sixteen. With respect to a manual suitable for preparing young people to engage in the proposed service, no cordial recommendation has been given of any existing work. There are many valuable works in existence suitable for the general religious instruction of the young, but for this special event the committee recommend only a brief course of special preparation, not to extend beyond three months. A small work, compact and suggestive, would be all that would be needed as a guide to the minister, and an aid to the young people in the concentration of thought, a kind of resumé of Sunday-school and vestry-class work, to test whether or not the candidates were fully informed on leading religious truths and duties. The following might be the headings of chapters:—God—Christ—The Bible—Personal Accountability—The Christian Church, its services, growth, and worship; and if these subjects were studied two nights each, the work would be accomplished in a short and definite time, such as any earnest person might devote to it.

The cost of a manual of the kind suggested need not exceed twopence or threepence.

THE SERVICE.

Invitations should be given and urgently pressed upon young people of both sexes and rich and poor alike. The liturgical form of service has met with unanimous approval. The Confirmation service in "Common Prayer of Christian worship," and portions of the "Liturgy of the Wakefield Band of Faith" are recommended. The declaration asked from the candidates in the former service might be extended to include a few points in a liberal Christian faith, care being taken to avoid speculative doctrines. We think the whole service should be a special one, and not a portion of the ordinary worship, and that a general introduction of appropriate prayers, lessons, hymns, and chants should be provided, and provision made for an address, as an integral part of the service. The services should be held at regular intervals, not often than every two years, nor less frequently than every three, and if possible the preparation should be at the same period and the service itself on the same day of the year. If neighbouring congregations would unite and hold the service in rotation, the sympathy of numbers and other advantages would accrue.

Young persons should be carefully warned against the idea that taking part in these services implies the acceptance of duties from which others are free, and against any ideas of personal merit derived from orthodox procedure.

The committee are divided in opinion as to whether or not the Lord's Supper should be a part of the service. Objection is especially made against considering the service an introduction to that memorial. Such a course would tend to perpetuate the vicious ideas that there is a peculiar sanctity in the Lord's Supper, and that there should be a peculiar fitness in the communicant.

Whether taking part in this service should admit to any secular privileges connected with Church organisations must be decided by each congregation for itself.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

MASTER AND SERVANT.

THE master is the servant, the true slave,

And Tom and Dick the masters—endless care,
To think for them, to plan their work, to pave
Their way, and keep them there.

What freemen they! From work so often done,
Their hands alone might do the task assigned,
Some labour of the muscle and the bone,
But little of the mind.

And even that stops with the driven nail,
The placement of the stone, the served-up lime,
Their only care that Time, slow as a snail,
Delays the loosening chime.

But for their servant-master rings no bell!

He comes, and leaves, yet not their freedom knows,
But drags his business, as the snail the shell,
With him where'er he goes.

R. LEIGHTON.

THE WEALTH OF SPANISH CHURCHES.

We take the following particulars, slightly abridged, from an article in the Echo :—

The Spanish churches contain more weight in gold, silver, and jewels than all the other cathedrals of Europe. Vast riches, in gold and silver ingots and precious stones, were brought into Spain after the Mexican war, in the time of Hernan Cortez, and though some of them were stolen by the French during the Peninsular war, an immense quantity still remains. In the Cathedral of Burgos the principal statue of the Virgin wears a jewelled crown, and before it lamps of massive silver are always burning. The sacristy contains numerous priestly vestments embroidered in gold and pearls, while cups, vases, salvers, and caskets studded with gems adorn its shelves. The little black wooden image of the Virgin in the church of Atocha, near Madrid, has a richer wardrobe than that possessed by any queen, and jewels of immense value. It has a crown of diamonds presented by Isabel II., necklaces, bracelets, and other ornaments in great quantities. Its gorgeous mantles—so covered with embroidery in gold and pearls that the velvet is scarcely visible—all the safes along the sides of the sacristy, and as the wedding costume worn by any member of the Royal Family is the perquisite of this statue, its wealth has always been increasing. Among the treasures of the Cathedral of Valencia, and side by side with "the first shirt worn by the infant Jesus," and "the skeleton of one of the Holy Innocents," is the "golden comb of the Virgin." It is of antique form, and richly jewelled. A beautiful casket contains the santo caliz, or cup, used by Jesus Christ at the Last Supper. It is of fine onyx, studded with gems of rare value, has two golden handles, and a stand of the same metal. These treasures are of peculiar interest, if only as showing how blind to all probability or inquiry the Spanish bigotry which reveres them has become. In the sacristy of the Cathedral of Toledo there are four statues of massive silver, representing the four quarters of the world, each figure leaning on a globe. The Custodia, or keeping-place for the Host, is more than 9ft. high, wrought of massive gold and silver, literally encrusted with diamonds and other valuable precious stones. Among the ornaments of the Virgin del Sagrario, an image which is much venerated, is a royal crown of pure gold, studded with large diamonds and emeralds, with bracelets to match. She once possessed a necklace of diamonds of almost priceless value, but it was stolen by Mendizabel, during the civil war, and given by him to his mistress. Her mantles are of gold brocade, embroidered with large pearls, and the altar on which she stands is of solid silver. Behind her is an octagonal chapel containing riches, in jewels, crosses, vases, and statues, that would go far towards the purchase of a principality. In the cathedral hundreds of priests appear in robes of gold and silver tissue, and under dresses of the richest lace and most costly needlework. The canons wear jewelled collars, such for value as have never been worn at Rome but upon the person of the Pontiff himself. A list of the treasures of Nuestra Señora de Montserrat fills a volume. Most of the Roman Catholic sovereigns of Europe, with countless princes and nobles, have made some offering to this doll; but it is a curious fact that, while cardinals, archbishops, and bishops have presented costly robes, lamps, and jewels, the Popes, with the exception of Adrian VI., who offered a lamp and 200 ducats, have contented themselves with sending others to the sanctuary, and granting them indulgences. In the centre of the principal chapel there are two silver lamps, each of which weighs 125lb, presented by Philip II. (of Smithfield memory) and Philip IV.; a third lamp, exquisitely chased, weighing 150lbs, was given by the Grand Duke of Tuscany in 1669. A silver ship, weighing 125lbs., of most delicate and beautiful workmanship, was the gift of the Marquesa de Castel-Rodrigo in 1682. A lamp, value 600 ducats, was presented by the Queen of Henry IV. of France. All these objects are of pure silver, together with the front and the five steps of the grand altar; and there is a throne of the same metal. On high festival days twenty-four candelabra are wheeled out from the sacristy, and stand before the grand altar; all are of solid silver, and twelve of them are five feet high. Six silver candlesticks, thirty-two inches high, are used for the daily service. There are three silver gilt crosses borne in the procession, adorned with jewels, the largest of which weighs 100lbs.; two rods of silver gilt, one with an emerald of great value, twenty-six chalice, and nine salvers. But these are nothing when compared with the gems. The image of the Virgin Mary has three crowns almost covered with diamonds, emeralds, sapphires, and rubies presented by different worshippers. One of these crowns was made by a Flemish monk in the convent, who spent twenty-seven years in the fabrication of this and a similar one for the image of the infant Jesus. Nearly as rich in church treasures is Seville. During the processions of the Holy Week, when all the churches sent out statues larger than life into the public streets, an almost incalculable amount of treasure is displayed. These wooden images are more than royally appareled, for some of the velvet robes are twenty feet long, and so covered with pearls and gold embroidery that no human being could sustain their weight. One of the mantles is of dark blue velvet and gold, and was presented by the late Queen of the French, Marie Amelie. Almost the whole figure is dazzling with jewels, and the statues from the principal churches have always a crown of diamonds. Some of the processions go through the streets at night, and on these occasions the platforms on which the groups of images are borne are lighted with hundreds of silver lamps.

AN ARTFUL ADVERTISEMENT.

GRAT is the ingenuity displayed in advertisements, but it is not often that we meet with one more fitted to attract attention and secure perusal than the following, which appears with the heading "A SECRET—FOR HUSBANDS":

"Never refuse your wife anything she has set her heart upon; never try to convince her that she does not need it, or that you cannot afford it. Don't get into an argument on the subject, or, rest assured, she will get the best of it. On the contrary, assent cheerfully to her suggestion, even although at first glance it may appear somewhat startling; discuss the style and quality of the desired article, and good-naturedly compare tastes. Then, if you really cannot afford it, you may say, 'My dear, you shall have it soon; but just now our taxes must be paid, you know.' (The wise husband never says 'my taxes.' It makes a woman realise her partnership in the domestic firm to be allowed an interest in the taxes.) Or you may speak of whatever it may be that really interferes, and the dear, reasonable woman cheerfully defers her pet scheme—only defers, you see; the equally reasonable husband does not require her to renounce it. In process of time either the wife discovers that she can do very well without it, or you will have the pleasure of saying, 'Now, my dear, if you want that article we were speaking of, I think we may afford it.'

"The arguing husband is the philosopher whose wife always gets what she wants, reasonable or unreasonable. The husband, who never refuses his wife anything, always has a wife who is willing to wait until he can afford to gratify her wishes. This may seem paradoxical, but the study of human nature, of which most wives have a fair share, will explain the apparent mystery, which really is no mystery at all. If your wife wants a sewing machine, don't mention the 'taxes' but use all your wits to find out the right one—one that she can use without an apprenticeship, and have pleasure in using, one that the children can work with, and may play with, one that anybody can use off-hand without 'giving' his whole mind to it."

"There is one such machine—only one—it is silent too. You can read the evening paper to your wife, or Robinson Crusoe to your children, or write a letter to the Times undisturbed, while this quiet, steady worker is gliding swiftly over the little frocks and knicker-bockers by your side.

"In the long run the 'taxes' will be paid all the easier on account of the sewing machine. They must be paid at once perhaps. Still you need not wait. This treasure, this helper, this tax-payer, this comfort-bringer, this silent sewing machine, may be got now and paid for a little at a time, if your purse is slender."

Then follow, of course, recommendations of one such machine in particular, which, as we have not been paid for them, there is no call upon us to insert.

"TRY AGAIN."

(From an old Montreal Herald.)

"Try again;" that simple sentence
Hath a strong and earnest power,
As a household word familiar,
Even from our childhood's hour.
Then, in truth, we might have murmured
At the oft-repeated strain,
When to master tedious lessons
We were urged to "try again."
"Try again;" we liked it better
When we found the plan succeed;
Found that winning followed trying,
This was a sufficient meed.
Victory would lose its triumph,
If it were not earned by pain;
And the moral conqueror's watchword
Is the motto, "try again."

"Try again," faint souls and fearful,
Trying makes the spirit strong;
With the bravest of life's victors
You will win a place ere long.
"Try again," bold hearts and fearless,
Shrink not at the passing pain;
You have borne too much already
Not to trust and "try again."
"Try again," from youth to manhood,
From full prime to age's night;
Life in every phase has trials,
Fields to win and foes to fight.
For a time our hearts may falter,
But the onward path is plain;
Disappointment must not daunt us,
Let us hope, and "try again."

AN ASYLUM FOR DRUNKARDS.

A VISITOR gives the following account of the asylum for drunkards at Binghampton, in the State of New York :—

"The library is an important feature of the establishment. A large proportion of those who come here for treatment are men of culture and intellectual refinement. They seek books of the best authors, and on the highest range of subjects, and the 1,400 volumes that are now upon the shelves have been selected with a view to meet the special requirement thus found existing. Food for the craving mind, and opportunity for relaxation, are the principal means relied upon for producing that feeling of quiet and content so essential to the cure of the peculiar class of patients who take up their abode in this asylum. Whatever will allay the horrible nervousness that men who have been in the habit of drinking suffer from is the agency that acts most directly as a practical remedy. Therefore, as most excellent adjuncts to the brain-feeding which the books bestow, there are provided a billiard saloon and a bowling-alley, and a gymnasium and a theatre. Those who have often arisen in the morning with scarcely moral energy enough to pull on their boots, which was when they were freely pouring down their 'festive tods,' astonish themselves here by experimenting in a reckless manner on the horizontal bar, or rolling eight-pound balls adown the well-planned slope, or walking several miles, in process of continuous games around the tables radiant in green cloth. Then these patients—so many of them literary and artistic by acknowledged verdict of tried criticism—get up among themselves clubs and associations, and have lectures and discussions, and even dramatic performances that might be reported with credit to the columns of any leading newspaper, and with assurance of infinite interest to its readers. And where could more delightful conversation be listened to? Men talking who have been all over the world, who have given life to the daily and weekly and monthly literature of the period; who have written books that thousands have devoured with ecstasy; who have made their mark on paper and on canvas; whose pens and pencils have been the instruments of producing such things of beauty as are a joy for ever. Among few companies of staid and sober ones of character immaculate, who never have the banking of excess, could there be found such sparkling of wits, such inexhaustible stores of erudition, and such wealth of piquant experience as one will meet in a brief time spent with these earnest pilgrims fleeing from the dread Apollyon that lurks in rum. Now when these pilgrims are extracted from the alcoholic Slough of Despond into which they have fallen, they are weak and spent. One of the most powerful agents in recruiting their demoralised forces is sound, nutritious, palatable meat and drink. This the asylum most bountifully supplies. Since May, 1867, when the new life of the asylum began, 310 patients have been received; 230 of them coming in during the year which has lately closed. Of these 220 have been discharged and 82 remain. Of guests thus entertained 146 had wives and 164 were unmarried, showing that celibacy is either an incentive to hard drinking, or that hard drinking causes men to avoid family responsibility. The habitual drunkards number 163, the periodical ones 147. Some came of themselves for voluntary relief; others were brought by friends. Suffering from one or another form of delirium were 96; 31 had convulsions; 73 were in general good health, but sought escape from the temptation that did so easily beset them; and 101 were set down as cases in which this sad legacy of moral weakness had been inherited. After one trial of the beneficial influences of the asylum, 113 left it thoroughly reformed. Eleven returned after one relapse and four after a second. With no hope of retrieval 25 were expelled; nothing definite could be ascertained about 68. Four died and three had to be transferred to the madhouse—insane beyond the chance of recovery. The average time that patients have stayed in the asylum is 123 days.

VERY LUCKY!

MR. M. CONWAY, who is writing a series of "Saunterings" in England for Harper's Magazine, in a paper on Stonehenge tells the following: His coachman was a character. He had been for the greater part of his life keeper of Lord Somebody's stud, and an earnest jockey for the same nobleman in steeple-chases. "Do not a great many accidents happen in steeple-chases?" I asked. "Yes, sir, a goodish few." "Have you ever met with many?" "Me? oh, I always came off well. I got my ankle broke once; afterwards a rib broken; and then again a shoulder out of joint. I was always very lucky, sir, very." "Other jockeys must fare badly, then," I remarked. "Yes, sir, a goodish few gets killed; and most gets crippled for life."

INTELLIGENCE

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—On Sunday last the Rev. P. W. Clayden was unanimously elected the minister of the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, Kentish Town, in the place of the Rev. Wm. Forster, who has resigned. Regretting, as we do, the retirement of the Rev. Wm. Forster, the founder of the church, rendered necessary by his failing health, we cannot but congratulate the congregation on having secured the services of Mr. Clayden in carrying on the great work, so nobly commenced by Mr. Forster, in this populous neighbourhood.

LIVERPOOL: ROSCOMMON-STREET.—At a special meeting of this congregation, held on Sunday evening last, after the service, a letter was read from Thos. Avison, Esq., secretary of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, stating that the committee of the Association had decided to build a chapel for the congregation at that end of the town; and requesting the congregation to determine whether the site in Roscommon-street, or a piece of ground in Netherfield-road North, which had been inspected, would be most desirable for the purpose. On the motion of Mr. T. E. Stephens, seconded by Mr. John Smith, and after some discussion, it was unanimously decided to recommend the site in Netherfield-road North as most desirable, provided it should be found sufficiently spacious.

MONTROSE.—A lecture upon the Doctrine of the Trinity was given last Monday night by Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee. The hall was filled, and numbers could not get inside. The greatest attention was given to the discourse. Afterwards attempts were made to take the control of the meeting out of Mr. Williamson's hands, but this he would not permit. Several persons expressed satisfaction with the lecture. Considering that only three lectures have been given in Montrose, the prospects are favourable for our cause.

MORETONHAMPTSTEAD.—The school children held their annual tea meeting in Smethurst Hall, on Thursday evening, 28th January. They were joined by the greater part of the congregation, numbering from 120 to 130. There was a splendid Christmas tree planted about the centre of the hall, laden with choice fruits, principally the gift of Mrs. Hill and Mrs. E. Bowring, of Moulsey (Surrey). This school owes its birth to Heard's Charity, and, in compliance with that gentleman's request, the proceedings of the evening commenced with singing the well-known hymn, "From all that dwell below the skies." In conclusion, Mr. Hill exhibited the magic lantern.

MOSSLEY.—The Band of Faith held its annual tea meeting on Saturday the 6th inst. About 150 of the members and friends were present. The chair was occupied by the Rev. D. Berry, the minister. Mr. Joseph Heap, one of the secretaries, read the report, which stated that the Band is still doing a good work. "The present number of members is 79, with an average attendance of 36. During the past year 46 meetings have been held, 36 conducted by the minister and 10 by lay members. The missionary section of the Band comprises 18 members, who collect from the congregation and friends small sums of money monthly, ranging from 3d. to 6d., for the purpose of buying tracts and relieving the poor. There are 40 women engaged in distributing 921 tracts each week. In this department the committee's efforts have been, and still are very much crippled from the want of suitable tracts. And they would here express a hope that before another year this evil may be remedied." The meeting was afterwards addressed by the Rev. F. Revitt, of Mottram, W. G. Cadman, of Failsforth, and John Ellis, of Eland, and Messrs. A. Buckley and H. Thomas of the Home Missionary Board, all of whom spoke of the excellence of the Band, as a powerful means for developing the religious life of the church. The proceedings were interspersed by recitations and singing.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—On Tuesday evening last a number of friends met in the Schoolroom of the Church of Divine Unity to welcome Mr. Robert Sharp, the new teacher of the boys' day school connected with the church. Mr. Sharp also occupies the post of minute secretary of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Missionary Society. Rev. J. C. Street took the chair; and Mr. Joseph Clephan, Mr. Sharp, and the Revs. E. Hopkinson and Thos. Leyland took part in the meeting.

NOTTINGHAM: CHRIST CHURCH.—A special service in recognition of the commencement of the ministry of the Rev. C. L. Whitham took place here on Thursday evening last, February 4th. The Rev. A. W. Worthington began the service, and gave Mr. Whitham the welcome to the ministry. The Rev. Dr. Beard delivered the charge to the minister, and the Rev. J. P. Hoppes the charge to the congregation. After the service, a tea meeting was held in the schoolroom, upwards of 120 persons being present. The chair was taken by Mr. H. C. Perry, an old teacher in the High Pavement Schools. Addresses of welcome to Mr. Whitham from the congregation and from the teachers were read respectively by Mr. Sands and Mr. Lewis, and warmly acknowledged by Mr. Whitham. The Rev. A. W. Worthington gave Mr. Whitham a very cordial welcome as a minister into the district. Thanks to the officiating and visiting ministers, proposed by Warden W. L. Goddard, brought, in reply, interesting addresses from the Revs. Dr. Beard, J. P. Hoppes, and W. Shakespeare (Ikeston), and thanks to the choir (who had given several anthems) and chairman, brought to a close an evening's proceedings that we hope and trust will be fraught with much good and usefulness to this church and the institutions connected with it.

WAKEFIELD BAND OF FAITH: FARSELY MISSION. The first annual tea party of the above mission was held in the Temperance room, Charles-street, Farsley, on Saturday last. Upwards of 100 persons were present, Alderman R. M. Carter, M.P., being in the chair. Mr. Morton, the secretary, read the report, which stated that the Band of Faith Mission at Farsley had now been in existence twelve months. A series of doctrinal lectures was given at the beginning of the year, and were well attended. Out-door meetings were held during the summer months, and large numbers of tracts distributed. The mission had been entirely self-supporting. Addresses were afterwards delivered by the chairman, Councillor Gaunt, Rev. W. A. Clarke, Joseph Smith, T. R. Elliott, and J. Bevan.—On Sunday, February 7th, the anniversary sermons were preached in the Temperance room by the Rev. Goodwyn Barmby. The attendance was good, and the collections amounted to £1. 4s.

WAKEFIELD.—On Sunday week, the annual sermons in connection with the Sunday schools were preached by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester. On Monday evening the annual congregational tea meeting took place in Back-lane Schoolroom, after which a public meeting was held, the chair being occupied by the Rev. Goodwyn Barmby, the minister of the Unitarian Church, who, in the course of his remarks, referred to the great loss sustained during the year by the death of one who was always ready to aid in every good work, Mr. H. Briggs. Mr. Archd. Briggs, the Revs. Patrick Cannon, S. A. Steinthal, J. Thomas (Huddersfield), W. A. Clark (Bradford), J. Smith (Idle), J. Bevan (Pudsey), C. Howe (Dewsbury), W. Blazey, B.A. (Rotherham), G. Woolter (Thorne), and Messrs. Christopher Todd, S. Whittaker, S. Blackburn, and others addressed the meeting. On Tuesday evening, the Unitarian Schoolrooms were again crowded with the Sunday scholars and their parents. After singing an anthem, the prizes were distributed by the Rev. Goodwyn Barmby.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. M. H.—Next week, probably.
R. E. D.—The article gave the general estimate, and we do not see that any good would be answered by disturbing it.
E. B. S.—There is evidently some mistake, and we will try to make out where it lies.

A WORKING CHURCH.

To the Editors.—While I highly appreciate the efforts of the offertory system, as so ably set forth by the Rev. B. Herford, I think the other side should not be lost sight of. I send you a noble example for us, in which the average contributions of each member is £5 a year. Pray find space for its insertion.—Yours, &c., 2nd Feb., 1869.

ANDREW PRITCHARD.

"The church and congregation at Hare-court Chapel, Canonbury, of which Dr. Raleigh is the pastor, have just held their annual meeting, when reports were presented of the operations of the past year. These operations show in a very striking manner the powers of voluntarism. During 1868 upwards of £4,300 was raised for religious and benevolent objects alone, more than another £1,000 being raised by pew rents, which are appropriated to the payment of the minister. Of the £4,300 above £3,800 was devoted to home purposes, the balance being expended on foreign objects. These home purposes comprise five branch churches—one of them in the most destitute part of Bermondsey—three rooms for religious services, and several others for mission meetings. Three day schools, five Sunday or ragged schools (independent of Sabbath afternoon classes at the chapel), two large week evening schools, and several small ones; the total aggregate of scholars being upwards of 2,000; a home for little boys at Farningham, at which thirty destitute children are maintained and educated; and a children's nursery in a destitute part of Islington. In addition to these, it appears that there are four penny banks, with 1,465 depositors, their deposits during the year amounting to £611; five mothers' meetings, with 559 members, at which about 430 garments were made every month; coal clubs, which distributed 100 tons of coals; temperance societies, Bands of Hope, &c. It was also stated that 7,124 children's dinners had been given to poor children during the year; and that at Christmas 400 families, comprising as far as could be ascertained about 2,500 individuals, had a Christmas dinner sufficient for two days given to them. The church and congregation which sustains and carries on all these works is by no means a large one. Harecourt chapel will not seat, when crowded, more than 1,500 people. The church consists of 929 communicants, of whom 646 belong to the parent church, and 283 to the branch churches. The agency by which the work is done consists of three paid ministers, six gratuitous lay evangelists, six paid teachers, seven monitors for the schools, and upwards of 300 members of the church and congregation, who give their services in various ways. One medical man also gives gratuitously advice and medicine, and visits the poor connected with the various stations. One fact stated by Mr. Sinclair, the treasurer of the various societies connected with the home operations of the church, was very significant. He said that they had no collectors, either paid or voluntary, for any of the societies of which he was treasurer. When they had collectors the societies were always in debt since they had been discontinued he had always been able to report a balance in hand. During the year upwards of £2,800 had flowed into his hands without a single collector being employed to gather it. Such a statement is pregnant with instruction to those who would understand the workings of the voluntary principle."—From the Daily News.

OWING to the Ravages of the Vine Disease, the Production, and consequently the Importation into this country of WINE from the island of MADEIRA, for a number of years all but completely ceased. The ground formerly devoted to the Vine plant was turned into Sugar Plantations, Sugar being a less precarious crop, and sooner available for the market than Wine.

Since the disappearance of the disease, the Culture of the VINE has again attracted the attention, and for a few years past the quantity of WINE made has increased. Thinking there might be a trade done if a good WINE, at a moderate price, were offered, we have been at considerable pains to PROCURE SAMPLES FROM THE ISLAND, and have selected one which we can offer at 42s. PER DOZEN.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Indian Church News mentions a shocking instance of parsimony and profanity combined. It has actually been "credibly informed" that the Rev. R. O'M. Deane, acting chaplain of Emmanuel Church, Madras, has suggested that some of the surplices of the choir should be cut up to make shirts for the use of the school-boys!

The other day, a curious illustration was afforded in Rome of Catholic consistency. The Pope visited one of the oratories, and attended the service of forty hours, in expiation of the excesses of the Carnival; although it is notorious that this is kept up by the exhortations of the priests to the partisans of the temporal power, and for some weeks before it took place the most popular preachers called on their flocks to join in its revelries, as a demonstration in favour of the Holy Father.

It is stated that the Pope is engaged in arranging the new hierarchy to be established in Scotland, and will shortly nominate two archbishops, who are to reside respectively at Glasgow and St. Andrews, and ten bishops, designated from the principal towns of Scotland. Last week, Monsignor Charles Eyre, Archbishop of Anazarha in partibus, was consecrated Apostolic Delegate for Scotland at the Church of St. Andrew delle Velle.

Mgnr. Alberghini, Dean of the Rota (the chief court of judicature), died on the last day of January, aged eighty. He was a great miser, and several times declined the cardinal's hat, from unwillingness to pay the expenses. He ate only soup and broth for dinner, and to the last refused to buy necessary nourishment.

The Fremdenblatt of Vienna states that the Bishop of Trieste, being hurt at a demonstration made against him by the ultramontanes of that city, has gone to Capo d'Istria, where, the day after his arrival, he ascended the pulpit, and taking for his text the words, "My kingdom is not of this world," demonstrated that the temporal authority of the Pope was incompatible with spiritual powers.

The assassination at Burgos is bringing out some curious facts which, but for it, might have lain undisclosed. For example, it appears that in the district there are no fewer than three thousand ecclesiastics, which is one to every nine lay inhabitants. Since the Revolution, too, it has been found that articles of "many millions in value" have been carried off from the churches by the priests. The valuables found in the Chapel Royal at Madrid have been deposited in the Bank of Spain. Among them are three hundred relics, for which the late Queen in particular, and preceding sovereigns reckoning from the beginning of the eighteenth century, paid sums beyond count. This costly rubbish includes what were palmed off upon the Royal dupes as drops of the Saviour's sweat and blood, and nails from his cross, a piece of the manger in which he was born, with bits of bone, morsels of vesture, finger and toe nails, &c., &c.

It is hoped that Dr. Gannett, of Boston, who will spend some time in Europe this year, may be induced to take charge of a Unitarian mission in Paris.

The Pall Mall is authority for the following:

"The other day, while the curé of the Madeleine Church was discussing business in the vestry with a friend, a small insignificant looking person entered and desired to speak with him. The curé, with his well-known air of a tambour majeur (drum-major), curtly told him to sit down and wait. The small man, however, remained standing. This displeased the curé, who exclaimed, 'Monsieur, I desire you to seat yourself.' Instead of complying, the gentleman paced rapidly up and down the room until the curé, fairly irritated, insisted in so peremptory a manner as to compel obedience. In about a quarter of an hour, business being finished, he turned to the stranger, 'Monsieur, what is it you desire?' The latter replied, in a thin shrill voice, 'M. le Curé, I wish to inquire at what hour to-morrow you will be able to baptize an infant, for whom I am to be sponsor?' An hour was named, and he was told to write his name, and that of the godmother, at full length in the register book, which was presented to him for that purpose. To the surprise of the curé he wrote down, 'François d'Assise, Roi d'Espagne, and Isabella, Reine d'Espagne.' To complete the scene, there entered immediately afterwards the ex-Queen herself, attended by another personage, whose face is now sufficiently known to the Parisians. They had waited until they were tired for the reappearance of the ex-King, and had at last come in search of him."

Roman Catholicism, as we showed last week, has been peculiarly unfortunate in some of its recent manifestations, especially in severity to unfortunate offenders. Another has just been given in the case of a priest, Father Pirin, brought before the Correctional Tribunal of Lyons for cruelty to pupils placed under his care. The evidence proved that, by a strange refinement of cruelty, he was accustomed to hang the pupils by the legs to a large hook in the wall and then flog them. Sometimes he left the poor children for a considerable time with the head down, totally regardless of the ill effects which such punishment might produce on their health. He also frequently made the big boys act as executioners and whip the young ones. The court sentenced the accused to six months' imprisonment.

At the quarterly meeting of the Congregational Churches of Anglesea, on Feb. 1st, the following indignation resolution was unanimously passed:

"Respecting the reference made to the religious condition of this island at one of the meetings of the Evangelical Alliance, held lately in London, when the prayers of the united meeting were anonymously requested on our behalf, we beg to state that while we highly value individual and united prayers of Christians for each other, and for the world at large, yet we feel aggrieved that any party or parties of men are allowed to employ those occasions as opportunities to use epithets which we cannot look upon but as the result either of gross ignorance or malice in referring to one of the most Protestant and Evangelical counties in the United Kingdom."

The English Independent says:

"Accepting the statement of a writer in the British Quarterly Review that the Free Churches of England raise about £3,000,000 per annum for religious purposes, we are inclined to credit the Congregational Churches with a fourth of that sum. A few weeks ago we printed a report for Union Chapel, Islington, which disclosed the astonishing fact that the subscriptions of the congregation assembling there for the last quarter of a century had averaged £2,000 a year for building and benevolent purposes, with another £1,000 a year for ministerial salary and the maintenance of worship. A case is mentioned in our columns to-day of a country congregation which for some years past has raised more than £1,000 a year, and where buildings have been recently erected that is not an infrequent occurrence. We have no doubt there have been years in which the Congregational Churches of England and Wales have subscribed a million of money for the spread of the Gospel, the maintenance of worship, and for charitable purposes."

The reports of Mr. Spurgeon's church shew that during the past year the weekly offerings in the boxes at the doors, for the support of the pastors' college for educating young men for the ministry, amounted to £2,000, or nearly £40 a week, a large proportion of which has always been in pence. For the same object donations have been received to the extent of £4,400 more. For the relief of poor members £770 were contributed at the communion table, and a sum of £6,600 expended for the erection of almshouses for the aged. For Sunday and ragged schools, tract and other societies, collections made produced nearly £1,000, and a sum of £1,760 was lent to other churches for the erection of chapels in which to worship. Contributions for Stockwell Orphanage, about £7,000. All these amounts are in addition to the rents received for the seats, and are therefore purely the result of the voluntary principle, and make in all upwards of £20,000.

The death is announced, in his 88th year, of the Rev. Robert Eyres Landor, brother of Walter Savage Landor, and for forty years rector of Birlingham, Worcestershire. He was the author of The Fountain of Arethusa and The Fawn of Sertorius, two semi-classical works full of original and striking thoughts. It was pleasant to hear, as we have done, his greater brother speaking with warm enthusiasm of his kindness and charity, to which he thus refers in one of his latest poems:

"Thine
Are also graver cares, with fortune blest
Not above competence, with duties charged
Which with more zeal and prudence none perform.
There are who guide the erring, tend the sick,
Nor frown the starving from a half-closed door,
But none beside my brother, none beside,
In stall thick-littered or on mitred throne,
Gives the more needy all the Church gives him."

At the enthronement of the Archbishop of Canterbury, conspicuous among the surpliced clergymen appeared a figure in a black gown and fur collar, who looked as if the picture of some old Huguenot divine had stepped out from his canvas to take a part in the ceremony of the day. He was the minister of a congregation who still worship in the crypt of the cathedral, and who, though they have long since melted into Englishmen and transformed their foreign names into native sounds, are the lineal representatives of the French and Flemish refugees to whom Queen Elizabeth extended a welcome from the persecutions of the Continent.

The Convocation of York is to meet next Tuesday. It is rumoured that further notice is to be taken of the Rev. C. Voysey's publication, The Sling and the Stone, which was formally complained of to the last Convocation.

According to the Freeman, the debts on the Baptist chapels in England amount to £150,000, for which £7,500 has to be paid annually in the shape of interest. The Baptist Building Fund committee have put forward a plan for clearing off this burden. They propose that there should be an annual collection for five years for the purpose, and that 44,270, or about one-fifth of the members belonging to the denomination, should give an annual subscription for the same end. An alternative plan is that 150,000 members should give a penny a week for five years.

The Protestant Defence Associations are renewing their agitation, and at the annual meeting of the one in Dublin, when the Duke of Abercorn was elected president, Lord Bandon, the Earl of Erne, the Earl of Bective, and others, all sounded the note of defiance and "No Surrender." It was stated that 1,024,000 copies of the pamphlets and tracts of the associations had been distributed through the country, and the late Conservative successes in Lancashire were referred to in proof of the good work which the associations had done.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In his "Greater Britain," after describing the mixed throng of men of all lands which are gathered together in Francisco, Mr. Dilke remarks,

"In this strange community, starting more free from the Puritan influence of New England than has hitherto done any State within the Union, it is doubtful what religion will predominate. Catholicism is 'not fashionable' in America—it is the creed of the Irish, and that is enough for most Americans; so Anglicanism, its critics say, is popular, as being 'very proper.' Whatever the cause, the Episcopal Church is flourishing in California, and it seems probable that the church which gains the day in California will eventually be that of the whole Pacific."

The Dean of Carlisle has published a protest against the letter written by the Rev. A.H. Mackonochie upon the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the St. Alban's case. Dr. Close says the letter is a "criminal document," couched in language of intolerable arrogance and indecency, and asks if there is no remedy against such a libel upon Her Majesty, the archbishops of the Church, and the chief judges of the land. He expresses a hope that "this convicted offender," whose spirit is chafed by defeat, will on reflection perceive that "he has published words which every good man of every sect and every party must blush to read." Observing that Mr. Mackonochie avows that he remains in the Church in order to "move every power to obtain a dissolution of this ungodly alliance" between Church and State, the Dean says, "If these are his principles, and this the spirit of the men who are to stand at the helm of our beloved Church when divorced from the State, if the English Church Union and the Ritualist faction can have their way in these matters, it is time that all true-hearted members of the Reformed Church should rouse themselves, and determine whether such seditious slanders as these are to be tolerated within the Church."

In his speech at Fishmongers' Hall, last week, the Rev. Thomas Binney caused much amusement by stating that three young men commenced their careers in the Isle of Wight together, and their names were Walter Farquhar Hook, Samuel Wilberforce, who was a nice-looking, promising young man—(laughter)—who made a good speech at one of his (the speaker's) Bible meetings; and Thomas Binney. (Cheers.) One had become a dean, the other a bishop, and the other was on what some would call the shady side of the edge; but he did not regret it. (Loud cheers and laughter, in which the Bishop of Oxford heartily joined.)

The Guardian remarks that "Vicarious preaching seems to be on the increase. In a contemporary, a 'benefited clergyman' advertises that he is ready to 'lend' his weekly sermons, 'original, earnest, evangelical,' to any 'brother more busy than himself' for half a crown apiece, or four for a 'P.O. order for ten shillings.' He ends by a request for 'mutual confidence.' Can the bishops do nothing to stop this practice, which must tend to bring the clergy into discredit? If not, cannot the public press lend a helping hand?"

The Guardian had no occasion to depend on its contemporaries for a knowledge of the traffic it denounces, since it lends itself to it week by week, and in the very number which contains the preceding paragraph the following advertisements are found:

"ORIGINAL MANUSCRIPT SERMONS.—Three sermons on Fasting, with illustrations from the Fathers; seven sermons on the Penitential Psalms; and five sermons on the meaning of the Four Colours and Gold in Vestments, at 2s. 6d. each.—Apply to A. B. C., Sandal Magna, near Wakefield.

SERMONS, plain, striking, and original, confidentially supplied. Terms, 13s. 6d. per quarter. Single M.S., for any Sunday, fifteen stamps. Address Rev. M. A., 12, John-street, Bristol.

LENTEN SERMONS now ready. Specimen MS., post free, fifteen stamps. Address Rev. M. A., 16, Edgware-road, London.

PAROCHIAL SERMONS.—Sound, practical, and original. Edited by an M.A. of Oxford. Strictly confined and confidentially supplied to the clergy. 13s. 6d. per quarter. Specimen MS., 1s. 7d. Address M. S. S., 57, Regent's Park-road, N.W."

In the great nunnery case, our readers must have noticed that the Sisters were commonly spoken of as the "religious," and their life as the "religious life." Any one who has much acquaintance with the Continent knows that the use of such phrases there has led to no little evil, fostering pharisaism on the one side and laxity on the other, and should discourage the use of them here.

The Telegraph, while admitting that complete toleration to Catholic convents and monasteries could not be denied consistently with the principles of civil and religious liberty which we profess, says:

"This admission does not exhaust the question, whether monasteries should not be under some kind of State control. Lunatic asylums, and private houses for the custody of insane persons, are regularly licensed and visited. Workhouses are under official inspection. In every county and borough of the three kingdoms there is a regular gaol delivery. Houses of correction or detention—in fact, almost all places in which it is possible that a prisoner should be incarcerated illegally—are jealously watched by the law. Why, then, should not some similar protection be afforded to the inmates of monasteries and other houses of seclusion? . . . We have not the shadow of an excuse for waging war against the mere abstract principle of monachism; but we have a perfect right to see that it be not made an instrument of cruelty. Of the oppression practised under religious terrorism there are infinite degrees and diversities. Spiritual influence may be exercised merely for pecuniary gain, or the coercive power of a religious superior, especially where his disciples are secluded from the outer world, may be used in a more tyrannical manner, and the discipline may involve continual acts of despicable and ingenious cruelty. The Roman Catholic community has an especial interest in seeing that the institution of conventual life is not subjected to any reproach; and that the inmates of religious houses, who are peculiarly at the mercy of their spiritual guardians, do not sustain any illegal treatment."

In an address the other day on the restoration of Chester Cathedral, the Dean, Dr. Howson, after mentioning that the appeal to the diocese had produced £20,000, said:

"With regard to the voluntary principle, the cathedral of Chester was a monument of that principle, as acted upon by Hugh Lupus, when he founded the edifice. Those who talked so much about endowments should not forget that it was entirely to the voluntary principle in the first ages that so much was owing; but if they did not support endowments by voluntary efforts, they were in danger of suffering deterioration, and perhaps this in part had been the case."

In the Jewish Intelligence, Dr. Ewald gives the following case, which may be taken as shewing how strong the feeling against Christianity still is on the part of many of the children of Israel:

"A young Jew came to us one Sunday afternoon, stating that, by reading the Old Testament and the New, he was convinced that Jesus was the Messiah, that he was a native of Poland, and that he would have embraced Christianity nearer home had he not feared that his parents might come and take him away by force. I took him into the Wanderers' Home. One morning he did not make his appearance at the Mission-house for daily instruction; I inquired for him, when the other inmates told me that he had left the house a little before the rest, and that they expected to meet him here. However, the mystery was soon cleared up. The mother of the young Jew had heard in Poland that her son was in Berlin, and about to become a Christian; she at once left her home and went to Berlin in search of her son. Arrived at the capital of Prussia she learned that her son had gone to Hamburg, and to Hamburg she went. But here she was told that her son had sailed for England, and the poor woman followed him to London. A stranger in this great city, she was directed to the members of the society above mentioned. Two of them took her to the vicinity of the Home, and here they watched till the young man left the house, when they laid hold of him and took him away. The young man begged of them to be allowed to return to the house and fetch his little luggage; they would not permit him to do so, fearing that we would detain him by force."

Scotland, which in the late election spoke out so nobly in favour of civil liberty, seems about to make its voice as clearly heard on behalf of the spiritual independence of the Church. At a meeting of the Free Presbytery of Glasgow, Dr. Buchanan made a vigorous assault on the doctrines propounded by Mr. Disraeli and Dean Stanley concerning the relation between Church and State, and set down some of the Dean's statements about the Free Churches of Scotland as "the merest moonshine." The principle on which Dr. Buchanan based his address was that so long as the Royal supremacy in matters spiritual continues to be part and parcel of the law of England, it cannot fail to be a standing menace to the spiritual freedom of all the Churches; and that while it is wrong to subject the State to the Church, as is done in Popish countries, it is equally wrong to subject the Church to the State—the latter being the Erastian principle which underlies the whole English Establishment. Another evil principle, he maintained, which has entered the English Church is that the clergy are the Church, and that no proper place is given to the votes or counsels of the laity. Priestly pretensions were, he feared, the rule rather than the exception with the clergy. From the Evangelical portion of them he looked for no help in contending against Erastianism; for, with one or two brilliant exceptions, it hugged the very chains which bound it to the chariot wheels of the civil power. He then assailed the position taken up by Dr. Begg, and said:

"For Scottish Free Churchmen to be going about buying themselves in upholding the civil establishment of institutions so thoroughly unscriptural in their government, so full of pernicious doctrinal errors, and which hold their establishment on terms so degrading to themselves, and so dishonouring to Christ, is to me utterly incomprehensible. If the mere fact of the State recognition and civil establishment of a Church be a thing so sacred—so essential to the national honouring of God, and to the saving of a people from the sin of national atheism—as to throw everything else into the shade; if, to take for illustration the Irish Church, its State establishment be so immense a blessing as completely to countervail the gross political injustice that Establishment involves—the false and hurtful position in which that Establishment has for centuries placed the Protestant faith before the Irish people—the intolerance of that unscriptural prelatic system which that Establishment upholds—the entire surrender of that Church's spiritual freedom and of the Christian people's spiritual rights and privileges, at the expense of which that Establishment is maintained—if, I say, the mere State establishment of a church be a blessing so inestimable as to cover the multitude of all these sins, then, I would ask the Free Churchman who thinks so to be good enough to explain why he ever left the State-established Church of Scotland? What kind of Free Churchism can that be, which, though it could not endure the half-disguised and diluted Erastianism of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, denounces as a heinous sin, and as an act of national atheism, the disestablishing of an institution characterised by the black prebacy, and by the openly-avowed and double-distilled Erastianism which belong to the Irish Church! Those who play so inconsistent a part may not themselves be able to see it; but surely such Free Churchism must be of that peculiar sort which strains at a gnat and swallows a camel."

The Protestant demonstration, which we referred to last week, came off in the Manchester Free Trade Hall on Monday night; but, "by some blunder," as the chairman said, Mr. Johnstone, M.P., and other leading Orangemen, who had been advertised, were prevented from attending. Mr. Booth Mason, who "had the honour to be the deputy grand master of the Orange Association in England," occupied the chair, and delivered himself in a style which spoke volumes for the kind of training he had received in the Church which he stood forward to defend. After honouring us with his notice, by asserting that "the civil and religious liberties of the people are in danger from a combination of Cardinal Cullen and his associates with the Radicals, the infidels, and the Unitarians," he proceeded thus:

"Mr. Gladstone had been kicked out of Oxford for not being a Churchman, and he had been kicked out of Lancashire for not being a Protestant. The Satanic ambition of the Premier reminded him of the individual of whom Milton said that he 'Would rather reign in hell than serve in heaven.'

A thief was a thief, whether he was prime minister or peer; and the robber and spoliator of the Irish Church must be a thief. Orangemen represented 500,000 men, armed men; for they must remember that the Bill of Rights gave to all Protestants the privilege of bearing arms. Therefore, if Mr. Gladstone wished to spoliator the Irish Church he would have to ask 200,000 armed Irish Orangemen. He would have also to ask a great army of English and Scotch Orangemen; and he would have to ask a vast army in the Canadas; and a vast number in the army and the navy too. If Mr. Gladstone wished to break up the British empire, or if he liked to 'cry havoc, and let loose the dogs of war,' the sooner he started the better."

And semi-reasonable trash like this was received, we are told, with "great cheering." We had well nigh forgotten to mention that Mr. Murphy was present, conspicuous with a broad Orange scarf.

In remarking on a speech of the Bishop of London, at Sion College, the Church News expresses an earnest hope that no Ritualist will leave a stone unturned to give bishops of this sort as much trouble as possible. It says:

"If they give, we will give; if they take, we will take. But we are not going to quietly submit any longer to the orthodox Episcopal bullying of the last twenty years."

At a meeting of the Church Union, on Tuesday, Dr. Pusey read a long paper on the St. Alban's judgment, in which he showed how anomalous it was for the Church to be ruled by judge-made law, and strongly urged that endeavours should be made to get rid of so irresponsible and incompetent a court as the Final Court of Appeal. No dissenting body, he said, would tolerate this kind of thing. True; but no dissenting body is in alliance with the State, and therefore under this kind of subjection.

Prince Albert de Broglie, one of the foremost leaders of the so-called Liberal Catholic party in France, in reviewing M. Guizot's "Meditations on Christianity" in the Revue des Deux Mondes, expresses his regret that so eminent a man should not be a Roman Catholic; but concludes that he is too much of a Frenchman to be a consistent Protestant, and says:—

"It is the misfortune of Protestantism in France always to appear like a foreigner recently naturalised, whose language unconsciously betrays his origin. This is but too easily accounted for by the history of Protestantism and the long prescription to which it has been subjected. The Reformation, born out of France, and imported during a few days only, to be soon after violently expelled, did not thrive long enough on our soil to receive the impress of our national genius. Germany is its native land; it was educated at Geneva, at Edinburgh, at the Hague. The Reformation continues to think and speak like its masters. Everything, therefore, in a book of Protestant piety or Protestant theology surprises the ordinary French reader, the questions discussed as well as the solutions that are proposed and the expressions that are used. These are not the difficulties that trouble us, still less the answers that can satisfy us. We travel through an unknown country with strangers who talk before us of things we do not understand. Even the language Protestantism makes use of is not ours, however correct and elegant it may be. It is always more or less the French of the émigré. Like that of the colonies founded by exiles after the repeal of the Edict of Nantes, it is disfigured either by the uncouth vocabulary of Germanic erudition or the thick intonations of Helvetian French. This want of harmony between a Protestant author and his French reader, this constant offence to French ears, mars the success of the most eminent Protestant writers. Even eloquence as uncommon as that of M. Adolphe Monod has not sufficed to overcome this disadvantage, and to secure to that very orator even an average celebrity. Hence it is that a writer as remarkable as M. Pressénac has not yet all the reputation he deserves. In order to command general attention, Protestant books should not be always replete with allusions to controversies waged beyond the Rhine or on the shores of the Lake of Geneva, of which our public has not even heard the first word. But that is perhaps impossible, for the fate of Protestantism, distracted by a great internal crisis, is now being fought out on three or four battle-fields, none of which are situated in France, and it is natural that those who have entrusted to the Protestant cause their souls and their lives should look beyond our frontiers."

HINDLEY.—The singing class held a tea meeting on Saturday, the 6th inst. After tea, the members of the class and a few friends presented Miss S. A. Hoade with a neatly bound copy of Handel's "Messiah," as a token of their affectionate esteem.

CONVENT LIFE.

THE revelations which during the past fortnight have been made in the Court of Queen's Bench, not by ultra Protestants like Mr. Whalley or Mr. Newdegate, but by devoted Roman Catholics, of the working of conventual life, make us feel more strongly than ever how unnatural it is, and what a narrowing and mischievous effect it is fitted to have upon those who embrace it. One of the vows which the Sister, who was plaintiff in the case, had to take was, that she "would always bear in mind that, by the vow of obedience, she had for ever renounced her own will, and resigned it to the direction of her Superiors;" and that she "was to obey the Mother Superior as holding her authority from God," and "without hesitation, comply with all her directions, whether in matters of great or little moment, agreeable or disagreeable;" and this, though she was one who was capable of subjecting the poor Sister, for the most trivial offences, to a long-continued system of vexatious persecution, which seemed to have its origin in petty spite, rather than in any desire to produce reformation. The case brings to mind what Thackeray says, in his "Irish Sketch Book," after he had been visiting an Ursuline convent, near Cork;

"In the grille is a little wicket and a ledge before it. It is to this wicket that women are brought to kneel; and a bishop is in a chapel on the other side, and takes their hands in his, and receives their vows. I had never seen the like before, and felt a sort of shudder in looking at the place. There rest the girl's knees as she offers herself up, and forswears the sacred affections which God gave her; there she kneels and denies for ever the beautiful duties of her being—no tender maternal yearnings—no gentle attachments are to be had for her or from her—there she kneels and commits suicide upon her heart. O, honest Martin Luther! thank God you came to pull that infernal, wicked, unnatural altar down—that cursed Paganism! I came out of the place quite sick; and looking before me, there, thank God! was the blue spire of Monkstown Church, soaring up into the freesky—a river in front rolling away to the sea—liberty, sunshine, all sorts of glad life and motion, round about; and I couldn't but thank heaven for it, and the Being whose service is freedom, and who has given us affections that we may use them—not smother and kill them; and a noble world to live in, that we may admire it and Him who made it—not shrink from it, as though we dared not live there, but must turn our backs upon it and its bountiful Provider. I declare I think, for my part, that we have as much right to permit Sutteeism in India as to allow women in the United Kingdom to take these wicked vows, or Catholic bishops to receive them."

AMERICAN NOTES.

The American Presbyterian says the Southern pro-rebel students at Princetown are already in open conflict with President McCosh (who, as our readers may remember, went thither a short time since from Belfast), in regard to admitting coloured students to the privileges of the College.

According to the Pall Mall Gazette, the sale of Russian America to the United States has led to a difficulty which may give some little trouble. It appears that under the Russian régime the Esquimaux and other natives of the country who had been "converted" to the orthodox faith, paid a tax for the support of the Russian "popes" who had been sent among them as missionaries. The United States' authorities, on taking possession, declined to collect taxes for the Russian clergy, and the people not being disposed to make any voluntary offerings, the popes were left entirely without resources. They then appealed to the Synod of St. Petersburg, which decided that they should remain under the protection and in the pay of the Russian Government as before, and be subject to the jurisdiction of the Synod. This decision seems to be objected to by the United States' government, which is naturally unwilling to tolerate any "protection" by a foreign Power of persons residing in its dominions, and the organ of the Slavophile party at St. Petersburg are already warmly pleading in favour of their distressed countrymen.

Rev. T. K. Beecher thinks there is but slight difference between Presbyterians and Congregationalists. In one church the ministers and elders meet in presbytery, and have a dull time, and in the other the ministers and delegates meet in association and have a duller time. The Congregationalist reminds Mr. Beecher of another difference—"that the Presbyterians hang such offenders as he with a synodical rope, while Congregationalists give him all the rope he wants, and let him hang himself."

A leading Baptist, writing from Chicago to a friend in this country, who had been favourably impressed by a visit to the States, says:

"There is much to admire in our wide, extended country, and very much that a thoughtful and observant mind would condemn. I am not quite sure that many of the evils we see and lament are not legitimate sequences of our condition as a nation made up so rapidly from every kindred, tongue, and people under heaven; while the mass is fusing and cementing, the foam and dross will rise and be consumed before it can assume a purified form, and made meet for true use and beauty. We have the bigoted and blind-d Romanist, the infidel and free-thinking German, the volatile and worldly Frenchman, millions of benighted Africans, and the prospect now of more millions, by way of the Pacific, of the Pagans and idolaters from 'India's coral strands,' and with these come also some of England's best and purest and also some of her worst. We have likewise from Scotland some of the noblest of them all, and so far as my lifetime observation extends, the Bible-taught Scotch are the best recruits to our growing nation that can be found within her borders. Now, under this state of things, what responsibilities rest upon us, and shall we be able to meet them? I tremble when I feel their weight, and fear for the result; but I am nearly through my work; my years of 'three-score and ten' are almost run, and I can only look and hope for the future."

The Rev. Horatio Wood has resigned the office of Minister at Large in Lowell, which he has held for 24 years, and the duties of which, as the directors testify, he has ably, diligently, and faithfully fulfilled. From the last year's report, to which is added a general review of his labours, and which shows them to have been productive of a large amount of good, we gather that the kind of scenes into which a Minister to the Poor is thrown, and the difficulties with which he has to contend, are very much the same on the other side of the Atlantic as on this. Eighteen hundred and sixty-eight seems to have been not less trying there, in Lowell at least, than here.

"There was a scarcity of employment, and every article of living was at a high rate. Some whole families were without occupation, and others could only snatch a little employment here and there. Tears were shed and hands were wrung that they could not labour, when 'willing, God knew.' Half-nourished faces appealed for food. Scenes of great destitution presented themselves on circuits of observation. To drop in at dinner-time upon a family of grown persons, and find only a small loaf of bread to appease the appetites of six hearty, half-famished labourers, might well move any one to pity and help. To find a worthy poor widow 'out of sewing; with only a last brand for fire, and only a little food, which a neighbour, about as poor as herself, had divided with her, would melt any heart to supply the need."

One of the greatest evils with which the Domestic Missionary has to contend in the States, as in our own country, is the curse of intemperance, and which Mr. Wood believes to be increasing. He says:

"My experience among the poor has made my convictions deeper every year, and my feeling more strong with regard to it. And my parting, most earnest word to the benevolent would be, if you feel for the needy and the suffering,—if you pity the friendless, the fatherless, and the widow,—if you sigh over sin and sorrow,—if you shed tears over ruin,—if you love the brethren and would do good in your day and generation,—then let the cause of temperance be uppermost in your thoughts, enlist your energies, and have your decided countenance; urge it, exemplify it with generous self-denial, and study and watch and pray to have it prevail."

Of the work in which he has been engaged, Mr. Wood, in opposition to those who regard it as an easy matter, requiring only a little judgment, truly says:

"It is a very difficult, complicated, various and comprehensive work. For it is a study of man; of all sorts of disguises, ever taking on new phases; of the passions, appetites and lusts working under veil; of individual susceptibilities and resistances; of paths which lead to causes; of methods of overcoming evil habits, and of over-reaching sinful tendencies; of the influence at command whereby a man may be made a man; of principles whereby he may sail bravely over the sea of his troubles, and run clear of the rocks and quicksands of temptation; of the application of God's truth so as to uphold and save in slippery places. The minister in his study pores over his books and thinks, to prepare himself to teach man. The minister at large pores over the book of life, as the pages are rapidly turning themselves before him in his every-day walk, and he thinks, thinks, and thinks again, as he finds difficulties and intricacies hidden from those who view from a distance. To solve, to grapple, to wrestle successfully, calls for the exercise of the utmost ability."

Mr. Wood may well feel that a full recompense has been obtained for the labour and money spent upon his ministry when he is able to say:

"By it suffering has been relieved, principles worked into life, vice transformed into virtue, idleness become industry, waste supplanted by economy, religion dispensed to hundreds whom it would not otherwise have reached, children saved, young men raised to honour and usefulness, women comforted and upheld, and aged men and women laid tenderly away to everlasting rest."

NURSES FOR THE SICK POOR.

It seems paradoxical, and yet it is true, that one of the most difficult things in the world is—to do good without doing harm. Any one who is familiar with the working of the infinitely varied charitable institutions of our large towns will understand what we mean. It sounds very well to talk of a Christianity that does not go to the poverty-stricken with a bare and barren religious ministration; but those who really try to take them material help constantly find that it is most difficult to do this without weakening that self-reliance and independence which are the only hope for their permanent elevation. Under these circumstances, we imagine many of our readers will be interested in hearing of a work which has been quietly and unostentatiously carried on here and there for some years, and which we believe to be at once singularly helpful to the poor in their sorest straits, and singularly exempt from the drawbacks which accompany most methods of charity.

It is now about a dozen years since the work of FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE aroused a general interest in the whole subject of nursing. One of the forms which that interest took was an effort to help the poor to some better knowledge of how to tend their sick, and to do this not by cut and dried admonitions or directions, but by the skilled and kindly counsel of a well-trained nurse, visiting about in their homes in times of sickness, and herself helping them to do what is needed. Sickness is a hard time among the poor. It is the time when they most need a little extra in the way of food, but yet are least able to procure it. Even if they are able to get the requisite material for the sick-room diet they do not know what to do with it. They have not very sound views of how to live when in health; as to what should be done in sickness their ideas are still more chaotic. Medical men are aware of this, and half of the hopelessness of their work amongst the poor arises from the fact that they know it is utterly useless to give directions either as to treatment or diet.

The plan that has been adopted to meet this difficulty is to divide a town into districts, and in each to place a nurse who has, for a year or two, been passing through a course of training in some of the hospitals in which the nursing is most systematically managed. Each nurse's work is carried on under the direction and supervision of a lady or ladies superintendent; which answers the double purpose of cheering and encouraging the nurse in an arduous work, and giving her the decision of an authority above her own to fall back upon in refusing the often unreasonable applications that are made to her.

This work has for some years been carried out largely in Liverpool, and to a less extent in Manchester and one or two other towns. It is a perfectly unsectarian work, though single congregations often undertake to support a district. And we believe that the universal testimony of those who have watched its actual working is to the very great good which it accomplishes. The writer has himself been for several years intimately connected with the working of one of these districts in a dense poor quarter of a large town, and has witnessed in many cases its peculiar usefulness. There is probably no form of help which is so free from liability to imposture. The nurse, in her constant going in and out amongst the homes of the poor, soon discovers the true character of those she visits; moreover, there are no times in which help can be given with so little risk of destroying independence as those of sickness. It is the attempt to supplement the ordinary income in ordinary times that saps the self-reliance of the needy; but when one of the household is struck down by sickness, the personal giving in the home itself of such help, in kind advice and firm, skilful tending, with now and then some of those medical comforts which it is impossible for the poor to get for themselves, not only touches the heart with a sense of being mercifully cared for, but often restores the bread-winner of the family to his work, weeks, and sometimes months before he would otherwise be strong—in many cases even saving life—and so preventing the struggling and deserving poor from having to come upon the parish. And there is a simplicity about the whole plan which impresses us in its favour. There is none of the fussiness which disfigures much of the charity of the day. These nurses have no uniform, they go in no religious character. We have heard of a patient in one of those London hospitals which are under the care of a Protestant sisterhood, who complained ruefully that she got three prayers for one poultice. There is no such danger in this work, however. Yet the nurse, as she goes in and out among the sick people of her district, is often able incidentally to be a help to soul as well as body. Many a time she is asked to get some minister to call and see the people. Many a time, too, as they are getting better, she is able to put in a word for sobriety and cleanliness, and more careful, provident habits. And she is perhaps able to do this almost the more effectually because she does not do it professionally, but only from the human sympathy and in the friendly intercourse that grows naturally out of her unobtrusive work of simple healing.

It is not the least noteworthy feature of the plan that it presents one of those openings for the useful occupation of women, for which of late years so many people have been casting about. This is no work to be taken up for a morsel of bread, or done as a menial office. It is a work for which, indeed, the humblest, with the requisite natural aptitude, may be trained, but it is also a work which has in its scope for the highest culture and the purest Christian heroism; and to be done efficiently, either by the educated or the lowly, it must be taken up in the true ministering spirit of one going about doing good, and glad to spend and be spent in the service of the suffering and the poor. We can think of no nobler task to which any woman of the middle class could devote herself, who has no special home cares to occupy her, and who desires some interest and pursuit in life, perhaps is even obliged to seek some occupation for the means of living. It is a true, beautiful womanly work; a work of ever deepening interest; a work crowded with opportunities of most blessed help to those who most need help; a work in which any Christian woman might be glad and thankful to live, and, if so were God's will, proud to die.

HELP FOR DUNDEE.

WE wish to put in a word on behalf of an appeal, which many of our readers will have received privately, and which all will have seen in our columns, for assistance towards the building of a chapel at Dundee. This congregation, formed only a few years ago, has been steadily increasing under the ministry of the Rev. HENRY WILLIAMSON, until it is necessary that it should be in a home of its own. Those who know how hard it is for Unitarianism to make open way in Scotland, can appreciate the efforts that have gradually won a strong foothold for it in this great and increasing manufacturing town, and we feel very strongly that those efforts have fairly earned the right to ask help of our congregations in England. Our churches in Scotland are very few, and cannot be expected to carry through a work of this kind without aid, and we hope that our English readers will not wait for special personal applications, but send the friends at Dundee such liberal and ready help as may enable them to build a good substantial church.

OPEN CHURCH PAPERS.

By BROOKE HERFORD.

VII. THE METHOD OF THE OFFERTORY.

In the last paper I tried to set forth the principle of the offertory—the association of sacrifice with worship. I showed how the natural and almost universal idea has been to connect the offering of worship with the offering of a portion of one's substance. The modern plan of pew rents and annual subscriptions leaves the contributing of what is needed for the support of the church's worship and work to find what place it can among the quarter's and half-year's bills, and with all but very well-to-do people it must be only a poor, inadequate place it finds there. In the offertory we restore it to its true place among the other acts of worship, asking people to do it as an act of sacrifice, leaving every man to do what in his heart he is willing to do.

The moment this is appreciated, it will be understood why we have the offertory as an actual part of the service. With us at Strangeways, and in most of the congregations where the offertory is adopted, the plan pursued is this. At the close of the sermon a voluntary is played, and the offertory bags—neat cloth bags into which the money falls almost noiselessly—are handed round, the collectors giving them to the person at the end of each seat, by whom they are handed on, and so passed from one to another. No one can see what another gives, the whole thing is done very quietly, occupying from two to three minutes, and then the service closes with hymn and prayer, as usual.

Some people say, "why not postpone it to a box at the doors?" Precisely because our very object is to associate it as closely as possible with the worship, to make it a part of, not merely an accompaniment of, the service. We don't want it thrust outside the sacred time, as if it were a little business detail of which we were half ashamed. Let it indeed be done as quietly as possible; let care be taken to avoid all needless noise, not because we want to have the offertory as though we had it not, but simply for the same reason as we dislike to hear the rattle of the organ keys, or the wheezing of the bellows; all should go smoothly and quietly through the offertory as through any other part of the service. It seems the fittest thing that the time during which the Offertory takes place should be a little space for silent thought and devotion, and that the offering itself should be given with a few words uttered in one's own heart, a momentary prayer of consecration, such, for instance, as I imagine comes natural to most people on receiving the bread and wine at the Communion. I am aware that there is this drawback, that until all people come to have this deeper feeling about the offertory there will always be some who will merely act as if it were not a part of, but an interval in, the service. So they will be likely to spend that interval in looking about them. But then the offertory only shares in this liability along with other universally acknowledged parts of the service. There are some people who merely look about them even during the prayer, and many who, under cover of the hymns, engage in a little occasional conversation. It will not be in a day or a year that society will recover the old feeling which constitutes the real difference between supporting a religious institution as a matter of business, and giving an offering of one's substance as a part of one's religious worship. But I believe that the old feeling may be brought back, and that in proportion as it is recovered our whole church life will be strengthened and enhanced.

And in what has been said lies the real answer to all objections founded on the feeling that there is a sort of mild compulsion practised in passing the offertory bag from hand to hand during the service. That collections taken during the service often have infused into them a certain element of compulsion is quite true, but it is by collecting on open plates and other similar devices for making the amount of the gift as public and conspicuous as possible. But wherever the offertory has been adopted, both in our own and other religious bodies, universally, as far as I know, there has been a careful endeavour to make it as private and secret as possible. The "box-at-the-door" plan is an utter failure and delusion, not because it fails to compel people to give, but because it does not put the matter fairly before them. People are busied with something else as they are going into, or coming out of a place of worship. They forget it till they are close upon the box, and then they have their children by the hand, or they do not like to stop to get their money out, and they think, "Oh, it will do next time," and so pass on, and next time it is very likely forgotten again. It is not that they want compelling; it is that they want the matter put fairly before them, and putting before them as a part of their worship, and that, like the other acts of a congregation's common religious service, it is best done by all together, at a time set apart for it.

It is as absurd to talk of any moral compulsion being exercised in this way, and of its being a throwing overboard of the professed spirit of free will offerings, as it would be to talk of its being moral compulsion to prayer, or a violation of spiritual liberty on the subject of singing, for the minister to say, "let us pray," or to give out a hymn. To a Quaker who comes in to our worship, even these things seem to have something of moral compulsion in them. Our answer is, "We are agreed in regarding prayer and singing as a fitting part of our regular worship, and therefore we arrange for it accordingly." And the same answer holds good for the offertory. "Giving, also, is a fitting and worthy element in religious service. It seems to us as appropriate as the hymn or the prayer. We believe it is as acceptable to God, if done in a truly reverent spirit, the spirit of people offering their best for His work and service. We therefore arrange our service so that an offertory shall be an integral and essential part of it." And I can only say that our experience at Strangeways is that after people have got over the first strangeness of it they like it. Perhaps there are none who like it so much as the poor and the children; just because, while they have as much pleasure in giving according to their ability as others, the offertory for the first time enables them to do so without painful pressure, and without any wounding of their self-respect by bringing their lesser contributions into open contrast with those of others.

A STATESMAN'S PRAYER.

THE following prayer, which was found in the private drawer of Sir Robert Peel's dressing-case, after his death, might well be made their own by others in a like position at present:—

"Great and merciful God, Ruler of all nations, help me daily to repair to Thee for wisdom and grace suitable to the high office whereto Thy Providence has called me. Strengthen, O Lord! my natural powers and faculties, that the weighty and solemn interests with which Thy servant is charged may not greatly suffer through weakness of body, and confusion of mind. Deign, I beseech Thee, to obviate or correct the ill effects of such omissions or mistakes in my proceedings as may result from partial knowledge, infirmity of judgment, or unfaithfulness in any with whom I may have to do. Let Thy blessing rest upon my sovereign and my country. Dispose the hearts of all in high stations to adopt such measures as will preserve public order, foster industry, and alleviate distress. May true religion flourish, and peace be universal. Grant that, so far as may consist with human weakness, whatever is proposed by myself or others for the general good may be viewed with candour, and that all wise and useful measures may be conducted to a prosperous issue. As for me, Thy servant, grant, O merciful God! that I may not be so engrossed with public anxieties as that Thy word should become unfruitful in me, or be so moved by difficulty or opposition as not to pursue the narrow way which leadeth unto life. And O, most gracious Father! if, notwithstanding my present desires and purposes, I should forget Thee, do not Thou forget me, seeing that I entreat Thy constant remembrance and favour only for the sake of our most blessed Advocate and Redeemer, Jesus Christ, to whom with Thee and the Holy Spirit be glory for ever. Amen."

A CLERGYMAN'S INVITATION.

DR. MILLER, of Greenwich, lately put forth the following earnest invitation to those of his parishioners, more especially among the working classes and the poor, who seldom or never attend public worship:—

"It would be easy for me to write to you coarsely; to treat you as big children; and to flatter you. It would be easy to write to you scoldingly; to rate you and rail at you, as if well nigh all the wickedness in Greenwich and throughout the kingdom, was among the wage-paid classes and the poor. I will write neither coarsely nor scoldingly, but as a man to men. Why write at all? Because I have a heavy responsibility. I cannot be rid of it. I may forget it, or trifle with it; but I cannot be rid of it. God has put me, among others, here, as a shepherd and a watchman over souls. It is not enough that a shepherd feed the sheep which are safe in the fold. If there be any sheep astray, he must go after them and find them. The watchman must give warning of danger. I am responsible not merely for giving relief tickets to the poor; nor for keeping up schools for your children. Not merely for marrying, and churching, and baptizing, and burying. But, first of all and above all, for seeking to save your souls; to get you ready for death, for judgment, and for eternity. I am responsible for this—that every man, woman, and child, in this parish, should hear the good news of God's love—that your Father in heaven has no pleasure in your death—that He has given His Son to die for you, and is willing to give His good Spirit to them that ask Him—that He warns you to flee from His wrath, to break off from sin—quarrelling, foul words and deeds, drunkenness, swearing and cursing; that He now offers you a free and full pardon for the biggest and blackest sins; that He invites you to Himself and to a blessed home of rest and peace and joy, where the din of this world's strifes shall not be heard, nor its sins nor its sorrows felt, nor its tears shed.

"O sirs, we have many things—great things—glorious things—to say to you. Good news indeed! Good for you, while you live and toil and suffer. Good for you, when you come to die. Good for you, when you pass into your Maker's presence. Good for you, when you stand before His bar of judgment. But, Sunday after Sunday, your place in Church is empty. Many, thank God! come. But not you. You are neither at God's house; nor at God's table; nor at the schoolroom lecture; nor at the Bible-class. We long to see you. Why will ye not come? Be honest. Deal truly with yourselves. Don't cast about for some fault to find with the parsons. You cannot say that the parsons of Greenwich don't care for you. You won't say it. Your wives know better. Your children know better. You know better. I am not your enemy because I tell you the truth. You are careless. You put off your soul's business. Too many of you are slaves to drink.

"We know that it is sometimes said that the sermons are so dull that people don't care to sit them out. But, first, there is the duty and the privilege of the public worship of Almighty God. And, as thousands of men in Greenwich—and very many thousands elsewhere—do come and listen thoughtfully, often with rivetted attention, and with profit,—many of them men of powerful intellect, and of education,—what is worth their hearing—and what multitudes of them hear with pleasure and gratitude—cannot be unworthy of your attention. The truths which we preach come home, they tell us, to their business and bosoms: why should they not to yours? Let me then, with very earnest entreaty, beseech you to come to our special services, arranged on purpose for you, in the parish church."

ROBERTSONIANISM.

In the Revue Chretienne, the editor, Dr. E. de Presensé, has three essays on F. W. Robertson and M. Verny, whom he regards as his counterpart in the French Church, the conclusion of which we give:—

"Verny and Robertson have, each with his own individuality, shown us how much the labour of great minds, even in the bosom of steadfast faith in Christ, is deep, vast, and sad in the present day! Since they have left the world this labour is far from having been relaxed. We well know how it is in France. England is neither less affected nor less disturbed; witness the Catholic reaction, and the development of the bold, stoical Christianity of which 'Ecce Homo' is the highest and most brilliant manifestation. It would be puerile to ignore that which constitutes the special danger of the tendencies of the present day,—the insufficiency of all the orthodox beliefs. We can only come to one conclusion, and that is the necessity of following with faith and freedom the development of our theology. All those who have obtained for themselves the answer to the question, What must I do to be saved? and who live a life in Christ, have found a safe harbour. But they ought not to go to sleep; they should unite to bestow religious knowledge and peace to all sincere seekers. They should at once give way to the legitimate requirement of connecting more clearly the element of religion with moral science. It is only in this manner that we may avoid those distortions which are the symptoms of disorder. We believe that we also have a Church of the future which, the reverse of old Rome, shall recruit itself from all the good elements of all existing churches; which shall give us worship without idolatry, the most practical morality, and the most accurate teaching, without dullness. This will be a meeting on the same level of pilgrims who have hitherto pursued different paths. Doubtless behind the platform another higher stile will be discovered, and so in succession until we have reached that glorious eminence where we shall know even as we are known, amidst the splendours of triumphant love. Present pursuits will inaugurate one of those great fusions which are born only in the sphere of active religious thought. This is the law of our history. We do not complain of it, for, after all, we only seek to explain more clearly to ourselves that which we know and have already. He who possesses Christ has all things. We do not underestimate the troubles of these transitive periods. I cannot finish better than by quoting a sentence from that generous Lèbre, whose death suggested such eloquent words to Verny. It is nearly a quarter of a century since these words, hitherto unpublished, were written, but they are as appropriate to-day as ever:—"They who work for the future should seek solitude, as did the prophets of former times, but, after their example also, they should fill it with their prayers, and hold themselves in restraint in God's presence; they should ask for help for themselves and for the outlying world with fervour and lowliness."

MR. BEECHER AND MR. SPURGEON.

In the Central Baptist, an American publication Dr. Burlingham thus sketches these two famous preachers:

"Mr. Spurgeon never studies, as the term study is generally understood. He takes a text in his hand, and if it cracks open at once, he preaches what it reveals; if it remains sealed, and his mind does not take to it, he drops it for the time being and selects another. He never doggedly lugs and tugs over a subject just for the purpose of making a sermon from it. One of his finest points as a preacher is the ease and naturalness with which he makes sermons. In this he has positive genius. His sermons are very simple; a child can understand them. His method is generally textual. Nothing in a text escapes him. If he sometimes carries analogies farther than a fair interpretation warrants, he always does good, even in this, for he never allows his fancies to lead him into the merely speculative and the useless. He never elaborates his discourses as to style. They are neither written nor wrought out mentally as to language. They are delivered naturally and with unabated fluency. His voice is full and even in its volume. He makes his points with consummate tact and aptness. He has no clap-trap, not a particle of it. He resorts to no rhetorical artifice. He has no mannerism. He is straightforward, earnest and manly in his way of preaching. He never whines, and never affects emotion. He never uses a crying voice. You feel that in all he says his purpose is to do you good. He aims at your religious nature always. With such powers of sermonizing, such ability to make the desired point—to aim right and to hit right—such power of extemporaneous utterance, such simplicity of style, and such a ringing and effective voice, and with all these resources added to by the most perfect self-control and by an unconquerable earnestness of purpose to do good by meeting the wants of our religious nature, Mr. Spurgeon cannot fail of permanently wielding the mighty power he does in the modern pulpit."

Describing the American preacher, Dr. Burlingham says:

"Mr. Beecher does not try to appear learned and profound. He studies, but does not plod. He reads, observes, thinks for the purpose of keeping his mind full, not of exhausting it upon any one subject or line of investigation. Every thing that goes into his mind by eye and ear, as well as from reflection and books, let it pertain to theology, religion, politics, society, nature, industry, commerce, poetry, or philosophy, comes out at his bidding in a sermon. His mind readily transmutates into available material for his purpose whatever it touches. You never heard Mr. Beecher speak without being impressed with the exhaustlessness of his resources. He is many-sided, or capable of taking views from all sides of a truth. He is bold enough and great enough not to trouble himself about appearing consistent when he is presenting one phase of any great subject. He does not stop to make what he is saying tally with everything else he ever said upon some other side of the same subject, nor to make it comport with some given theory. With all his brilliancy, he is free from flippancy and smartness. His spirit and purpose are always sober and earnest in discourse. While possessed of great power in extemporaneous speech, he generally writes his sermons. His most striking and eloquent passages in delivery, however, are unwritten. When he leaves his manuscript for the time, and stands aside from his desk, then he warned of the coming torrent. If these two greatest of living preachers would exchange pulpits for a few months, the good people of both countries would be gratified by such an example of international Christian courtesy."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

AT LAST.

(ALTERED FROM THE GERMAN.)

THE old king lay a-dying, then summoned he his son;
His hand, while fondly clasping, he pointed to the throne:
"My son"—the voice was trembling—"my son, this throne is thine!
But, with my crown forget not these farewell words of mine:
To thee the earth appeareth a home of joy and mirth,
But, oh! my son, this is not so; learn soon its real worth!
For one drop of pure happiness, of sorrow thousands flow,
And though in joy we sometimes reap, in tears we mostly sow."
The king's last words were spoken. The son regarded not;
In May light smiled the earth on him, how happy was his lot!
With joyful brow the throne he mounts, and all the world shall see,
Despite his father's gloomy fears, how happy he will be.
Upon his turret roof he hangs, that all may plainly hear,
A little bell, whose silver tones shall echo far and clear;
The silken cord he'll stoutly pull whene'er, with true joy blest,
His heart o'erflows;—he fondly trusts the bell will seldom rest.
And day by day advances, bathed in clear rosy light,
But evening's shade approaches, and none was happy quite;
With longing hand he reaches oft towards the silken string,
But, stay! some memory fills his soul—the clear tone does not ring.
Once, brimming o'er with Friendship's joys, he steps before the bell,
"My happiness, my bliss," cried he, "to all the world I'll tell!"
Alas! a messenger stands there, and with sad looks speaks he:
"Betrayed art thou, oh king, by him thou lov'd'st so tenderly!"
But has he not his infant son, with bright and laughing eye,
"The bell my happiness shall ring," spoke he right merrily;
But in that hour God's angel comes, and raises, all in love,
The parent's joy from earthly ills to heavenly arms above.
Still the brave king despairs not; there stretches his fair land,
And treasures of great worth within his strong and mighty hand;
Green meadows teeming rich, and ripe corn standing high,
And willing hands to labour, and o'er all God's fair eky.
He stands before his window and gazes long around,
While smiling cot and mansion his happiness resound;
He hurries to the little bell with joyful step, but see!
They rush into his presence and fall upon the knee,

"O, king! the foe's at hand! to the window once again!
 See'st thou the valley filled with smoke, our peaceful homes in flames!"
 With glowing cheek the king must seize the sword, and not the bell, Alas! and shall its silver tongue his happiness e'er tell?
 His hair is silvering fast; not once the joyous sound
 He thought in youth so oft to hear, has echoed far around;
 And if sometimes a happy thought illumines that patient brow,
 The little bell—the silent bell—is nigh forgotten now.
 Before the window sitting, the dying monarch hears Voices and sighs low mingling with sobs and choking tears:
 "What means this," asked he feebly: "why grieve thee in my land?"
 "Oh, sire, the father's dying! below the children stand!"
 "Let all my children enter. And do they then love me?"
 "To save thy life they'd yield their own, oh, king, how readily!"
 Then poured with hasty steps the crowd into the quiet room,
 To see the king, to touch his hand, all longingly they come.
 "You love me, then, my children?" From thousand voices—"Yes!"
 The monarch's face bright blushes, it beams with happiness;
 He looks to heaven,—he rises,—the bell hangs o'er his head,
 One pull he gives—it rings out clear—the king falls smiling dead!

EASTER ISLAND.

An officer cruising in the South Pacific gives an interesting account, which we present a little abridged, of this island and its inhabitants, mentioned by Captain Cook.

This island (in lat. 27.10, lon. 109.30) is one of the most curious in the Pacific, and is, I believe, with the exception of Pitcairn Island, 1,500 miles from any inhabited land. It is about thirteen miles by ten in its widest part, and is exceedingly volcanic. It contains a great number of craters; one of them is a splendid specimen, fully 600 feet in depth, and the width at the bottom about 4,000 feet. The view of the interior is very grand, one side being open towards the sea in a perfect semicircle. The place has hardly been visited by Europeans since Captain Cook spoke of it, and as he was ill during his visit, the account given by him was meagre. The people had a bad reputation for cannibalism, and this caused traders, and even whalers, to give them a wide berth. The inhabitants now number about 900, but they are fast dying out of consumption, and want of proper food; in fact, they are not very far from starvation. About four years ago some Peruvian ships came and kidnapped 1,800 of them, and this in a great measure accounts for their wretched condition, as the children, women, &c., left could not cultivate the land even in the slight degree which the men are able to do. Two of the kidnappers were afterwards caught by some of the people, who made short work of them; in fact, killed and ate them up. These islanders speak almost the same language as the Marquesans, but are as a rule much less robust. The old men are apparently much the strongest, some of them being powerful-looking fellows.

Captain Cook alludes to the large stone images he saw here. Bearing this in mind, we organized a search, and met with great success. We found at least 150, and no doubt there are many more. Some of them are enormous, over 30 feet high by 9 wide. I saw one 22 feet long and 14 wide. They appear to have been cut or carved with stone chisels, and are believed to be the work of a former race, now perhaps extinct. At any rate, it is strange to find such remains on an island so entirely isolated, inhabited only by savages, apparently quite unable to conceive the idea of making anything of the sort. Most of these images have been thrown down on their faces, and so remain; but in the side of the crater of a large volcano at the far end of the island there are sixteen, all standing upright; outside the crater there are also a number of others all in the same position. This desolate crater, guarded as it were within and without by these hideous, still stone men, is a spectacle almost worth the voyage. It is clear that once the place must have been densely populated, because some of these images weigh between twenty and thirty tons, and, besides the quantity of work in carving them, it must have been immense labor and have required great strength to carry them for miles over a rugged and difficult country, and rear them upright where they stand. Perhaps at one time they may have had a king or chief who employed his people thus in order to prevent them fighting and eating each other. We found the islanders, however, gentle and honest, and to all appearance much pleased to see us. But there are three Catholic priests settled here, two Frenchmen and a Prussian, who must have done a world of good, and have certainly got the people quite under control. They have taken their spears and clubs from them, but find them lazy and unwilling to work at cultivating the ground. They are in great fear and awe of the priests, which is, perhaps, necessary to their safety, as these savages are born cannibals, and there is no saying when their horrid instinct may not break out. The first priest came alone, about three years ago. As soon as he landed he was robbed, and was to have been killed and eaten, but the chief interfered and chose to have him for his slave. For some time he worked in that capacity, and more than once his life was attempted, but he always managed to escape. The next who came was the senior priest, a Frenchman, a most resolute-looking man, with a very powerful and determined cast of physiognomy. The moment he landed they crowded down and endeavored to stone him, but he got near them and struck the first fellow he came across such a blow with his walking staff as to stun him on the spot, then walked unmolested through the crowd of swarming savages now thoroughly cowed, and since that he has never but once been molested, but has them well in hand on the whole. Of course the first thing he did was to procure the liberation of the other priest, and the two have impressed on the minds of the people the idea that if they kill and eat either one or the other a ship will come and destroy them. These poor missionaries must lead a hard and trying life, and certainly exhibit great bravery and devotion to their religion. There is no society in France which acts as the English do to their missionaries, and no one sends them comforts, or food, or clothing. We did all we could for them, for which they appeared most grateful, and were thankful to have the opportunity of writing to their friends by us.

All the trees in the island are destroyed; one war party would burn the trees belonging to the other, this retaliated in kind, and they slew and devoured all prisoners. The priests say they were much more numerous at one time, but are dying out fast, and at the present rate cannot last long. They are forbidden by the missionaries to practice spear-throwing in order to prevent fighting and butchery, but when we were away from the village with some of them we cut them some sticks badly balanced and not very straight, and they threw them with wonderful skill and strength. I never before knew how dangerous a weapon a spear could be, but these people so armed would be formidable adversaries; they cast them almost underhanded, with the hand below the level of the shoulder, and even with these sticks could strike an object with great force and accuracy up to seventy yards at the least; with a good spear of course they could do much more, in fact they quite astonished us. It appears they used to tip their spears with sharp-pointed pieces of volcanic darts or bolts.

Their houses are built to this day exactly as Captain Cook describes them; the shape is like a boat turned over, keel uppermost, with a small square hole at the side for the door, through which a man can just crawl, and the entire fabric is composed of coarse reeds. At the top of the crater, almost on the edge of the cliff, there are a lot of curious stone huts, about five feet high inside, and some of them fifteen feet long. The entrance is through the wall, which is about seven feet thick, so it is a long narrow hole to crawl through in order to get within.

The islanders themselves say that their ancestors came over here in canoes. They have a tradition that the first king, Toko, came from the island of Little Rappa, where the New Zealand steamers stop, and the first land they came to was this island. Finding it larger than the one they had left, they called it Rappa-mie, which means Big Rappa. King Toko, as soon as he landed, began to carve the images; and when he had finished his work, the statues all walked down and placed themselves in the position they now occupy. After this he turned into a butterfly, and the children, even now, when they chase a butterfly, say they are chasing King Toko. The stone huts at the top of the crater are stated to have been constructed for the special use of Toko, and an image we have brought on board was found in one of them. We had to dig it out, for it was sunk so far into the ground that only the head and shoulders were visible. They say the way they chose their kings was this: The man who could in a given time produce the greatest number of sea-birds' eggs was made king, on account of his superior courage and activity. Even now the natives are fond of going over the cliff in search of eggs, and many lose their lives in this amusement, for the sides are rugged and precipitous, and are in some places near 1,000 feet in height. We found the climate warm but very healthy.

A PAPAL JOKE.

The Pope's sense of humour is proverbial in Rome, and he gave a good example of it the other day to the Corporation of bakers, who asked an audience of him, in order to remonstrate against the new and excellent public oven established by Colonel Blumenthul, and which supplies far better bread on much lower terms to the people, being made by machinery, and of corn bought wholesale, and sold honestly. This interference with the dishonest gains of the Roman bakers, who have long enjoyed a monopoly, was of course, although a great popular benefit, a grievous injury in their eyes. "Holy Father," said the spokesman, "it is very hard on us; we have worked so long for the public benefit." ("Abbiamo tanto faticato per il bene pubblico.") "E troppo vero, figlio mio," replied the Pope. "Adesso è tempo che si repose un po', e lasciare faticare gli altri." ("It is quite true, my son. It is high time you rested a little, and let other people work.")

ODD FULFILMENT OF A PROPHECY.

THAT the Primate is a Scotchman has come to be talked and written about in connection with a curious ancient prophecy. In an epilogue delivered at the Globe Theatre in 1601, by Richard Burbage, there occurred the following sentences:

A Scot our King? The limping state
 That day must need a crutch.
 What next? In time a Scot will prate
 As Primate of our church.

When such shall be, why then you'll see
 That day it will be found

The Saxon down through London town
 Shall burrow under ground.

Has it not come true? Dr. Tait is Archbishop of Canterbury, and we travel about London underground.

WHILE THEY ARE STILL WITH US.

"Oh, while my brother with me stayed,
 Would I had loved him more."

THIS was the cry of the little child, and is it not the heart's cry of most of us when a dear one is gone to return again no more? How many things we said and did, unheedingly at the time, that we would now gladly unsay, undo—little things, perhaps, but now seen as in a microscope: irritable expressions, careless words, shortcomings of affection. Memory brings back all with terrible distinctness, stinging the conscience and wounding the soul with those bitter words, "too late." Well do we know, were it possible we could look upon that dear face, how it would beam with love and forgiveness, but this does not lessen our pain; we cannot forgive ourselves. No, we have sinned and must suffer. But surely, if we reflected more frequently that the time would inevitably come when our friends must leave us or we leave them, for "Friend after friend departs—

 Who hath not lost a friend?
 There is no union here of hearts
 That finds not here an end."

surely it would assist us to battle more successfully with our failings in our intercourse with them; the sharp word would be kept back, the frown would be checked, little kindnesses more freely rendered, small selfishnesses of daily life lessened; home would rejoice in a brighter sunlight, and when the time of separation came, the sorrow, hard enough to bear, would not be increased and darkened by a vain remorse.

INTELLIGENCE.

ACCRINGTON.—A very interesting gathering of about 70 of the old scholars took place on Saturday the 13th inst., Mr. Edmund Coleman in the chair. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. Mills, Noble (jun.), and Herd. A rather novel, but not unfitting part of the proceedings, was the baptism of a child whose parents had been taught in the Sunday school. The remainder of the evening was spent in amusements of various kinds.

BANBRIDGE.—The Rev. R. A. Armstrong having, in consequence of his appointment to a Hibbert Fellowship, resigned the pastorate of the Second Unitarian congregation of Banbridge, a number of his late hearers and other friends assembled in the meeting-house of the second congregation on Tuesday, the 2nd of February, to present him with a slight token of their respect and esteem previous to his departure from among them. On the motion of Gilbert Mulligan, Esq., Park Mount, seconded by Robert McClelland, Esq., Belmont, the Rev. Francis M. Cammon took the chair, and after a few remarks, expressive of his great regret that Mr. Armstrong was about to leave the neighbourhood, and of the high estimation in which he was held by all who had the privilege of his acquaintance, the chairman presented to Mr. Armstrong a purse containing fifty sovereigns, the contributions of some members of the two Unitarian congregations, and other friends, accompanied by an affectionate farewell address. Mr. Armstrong returned his hearty thanks to his friends for this substantial token of their regard and esteem; assured them that he would ever remember his short sojourn in Ireland, and the friendships he had formed there; and concluded by expressing a hope that the cordiality and good feeling which existed between the first and the second congregation would long continue.

GLOUCESTER.—A social meeting of the Unitarian congregation was held in the school-room on Thursday evening week. Many friends from Cheltenham were present, who contributed greatly to the evening's enjoyment. The Rev. J. G. Teggan, the pastor, presided, and after tea, numerous songs and recitations were efficiently given. Prior to these, Miss Millard, in the absence of her mother, who was unavoidably prevented attending on this occasion, presented to the minister a handsome black silk gown, which had been bought by the ladies of the congregation, thirty of whom had signed an affectionate address to him. Mr. Teggin returned thanks to the ladies for their kind and seasonable present, and expressed an earnest hope that as he had during the last thirteen years worn out one clerical garment in their service, he might be spared to wear the one now so kindly bestowed upon him for several coming years.

LONDON: STAMFORD-STREET.—The congregation met on Sunday last, and agreed to send petitions to Parliament in favour of the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. That to the House of Commons was drawn up, and signed after morning and evening service, and has been sent to Mr. Layard for presentation; that to the Lords is to be sent about the time when the bill for disestablishment shall reach that House. The petition was as follows:

"The Humble Petition of the undersigned Congregation of Protestant Dissenters, meeting for worship in Stamford-street Chapel, in the borough of South-west."

"Sheweth—That your petitioners believe that the larger part of the inhabitants of Ireland have a just cause of complaint that the religion of a small minority should be established by law and endowed with national property and privileges."

"That your petitioners hear with pleasure that it is proposed by Her Majesty's Ministers to remove the injustice by disestablishing and disendowing the Irish branch of the Church of England, and also by withdrawing the partial endowments at present granted to the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians in Ireland;

"And your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable House will be pleased to remove the Irish grievance by establishing perfect religious equality in that part of the kingdom."

"And your petitioners will ever pray."

MONTROSE.—If those persons who think the work of the Unitarian Missionary is unnecessary could have been present at the Rev. H. Williamson's lecture last Monday night they would perhaps have been convinced to the contrary. The hall was packed with people. Tracts were taken with the greatest readiness. But such was the disturbance caused by persons who could not get inside the hall that it was found impossible to carry on a discussion at the close of the lecture. It is to be hoped that a larger hall will be secured for the missionary's next lecture.

NANTWICH.—On Monday last, a tea party was held in connection with the chapel, Hospital-street, for the purpose of welcoming the Rev. Jas. Macdonald on his entering upon his duties as the minister. The attendance was good, and consisted to a considerable extent of persons unconnected with the congregation. Mr. P. Barker represented the congregation in giving expression to the feelings of delight afforded them by Mr. Macdonald's settlement, hoping he may labour long and successfully amongst them. Mr. Macdonald responded in a warm and hopeful spirit; the remainder of the evening being spent in readings, &c. Notwithstanding the congregation has been dependent for nearly twelve months upon supplies, the seatholders have not diminished but slightly increased, and their prospects for the future are cheerful.

PARK LANE, NEAR WIGAN.—On New Year's Day, the annual tea party of the congregation at this place, was held in the schoolroom adjoining the chapel. There was a large attendance. David Shaw, Esq., was in the chair, and addresses were given by the Rev. Geo. Fox and Mr. W. Baker. On January 26th, the first of a series of six penny readings was given. The attendance was good and the entertainment pleasing. On Shrove Tuesday, a tea meeting, got up by the teachers, was held in the schoolroom. David Shaw, Esq., in the chair. The most interesting event of the evening was the presentation of a very handsome timepiece to Mr. W. Baker, superintendent of the boys' school, by the teachers in it, accompanied with a photograph of the teachers in a group, as a testimonial of their respect. The presentation was made in affecting and eloquent terms by Mr. Shaw, who highly eulogised the zeal and amiability of Mr. Baker.

PERTH.—Lectures in this room were given upon some time ago, because the Guildhall had been refused to the local committee. Arrangements were made for another hall, and Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee, lectured on the 10th inst. to an audience of about 100 persons, who appeared deeply interested. It is hoped that the lectures may be given now regularly.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. E.—Hayes is the publisher.

E. S.—We are obliged for your suggestions. In regard to the first, opinion, as well as experience, shows that the effect would be the reverse of what you suppose; and the second is impracticable.

We have received several letters on the subject of the Open Church Papers. We think, however, that it will be better to let the series be completed, and the case fairly stated to the end without interruption. We shall then be willing to admit letters on the subject.

THE RULE OF FAITH IN INDEPENDENT CHURCHES.

A second letter on this subject appeared in the York Herald of Saturday last. We reprint it, as a fitting sequel to the one we have already published. The subject is important, and it is desirable that it should not be lost sight of. "Mr. Teesdale," it may be premised, is an Independent minister at Market Weighton:

To the Editors.—The reply of Mr. Teesdale to my former letter on this subject appears substantially to admit the justice of the objection which I took the liberty of making to his statement. It is clear that the Bible cannot be said to be the only rule of faith in churches which use the model deed, or any deed like it, and which provide, with legal exactness, that no one shall be their stated minister who does not hold, teach, and preach "the doctrines contained in the annexed schedule." The Rule of Faith, in such cases, is the schedule of doctrines, not the Bible.

Mr. Teesdale, however, urges that this restrictive form of deed has not been followed for any great length of time. In this, I imagine, he is not well informed. I quoted from the deed of 1865, thinking it but fair to refer to the latest form of the document. But there was an earlier one, containing eight articles of faith, and equally stringent. How many years previously this may have been in use I do not know, but I have seen a reference to such a deed as in existence so long ago as 1856. Length of time, however, can make little difference in a matter of principle. The question still is, can a denomination which binds its ministers to "hold, teach, and preach" according to a schedule of doctrines, drawn up by fallible men, be said to have no rule of faith but the Bible?

Admitting, however, as he virtually does, that this question must be answered in the negative, Mr. Teesdale goes on, as might be expected, to defend the course so pursued. He thinks the model deed "a very good one," and hopes that every new Independent chapel will be protected in the same way, and saved especially from "ever falling into the hands of Unitarians." The prudence of this is, perhaps, to be commended; but it does not exhibit any great confidence in the doctrines contained in the schedule. The Unitarians, too, I should think, may thank Mr. Teesdale for the compliment which his words convey. It reminds me of what the Bishop of London was reported to have said at Sion College, about a year ago, viz., that he valued the existing connection between Church and State, because he did not wish to see the nation become Unitarian.

Mr. Teesdale supposes the case of "six Christian gentlemen" building a chapel; and maintains that they have a right to provide that the building "shall be held and used in accordance with what they believe." I might assent to this, if the restrictions they set up affected no one but themselves. But let us, on the one hand, remember, Christianity is not their private property, that they may define it as they choose; and, on the other, that they can use the building only during their own lifetime. Unless they provide that it shall be pulled down when they have done with it, others, of necessity, have and will have an interest in it. Have the builders then, by virtue of their payment of money, acquired a right to bind these their congregational successors for ever to hold, teach, and preach nothing but what is "in accordance with what they believe"—and that too even though the future generations should be brought, in the progress of knowledge, to see that their predecessors have received much that is untrue, just as we Protestants now think in reference to our Roman Catholic forefathers? The proposition seems to me absurd. I cannot see that any such "right" exists, any more than I can see that the purchaser of a "living" has a moral right to impose a minister upon a church against the will of the people. The two cases appear to be exactly similar in kind. At all events, I venture to say, it would be a nobler thing in the "six Christian gentlemen" if they exercised a little self-abnegation; if, having themselves received Christianity without dogmatic restrictions, they were to hand it down equally free to their children and their children's children, so far as their chapel is concerned. It would be a nobler thing in them, as it would certainly exhibit more of Christian humility, to refrain from playing the infallible to those who are to come after them, and who may possibly be better able than they were to judge as to what is or is not Christian truth. It would be a nobler thing, too, I think, to give what they give for the service of God and Christ without conditions, leaving the truth to take care of itself; or rather, I should say, leaving future generations of worshippers in their chapel free to follow the best light and guidance of Divine Truth which a good Providence may put within their reach.

But, Mr. Teesdale adds, if the minister of a chapel should come to see that the doctrines of the schedule, or any of them, are untrue, the denomination does not interfere with his individual liberty. He can "go elsewhere." Precisely so: if he wants freedom of thought, the real exercise of his Protestant right of private judgment, this the denomination does not allow; or rather, it allows it only within the limits of the infallible schedule. It gives him, however, the right of going "elsewhere" to seek it! I suppose that much the same might be said in behalf of the strictest sect in Christendom. It does not compel any one to belong to it. And further, I would remind Mr. Teesdale, this going elsewhere is not always so easy a thing as he appears to think. Cases are readily conceivable in which the effort to do so will be a painful one, and when nothing but a high sense of duty and steadfast faithfulness to conscientious conviction could induce a man to sever the religious connections of many long years. Why, it may well be asked, should such a strain be put upon sincerity of profession, by our artificial restrictions—restrictions which are not found in the Scriptures, but which men so strangely devise for themselves?

I can understand, indeed, how the narrower policy should have been followed in the sixteenth century, when people were but emerging from the darker times of middle-age Roman Catholicism. But I cannot understand how such things should be done and defended in this nineteenth century, with the experience of three hundred years of ecclesiastical troubles and dissensions behind us, and that of the present generation before our eyes, to show us the miserable consequences to which attempts to enforce Acts and Schedules of Uniformity are, sooner or later, sure to lead. Neither can I understand how those who do or defend such things can deem themselves the especial friends of religious liberty.

Let me illustrate my position by a brief reference to an apposite case. The people of Manchester, it is stated, have subscribed a very large sum of money for the erection of a suitable building for the use of Owens College, which it is hoped may become the nucleus of a new university for the North of England. What should we think of these subscribers, if they should propose to draw up a schedule of scientific truths or doctrines, and provide that no professor shall hold a chair within the walls of that building, who shall not believe and teach according to the schedule? And why should Christian theology be placed in a worse position than scientific truth?

Commending these questions to Mr. Teesdale's consideration, I remain, &c., York, Feb. 10.

AN IMPOSTOR.

To the Editors.—I am informed that an impostor is going about the country, saying he has been a member of my congregation for two years, and that I had given him a letter of introduction to the Rev. J. Martineau (which letter is, however, accidentally not forthcoming). He says he is a Russian Pole, and I hear that he has a Russian look. I am told he is about thirty years of age, and when he called upon a friend of mine at Yarmouth, "he was dressed rather roughly in a greyish suit with a huge comforter round his neck."

Will you kindly insert this warning in your next issue. I need hardly say I know nothing of the man.—Yours very truly,

S. ALFRED STEINTHAL.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

We learn from the Cape Mercantile Advertiser that, at the annual meeting of the Church Defence Association at Cape Town, after an opening address from the Rev. J. Kotzé, Mr. L. Marquard moved the following resolution, which was unanimously passed:

"That the right of every man to make free inquiry into religious truth, and to form and express his own judgment respecting it, is the fundamental principle of the Reformation."

The Bishop of Capetown, we are afraid, would hardly assent to this.

A protest has been signed by lay members of the Church in Natal against the consecration of Mr. Macrorie as bishop of the colony. According to the South African Advertiser the protest originated with the High Churchmen, who, towards the Bishop of Capetown personally and officially, cherish feelings of the very highest respect. They repudiate any notion of sympathy with the heretical opinions of Dr. Colenso, but feel that he has not been dealt with in accordance with the laws and constitution of the Church of England. His trial and excommunication have been pronounced by the highest authority in law simply null and void. They therefore hold that, whatever his heresies may be, he is still legally recognised as Bishop of the Church of England in Natal. We should think by this time Mr. Macrorie must have begun to wish that he had said "Nolo episcopari" firmly and decidedly.

As the English Independent puts it, Bishop Colenso has some quasi proofs of apostolicity; that is to say, he has been in perils both in the wilderness and in the water. He first fell from his horse, and was stunned, but in a short time recovered. Then he was washed off from his horse while fording a swollen river. But his companion, Mr. Kirkman, swam off and saved him, landing him, however, on the wrong side of the stream. By-and-by he crossed the river with the aid of the natives, and reached his home much exhausted, but held up by a native on either side.

Lieutenant Warren's recent explorations in Jerusalem tend to show that the Temple was much smaller than has generally been supposed, and that Josephus was not so far wrong in his statements respecting it as some of his critics have maintained.

The Levant Herald announces that the Sultan has ordered the rigorously enforced prohibitions against the admission of Christians into Mosques, to be abolished throughout the Turkish empire. The only condition exacted is that all non-Mussulmans who avail themselves of this new liberty shall act in a becoming manner whilst visiting the sacred buildings. The Herald thinks that if this reform be faithfully carried out, it will do more to "level up" the Christian population to a recognised social and legal equality with their Mussulman fellow subjects, than any measure which has been promulgated for a long time.

On Ash-Wednesday, the Marquis of Bute was the first layman who received the penitential ashes from the Pope, and on the following day he was invited to mass in the Pope's private oratory, and received from him the sacrament of confirmation. It is said that the Marquis gave His Holiness a handsome sum for Peter's pence, and received a present in return.

The Pope, or rather Antonelli, and the French Minister seem to be not quite at one respecting the Œcumenical Council. The latter, in a recent despatch, while promising a guard of French troops to ensure liberty to the deliberations of the Council, expresses a hope that the Holy Father will not permit the introduction of topics calculated to disturb the harmony prevailing among the French clergy. One of these topics is Gallicanism. The discussion of this, the French Minister says, would divide the bishops of France into two hostile camps, nor would they be less disunited in their views on the organic laws and the dogma of the infallibility of the sovereign pontiffs. This despatch is regarded at the Vatican as an attempt at dictation, and has excited a deep feeling of resentment. In fact, it strikes out the chief propositions in the Pope's programme, and all that remains is but leather and prunella. From any other Power, as the Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall observes, such interference would be answered by severe rebuke, but it is necessary to keep on terms with France, and Antonelli and the Pope are deliberating how they can shuffle out of the difficulty.

Infallible though he be, it looks as if the Pope had made a mistake, at least as far as his own peace and comfort are concerned, in summoning the Œcumenical; for it is said that not only several of the French bishops, but some from other countries, intend to raise a vigorous protest against the monopoly of the great prizes of Rome by Italians, and to claim their fair share of them.

As we helped to give currency to the account, which professed to be taken from a Belgian paper, of half a dozen nuns having been confined in the cellar of a convent at Louvain against their will, it is but right for us to state that the rector of that place has written to a friend in London to contradict the story, and asserts that the only foundation for it is that six ladies, not being pleased in the convent, asked the Archbishop of Malines to obtain for them a dispensation from their vows, and that while waiting for this from Rome they remained voluntarily where they were, though he had given them permission to go out.

It appears that the Moravian Missionary Society derives more than half its income from other denominations. In 1867 it received from members of its own communion on the Continent £2,314, from those in Great Britain £1,072, and from those in America £1,536, while £8,000 was contributed by friends of other communions. The funds seem to be managed with great economy, since out of an expenditure of £15,818 only £761, or 5 per cent., was spent for salaries, rent, postage, stationery, freight, &c.

The Roman Catholic papers state that the Rev. W. Martin Hunnybun, vicar of Bicknoller, Somerset, and formerly curate of All Saints', Margaret-street, London, has been received into the Roman Catholic Church by Father Maude, of the Oratory.

The proprietor of the Universal News, a Roman Catholic newspaper, has commenced an action against Dr. Ullathorne, the Roman Catholic bishop of Birmingham, for a libel on the paper contained in one of the bishop's pastoral letters.

This is the age certainly of religious novelties. At the Bristol County Court, last week, a witness was called who objected to be sworn. On being asked what his religious denomination was, he said he was a member of an American sect called the "Christos Adelpheos." He believed he was the only one of the denomination in England. On assuring the court that he conscientiously objected to taking an oath, he was allowed to give his evidence without doing so.

The Irish Church Bill, which has been drafted, is said to contain about a hundred clauses.

The Great Northern and Midland Railway Companies have signified their intention of discontinuing the payment of Church Rates, an example which will, no doubt, be followed by other companies.

The proposals which have for some time been discussed respecting a union between the Free Church of Scotland and the United Presbyterian Churches seem likely to end in nothing, in consequence of the antagonistic attitude assumed by Dr. Begg and his party, and the bitter things which these have said against the United Presbyterian Church. More hope is felt of a union among the several Presbyterian bodies in England.

At a prayer meeting held in Perth the other day, one of those present offered up a prayer on behalf of the Rev. George Gilfillan, and earnestly expressed a hope that he would see cause to change his present religious opinions, which are not thought to err on the side of orthodoxy.

The Establishment seems to be but badly served by a number of its bishops at present. Of four of them, whose aggregate income is £25,200, a contemporary says:

"Winchester has had a severe stroke of paralysis, and is bordering on the age of eighty—Salisbury, both in mind and body, is prostrate—Bath and Wells is now quite inefficient; and Exeter, who has arrived at the advanced age of ninety, has ceased for twelve years to discharge the duties of visitation and confirmation."

The Convocation of Canterbury met on Tuesday. Petitions were presented from magistrates and gentlemen of all shades of politics in Wales, calling attention to the desirableness of bishops being appointed for the Principality who might address the people in Welsh. They suggested several points of inquiry, amongst others whether some of the resources of the Church could not be well applied towards the instruction of candidates for holy orders in practical work; whether it would conduce to the Church's benefit if parishioners had a voice in the appointment of their ministers; whether a reform in cathedral establishments is needed; whether the services of the Church cannot be rendered more acceptable to the congregations; whether seats in churches should not be free and unappropriated. Archdeacon Sandford intimated his intent on of bringing the subject of intemperance before Convocation during the present session.

In the York Convocation the Archbishop announced that he had determined to institute proceedings against the Vicar of Healaugh, Rev. C. Voysey, for alleged heresy in his "Sling and Stone." A motion for admitting laymen into Convocation was lost by a large majority.

A movement has been set on foot by a section of the Evangelical party against the introduction of music and painted windows in churches. In order to carry out the object a sum of money has been given for a prize essay. One of the adjudicators is Dr. McNeile.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS

The English Independent says:

"The defenders of the exclusive rights of the Church of England in the Universities sometimes enlarge upon the biblical and theological instruction which the students obtain by existing arrangements. The exclusiveness of the old Universities is defended chiefly on the ground that they are the training schools for the ministry of the Church of England. The laughable stories which are told in society of the ignorance of candidates who present themselves at the theological examinations are courteously supposed only to represent a bygone condition of affairs; but the biblical equipment of a clerical Oxford student seems to be still somewhat slender. A gentleman recently strolled into the room where an unhappy wight was undergoing a vidua voce 'theological' examination before the Vice-Chancellor and three examiners. The subject was Lazarus. The candidate was asked how many relatives he had, and after much consideration he replied that he believed Lazarus had a sister named Martha—could not remember any others. Where did he live? At Bethany. Where was that? In Palestine. But near what place? Near the Jordan. But near what city? Jericho. But could he not mention some other—some more important city that it was near? Candidate doubtfully—Jerusalem. Yes; how far was it off Jerusalem? Sixty miles! It required so much time to extract all this remarkable intelligence, that our informant was obliged to leave; while the process of ascertaining this young gentleman's fitness for the Christian ministry proceeded at the same hopeful rate."

On the opening night of the Session, Mr. Hadfield, referring to the mention of the subject in the Queen's speech, said:

"He would be glad to join in an act of justice to Ireland, but if justice was expedient in the case of a population some of whom were disloyal, were not those entitled to it whose loyalty was unquestioned? Was the annuity tax to be retained in Scotland while the Irish Church was disendowed, and the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum were discontinued? Why was not justice done to English Dissenters in the matter of burial grounds? One subject would require the attention of Parliament not only in the interests of one part of the United Kingdom, but of all. He hoped that when the Irish prelates were removed from the Upper House the English prelates would be removed also. They had supported church-rates as long as they could; they had opposed his humble efforts to do justice to Dissenters by abolishing tests and disabilities, and Churchmen themselves were of opinion that great benefit would result to morality and religion by the removal of the bishops from Parliament. It would be a glorious day for this country when the bishops were no longer in a situation to dishonour their Christian profession by urging perpetual war on all occasions against political justice and equality to all classes in the country. The reform contemplated in the Irish Church would not stop there. The opinion of the country would be that the House of Lords should be relieved of the presence of men who were not hereditary peers, but simply life tenants, and who were generally aged tutors and school-masters."

The proportion which the members of the Established Church of Scotland bear to those of other communions is beginning to excite discussion there. A correspondent of one of the papers remarks:

"Even in the Lowlands the adherents of the Establishment do not amount to one-third of the population. They must not, as they have been in the habit of doing, be allowed to count the lapsed masses as connected with the Establishment. These masses are in fact connected with no Church; and whilst large efforts have been made, and are still made, and made successfully, to reclaim these outcasts, these efforts have not been made by the Scottish Establishment. But let us look at the state of the Highlands. In the counties of Caithness, Sutherland, and Ross and Cromarty, there was by the last census a population of 106,663. For supplying ordinances in these counties there are 58 ministers paid by the State; and these men receive, including manse and glebes, a sum amounting to at least £14,000 a year. Now, how many in those 58 parishes go to the parish church on the Lord's Day? I am much above the mark when I say 2,000; this is an average of 21—in many of the churches there being no worshippers but the officials and the minister's family. I have not the statistics of Inverness and Argyre before me at present; but it will be found, I believe, that in this matter Inverness-shire differs very little, if at all, from the three northern counties, and I have reason to know that the Free Church has been for years getting hold of Argyreshire. Now, is there anything worse than this in the south and west of Ireland? and is it not time that the Scottish Establishment should be setting their house in order?"

In his paper read at the recent meeting of the Church Union, Dr. Pusey said:

"All relations are changing. The first blow on Establishments, which a few years ago none thought would come so soon, has all but been struck. Another, far greater blow, the confiscation of the Universities to those of any or no creed, is equally certain. When the Union of Church and State (as it is called) has sustained already two such shocks, who can doubt that the Church will, ere long, be free? No need to precipitate the time—no need to have a hand in what will cause much spiritual misery—no need to take any responsibility upon ourselves. We have but to prepare ourselves, to learn self-discipline and self-rule, to learn that love which will cement us together, and then we may 'stand still and see the salvation of God.' Our only concern is, not whether it comes sooner or later, but that the trial-time (for such it must be) find us not unprepared. Meanwhile, there is no ground to lose courage. There has been a check. But checks are evermore the token of God's favour."

The London correspondent of the New York Nation, referring to the present state of ecclesiastical affairs here, remarks:—

"The three great church parties have hitherto managed to keep together in a state of more or less repressed animosity. The Evangelical party went through its season of difficulty over twenty years ago, when Mr. Gorham won his case and established the right of the clergy to preach the Low Church doctrine of the sacraments. The Essayists and Reviewers more lately established a right to say pretty much what they pleased about the inspiration of the Scriptures and everlasting damnation. Almost the only clergyman who has within modern times been expelled for heresy was a Mr. Dunbar Heath, who blundered into a flat contradiction of one of the articles whilst preaching some doctrines about faith, unintelligible, if not to himself, at least to every one else. He would probably have been let alone if he had not shocked the surrounding clergy by casting doubts on the existence of the devil, and so depriving them of one of the most cherished articles of their faith. Hitherto, then, the policy of the Church of England has been practically the widest possible comprehension. In condemning the Ritualists we should for the first time be taking a step towards narrowing its borders and, sooner or later, to the disestablishment of the Church. In a letter recently published, from Mr. Goldwin Smith, I see that he anticipates that ecclesiastical questions will be among the first to stir up political agitation in England. The symptoms which I have noticed give considerable probability to this view of the question, and I think it highly probable that within a year or two we may see the beginning of a struggle far keener and more exciting than that which is now raging in Ireland. The Church of England has in many ways enormous power with the upper classes of society, and an attack upon it would alarm not merely those who have a sincere belief in its doctrines, but all who desire the permanence of the present arrangement of landed property, and the security of vested interests generally. It has struck its roots so deeply into the soil that when it falls there will be a great upheaval of the foundations of other things besides churches. That it will fall, and that we shall see the beginning of the process, is an opinion which is daily gaining ground, though it is more difficult to say whether the battle will last for years or for generations."

A letter from Heidelberg, after speaking of the growing influence of Mr. Mill, in Germany, says:

"In the religious world there are great struggles going on. The orthodox party is extraordinarily orthodox, and has far more power than people in England generally suppose. The Broad party is, however, decidedly broader than the same party at home—as a rule, I think, rejecting miracles. Within the last year or two they have formed themselves into an association, 'The Protestant Union,' with the avowed object of winning back to Christianity men of learning and cultivation who have deserted it."

The Rev. C. Voysey, vicar of Healaugh, writes to the Yorkshire Gazette, suggesting a simple and ready cure for Ritualism. "An Act of Parliament," he says, "simply abolishing the ceremony of consecrating the elements, would leave the Ritualists not a single inch of ground to stand upon. That Parliament would be willing to entertain such a proposition, he thinks, may be calculated upon from the following facts:

"1. The proportion of communicants in the Church of England, as compared with the number of her members, is absurdly small.

"2. The proportion of believers in sacerdotalism is smaller still.

"3. The vast majority of members of the Church of England are willing to give up the ancient custom of consecrating the bread and wine rather than be compelled to accept the Romish doctrines which have become so encroaching. The slight alteration which is proposed cuts into the heart of ritualism, and instead of dealing only with symptoms—always a tedious, expensive, and uncertain mode of treatment—it attacks the disease itself, and reduces to zero the sense and meaning of vestments, altar-lights, genuflections, and all that has disfigured the Protestant ritual."

The Bishop of Cork, in a lecture on "Progress," said, men were intended by the Almighty for this. He went in for all sorts of freedom. Conscience should be free; so should literature, the Bible, thought, and everything that God made. Their desire for progress would require his hearers to maintain their rights in regard to the retention of the national Church, which he thought, was their guarantee for "an open Bible, a free conscience, and the right to worship God according to it." Of course the bishop is free to form such an opinion, but we are likewise free to form a different one.

With reference to the disclosures in the Hull convent case, a Paris correspondent says there is nothing at all extraordinary in them. The rule of all monastic establishments on the continent is that of absolute obedience to the superiors, who are regarded as personifications of the Deity, ignorant and tyrannical as many of them are. Some of the most noted preachers in France have, he says, to perform menial and degrading services when they return to their monasteries, so that it is not only weak-minded women who are the victims of these establishments. They perform scullion's duties, and have been known to kiss the feet of their brethren as an act of penance. The whole system is only fit for abject slaves; and as these institutions are on the increase amongst us, it is well that we should have occasional glimpses into the wretched bondage upon which the fabric is reared, and the unhappy lives often spent by the inmates.

The Vatican is evidently trying to "draw out" the French Government on the subject of the forthcoming Council, and learn what line of action it will take. The Civiltà Cattolica, as if afraid that the Government may prohibit the promulgation of any decrees of the Council confirming the doctrines of the Syllabus, as it prohibited this, reminds it that such a prohibition will be futile, as was proved in the case of the Syllabus, which became known to all French Catholics, and was accepted by them as an article of faith. While gently warning the Government of what the consequences may be of contumacious opposition to the decrees of Rome, it holds out the offer of a compact between the two Powers. Nothing can be clearer, it says, than that it is the interest of the Imperial dynasty to preserve the sympathy of the Catholic party; a sympathy which will never fail it, "provided it shows itself sincerely devoted to the Holy See." The elections, it further observes, are now close at hand, and are the "principal cause of solicitude to the French Government." Does it wish for Catholic support? "Let it, then, instead of assuming a reserved and suspicious attitude, place itself in a position which will be as glorious for it as it will be favourable to its temporal interests, and let it proclaim itself, without hesitation, the Protector of the approaching Ecumenical Council." That is to say, let the Imperial Government promise to promulgate and enforce the decrees of the Council, whatever they may be, beforehand, and the "Catholic party" will side with it in the elections of the month of May or June next. This is Antonellian all over.

The Christian World has an article on "Religious work in the manufacturing districts," in which it gives well-deserved praise to the labours of the Rev. Joseph Dare, our excellent Domestic Missionary at Leicester. After referring to the reasons which led to the formation of the mission there, it says:

"It has had to contend with difficulties of no mean nature, coming from an unexpected quarter. During its existence, more than a dozen clergymen—vicars and curates—have laboured in the town, but with one or two honourable exceptions, they have invariably set their face against the operations of the mission. The increase of Dissent appeared to them a danger far greater than even the increasing spread of ignorance and irreligion among the masses. In the last report of the mission, Mr. Dare, the energetic missionary, to whose labours much of the success of the movement is due, says: 'We have teachers now in our Sunday-school who were turned out of a Church Sunday-school, lest the clothing of the poor little things should rub against silks and broadcloths. From whatever quarter unchristian bigotry may be manifested, I shall feel it my duty to protest against it. A short time ago a poor widow brought her two big boys, earnestly praying their admission, because they had lost their father and were so backward. We always make it a point to pay special attention to children deprived of their parents. They came to the Sunday-school and evening-class, and were making a fair start. But I soon missed them, and on inquiring the cause of their absence, found that a person at whose factory they had just entered on work told them they must go to the Church Sunday-school; so these poor fatherless boys were deprived of their 'writing and summing,' and that, too, by one whose position arises from the kindness of a gentleman who was one of the first supporters of our mission. However, I requested the poor boys to attend the evening class as usual.' Such things appear almost incredible in a country like this."

With opposition of this kind, however, we know too well, all our Domestic Missions have, more or less, had to contend. After giving a few particulars furnished by the last report of the operations of the Mission, the article concludes with saying:

"Well is it for Leicester that it has a courageous and earnest missionary like Mr. Dare to point out the failings of its artisan population, and to indicate the many social evils which lie festering close to the surface. The Leicester Domestic Mission has done much good in its time, and with God's blessing it may do much more in the future."

Referring to the great nunnery case as a proof of the change in popular feeling which has made such a trial possible, the Pall Mall asks,

"What would have been said a couple of generations ago to an actual living Popish nun, who should gravely propose to her lawyer to appeal to a British jury for redress against her spiritual superiors? One almost rubs one's eyes to be satisfied that one is awake on reading how the rules of a convent are seriously laid before a judge and a boxful of London middle-class men, as furnishing grounds for settling a quarrel between a knot of nuns, priests, and Jesuits. At this moment, is there any other country in Europe where such a trial would be possible? Is there any other country where the principles of religious toleration are so thoroughly interwoven with the habits of the administration of justice that the highest criminal judge can be brought to listen kindly and seriously to the petty squabbles of a houseful of women bound together by the rigours of monastic discipline? Superficial lookers-on may say that the proceedings in question are the natural result of religious indifference, and that therefore, there is nothing to boast of in our own case. Yet surely this is by no means an explanation of the matter. The whole spirit in which the case is conducted exhibits what we take to be the spirit of modern toleration in its best aspect. The truth or falsehood of Roman doctrine is studiously kept out of the question. The object of Sisterhoods of Mercy, so far as it aims at the education of the poor and the consolation of the sick and miserable, is recognised as good and deserving of all honour. And, further, the right of women to associate themselves under any regulations which they please is fully admitted. But, at the same time, the practical dispute between Miss Saurin and her antagonists is removed altogether into a region where sectarian differences are unknown, and legal rights are alone considered."

"Anglicanus" having, in the Pall Mall, expressed his conviction that, freed from control by the whole State, the Church would be ruled by Churchmen only, and would then go to the bad, "A Churchman" pertinently observes, "it must consequently be the rule of the Dissenters and No-Churchmen, overruling the Churchmen, that keeps it in 'sweetness and light.' This seems an odd conclusion for Churchmen to come to." And the writer adds, "Is not the apprehension of ligotry and intolerance in a self-governed Church an apprehension of the consequences of a preponderating clerical rule; and would there be any danger of it if the Church were really governed by the laity, the clergy being represented only in proportion to their numbers as compared with the number of the laity?"

OPEN CHURCH PAPERS.

By BROOKE HERFORD.

VIII. CONGREGATIONAL MEMBERSHIP.

ONE of the questions which will probably occur to most of those who read these papers, is—how is it to be known in an open church who are members of the congregation? I find an idea prevalent that the open church plan does away with the settled fellowship and co-operation characteristic of congregational life, and substitutes a fortuitous concourse of unknown and uncertain attendants. For my own part, I should very much regret any such result. There is nothing I value more highly than that feeling of being fellow-members of a Christian church. I would we had more of it. Nay, one reason for my desiring to see the pew-system abolished is to open the way to more of it, believing as I do that the pew-system makes it unnaturally difficult to maintain the feeling of brotherhood in worship, substituting a number of isolated family parties for what should be one great family of worshippers. All that is needed for this to be developed into congregational organisation is some simple plan by which those who make an open church their regular place of worship may signify their membership of the congregation. This can be surely done without taking sittings. Our plan at Strangeways is simply this: A congregational list is kept by the warden. Those who wish to join as members of the congregation enrol their names on this list. This enrolment has to be repeated every year. At each time of enrolment a registration fee of one shilling has to be paid. When a person has been enrolled for a year, he or she, if of full age (minors are excluded by the old trust deed) is entitled to a voice and vote in all congregational affairs. Now instead of this relaxing our congregational fellowship, it has at once strengthened it and widened its area. Young people, who in most of our chapels sit in their parents' pew, never thinking of contributing, and feeling no sense of congregational responsibility, by this plan are encouraged to take up their position as members on their own account, and are trained from childhood to contribute for themselves. The small sum for registration is not enough to prevent even the poorest who regularly attends from becoming a member, but it is practically found quite sufficient to prevent people from entering their names without they really do feel an interest in the place, and deliberately desire to identify themselves with it, while the requirement of a year's membership before acquiring any actual part in congregational affairs, entirely obviates the danger of a sudden influx of members for any special purpose.

IX. THE GREATER ACCOMMODATION OF THE OPEN CHURCH SYSTEM.

ONE of the advantages of the open church system, which I think has hardly been noticed as it deserves, is its practically very greatly increasing the accommodation of a place of worship. It does this by making the whole accommodation always available. The most wasteful way of using up the space of a meeting-place that can only contain a limited number of people, is to connect membership of it with the appropriation of special seats. The result is that the place becomes nominally full, that is, all these seats are taken and not another seatholder can be accepted, while the actual attendance is never such as really to fill the seats or anything like fill them. Put this to the test of a careful calculation. Suppose the case of a chapel with 400 seats that can be let. Now, if every one of those seats were let separately, such a chapel would only accommodate a subscribing congregation of 400 members. But it is safe to assert that in no congregation are more than three-fourths of the members ever present at the same time, so that of the 400 there would not be more than 300 present at any given service. Thus the chapel would be nominally filled up and unable to accept another member, or let another sitting, when in reality there would be always a quarter of the space unoccupied. But this does not represent the actual result. Comparatively few sittings are let separately. People take several together. All respectable Christians to whom the rent of an additional sitting is of no consequence, take a sitting or two more than they actually require. A family of three people will take a pew to hold four or five. There are very few chapels in which some of the best and largest pews are not taken by families who, even when all present, do not half fill them. So that, practically, you have this result, that the 400 sittings would be all taken up by a list of seatholders, who, counting all the members of their families that attend, would number little over 300 all told, and of these 300, about 225 or 230 would be the utmost who would ever be present together. Yet with this general attendance of 225 or 230 the chapel would be called full; i.e., every sitting would be taken. If another family want to join it, they practically cannot do so till there is a pew that can be duly let to them; for in a place of worship where the plan is for the people to have pews strangers will not join till they also can have pews. If there are no seats to let—sometimes if there is not one of the better kind of pews to let—they will not keep on attending. They will come occasionally, but they do not join the congregation—do not feel settled—do not contribute; and, unless some vacancy speedily occurs, they are apt to drift altogether away, and either to form other religious associations or to form none.

Suppose, on the other hand, that the plan of appropriated seats be done away, at once the accommodation is more than doubled. Instead of being nominally full with 225 members, such a chapel will afford comfortable accommodation for about 530 members, because, out of 530, there would not be at any one service (according to the calculations adopted in the previous case) more than 400 actually present. Practically this does not really represent the whole of the case. Do away with appropriation of places, and the accommodation is almost unlimited. There are always a number of seats in a chapel—scholars' seats, seats in the aisles, and so forth—which are absolutely useless for the purposes of letting, but which are perfectly available for actual occupation when an open church becomes crowded. The reason is that seats which no one will rent to occupy permanently no one feels any objection whatever to occupying once in a way. People like to see their place of worship full. Those who, so long as it is a question of hiring seats, would be content with nothing less than one of the best pews in a chapel, will sit on a scholar's bench or a form in the aisle, not only with resignation but with pleasure, if they come and find that all the other seats are occupied.

This may not be a matter of much moment in places where the chapel is so large as to be practically beyond all likelihood of ever being filled, but in many places it is of the greatest moment. There are chapels in some places that are already in the very condition I have spoken of—nominally "full"; families applying for seats and not able to have them; the wardens at their wits' end not able to accept another regular member—and yet there is never a service at which there is not abundant room for another hundred or two of people! In our new mission churches, such as have been built of late years at Crewe, Dewsbury, Elland, and a dozen other places, the argument applies even more forcibly. Most of these are seated for from 250 to 350 persons. Now that number of seatholders, on the scale of seat rents and subscriptions they have to adopt, can never efficiently support them. Let them be made "open," and they can accommodate sufficient members to support them handsomely.

AMERICAN NOTES.

FROM several things which have recently taken place in the States, it would seem as if religious freedom there were in danger of degenerating into licence. For instance, it is credibly stated that "the Episcopal Bishop of Kansas lately allowed a clergyman of the Swedish National Church to unite with him in the laying on of hands at an ordination, thus recognising a Lutheran minister as having the regular apostolic descent." And a correspondent of the Protestant Churchman brings under its notice the astounding fact that in some portions of Ohio Episcopal clergymen have actually been known to officiate without their robes! This should be looked into at once.

The following account of Oberlin College, by a correspondent of the New York Independent, gives us an idea of the rapid growth of institutions, as well as cities, in America:

"It is less than forty years since a space was cleared in a dense forest in the Western Reserve for the planting of a colony, a college, and a church—all three in one—under the revered Swiss name of Oberlin. The seminary has sent out nearly 20,000 students, and now gives annually an Alma Mater's parting blessing to about 1,200. Of this great army many are clergymen, many lawyers, many teachers, and many more heads of Christian families, in whose households burn fires lighted from the solitary church altar that, forty years ago, was set up in the wild woods. Ex-President Finney—the talking oak—is still in green leaf. He plunges into a sermon as a strong swimmer into the sea. He finds, now as ever, a serene delight in terrifying human souls. Few men in this country, at the age of 76, have in them so much of 'the spirit of '76' as Charles G. Finney. Straight as an Indian and fiery as an Arab, he communicates like a pope, and yet pleads like a child. Notwithstanding his intolerance of other men's opinions; notwithstanding a certain asperity of character, produced by that unrelenting theology which so unlovingly interprets God's love; notwithstanding the semi-ludicrous familiarity with which in his public prayers he inveighs against Andrew Johnson as 'a piece of rottenness under the nose of God'; notwithstanding the graceful infelicity with which he blurs out a loud direction to the sexton at a moment when the colleague pastor is on his feet reading a hymn—notwithstanding these, and all other eccentricities of thought and mien, Mr. Finney (who disdains to be a Dr.) is now, as he has been for forty years, one of the most earnest, most eloquent, and most useful of American preachers. One cannot help fervently disputing with and yet warmly loving such a disputatious and lovable man. If he were more highly gifted with wit and fancy—the two qualities in which he is least masterful—he would have been as great an intellectual genius as ever made eloquence what Lyman Beecher called it—'logic on fire.' On the whole if one looks for a striking outward monument of the Christian progress of the country, he will find it at Oberlin: an institution founded like a log cabin in the woods: remote at first from all civilization except what itself created; poverty-stricken to such a degree that once it could not afford to publish its catalogue; apprenticing its students to three hours' daily manual labour, in order that while they were receiving their education they might also be earning their daily bread; despised because it admitted the hated negro to his heaven-ordained equality with all the rest of God's children; persecuted for heresy by many theological Pecksniffs, who to this day continue to twaddle against it in the same old vapid way; yet an institution which, from such beginnings, amid such discouragements, and in the face of such obstacles, has come to be, in many respects, the most influential seminary of learning in the United States."

In a sermon on Ritualism, at the Blecker-street Church, New York, the Rev. D. K. Lee said:

"In proportion as God is worshipped in spirit and in truth will be the simplicity of the form of praise. I cannot imagine Jesus preaching the Sermon on the Mount from piles of ruffles and gaudy robes. In proportion to the intelligence and elevation of a people, is observable the absence of all those useless, extravagant, and meaningless forms, and the presence of the active, living spirit of Christ, which warms and elevates and purifies all around it. The most useful and effective Christian preachers in both hemispheres are men eminent for their simple but pure and earnest Christian teachings. Spurgeon, in England, is as remarkable for simplicity of manner as for forcible, earnest, and successful preaching. Mr. Beecher, who is, perhaps, foremost of all on the Western Continent as an efficient servant of Christ, reaching everywhere the hearts of the masses, and with brain and heart enough to outweigh a hundred ruffled clerical fops, is as simple, unpretending, and informal as he is great. Compare these men and their simple, earnest mode of worship with the paraphernalia, ceremonies, and genuflections of the Mahomedan, the Brahmin, or the mummeries of St. Alban's—for these are all merely extreme ritualists—and see wherein dwells the 'spirit and the truth' which the Father seeks in His worshippers. Loving, as I do, the cause of woman, I yet could never imagine her in Bloomer dress without regarding her in a light purely ridiculous; but ridiculous as it is for woman to borrow the uniform of man, it is exceedingly by the ritualist, who can worship God only in the uniform of woman."

Our able contemporary, the Liberal Christian, the circulation of which we are glad to learn goes on increasing, and which can hardly fail to exert a wide and beneficial influence, after remarking that Churchmen seldom condescend to look over the pale of their own enclosure on the poor sects outside, and that when they do, the elevation at which they stand is so great that it probably produces a dizzying sensation, which makes everything confused, goes on to say:

"One of them recently looked down, and was filled with strange and unutterable emotions to discover that Methodists and Unitarians actually exchange pulpits. Rev. Mr. Shippen, of Worcester, really preached in a Methodist pulpit in Meadville, and was listened to by a large congregation mostly of 'evangelical' people. What, he exclaims, do the authorities of the Methodist body—mark the unwillingness of the gentleman to give the proper name of the Methodist body—say and do about such things? 'If Jesus Christ be not God, to worship him as God is idolatry. If he be God, to withhold such worship is to reject and deny him as the redeemer of sinners. Can the believer in his Godhead, and the unbeliever in his Godhead, both be sinless in any acts of joint worship?" If the asker of these questions had read the New Testament without Trinitarian glasses and glosses he probably would never have asked them, and would feel something of our amazement that any sane man should ask them. The comments that follow are evidently intended to frighten Mr. Tyng and his friends. The logic of the whole, which is not given but implied, is this: "You exchange with Methodists; the Methodists exchange with the Unitarians; therefore—Well, what then? If the Unitarians can stand it, we think the other parties to the transaction ought to be abundantly satisfied. The Churchman, which contains this choice bit of interdenominational recognition, has another correspondent, who thinks that if the Episcopal Church is dying of respectability, it is a death which some of its opponents are in danger of dying of. But one proof that she is not dying is the fact of 'her unity within herself, maintained amid endless divisions around her'—probably the writer never heard of Mr. Tyng nor read the Low Church organ—and 'her steadfastness of doctrine, exemplified by the fact that she never lost a church to Unitarianism.' What of King's Chapel, the royal Episcopal Church of Boston, which became the first Unitarian church in America? The ignorance which hides behind Episcopal pretentiousness and arrogance is oftentimes a great deep. We asked an Episcopal clergyman, a few days since, what he thought of the attempt to oust Colenso by giving a new name and bishop to his diocese. But he had not heard of it, nor of Colenso. If the Episcopal Church can ignore the age, and stand still in the midst of a moving world, she simply leaves herself behind to be picked up with other stragglers by the stronger and more consistent hierarchy of Rome."

We learn from an American paper that a New York publisher wrote to Mr. Spurgeon, asking him to prepare a Life of Christ, hoping to compete with Mr. Beecher's forthcoming volume. Mr. Spurgeon declines, alleging that he is not competent to the task, has no time for it, no taste for it, and finally, that "the best and only Life of Christ worth a cent is in the New Testament."

THEATRE PREACHING.

WHEN, ten years ago, the experiment was first tried of opening some of the London theatres for religious services, there were many ready to prophesy that it would prove a certain failure; exactly the opposite seems to have been the result. The committee report that during the past season they have held 232 services, in eight buildings, attended by about 244,000 persons, making in all, from the commencement of the effort, 1,259 services, attended by 1,761,000 persons. From an article in the Freeman we take the following remarks on the subject: There is abundant evidence to show that the work has been eminently successful. Thousands of poor persons who had prejudices against attendance at the house of God, or who were indifferent to ordinary public worship, or who felt—wrongly, as we believe—that they were not welcome to churches and chapels built by others, have met in theatres and music halls to hear simple and earnest addresses by evangelical ministers of various denominations. The sight of one of these congregations is sufficient to show how popular these extra services have become. We have, at various times, attended several of the meetings. The theatres have in every case been crowded, in some instances uncomfortably so. With very few exceptions, the behaviour has been such that no one would imagine the people were other than regular and devout church-goers. Of course, before the service is commenced, there is a deal of hum and bustle; and in some theatres "over the water," i.e., on the south side of the Thames, very loud talking, and a little joking by the rougher of the audience. But a sense of propriety invariably prevents many from disturbing public decorum who might otherwise be disposed to behave strangely.

Nothing is more noticeable than the earnest and general singing at these services. The hymns are well chosen, and the tunes are always simple and suitable. The working classes are fond of singing, and provided they are allowed to join heartily in this important part of Christian worship without being noticed, they enter upon the service of song with great spirit. If they are not as much at home in the preaching it is generally the preacher's fault. What Mr. Birrell so aptly designated at the Bristol meeting of the Union as "the accent of conviction" is sure to be appreciated by them. Few can better discern whether a preacher possesses this essential qualification than working people. It is with them a gift that may reasonably cover a multitude of faults in style and matter. The sermon will last from half an hour to three-quarters, or more. A long sermon seems never out of place at these gatherings, if it be at all interesting. The preacher's great point should be to keep up the interest; this can best be done by using anecdotes and illustrations and allegories. Without these the sermon will be thought dry. At the same time, this has been overdone by some preachers, who have weakened their discourses by too many stories, and care has not always been taken that they should be applicable to the matter in hand.

In High Holborn there is an amphitheatre which is now open on Sunday evenings for special services, which a city missionary has charge of. He does not preach; the services of regular ministers are alone obtained—a rigid rule, and on the whole an unwise one. The theatre was opened for this purpose in November, 1867. The missionary set to work, as soon as the management was entrusted to him, to secure a sufficient number of stewards to assist him in obtaining a few persons to lead the singing, and to get the place filled with the right kind of persons. The neighbouring workshops and lodging-houses were visited for this purpose, and from the first the place has been filled. The missionary believes that many working men would attend religious services were it not for the sneers of their companions. In his district, he tells us, there is an intelligent artisan who works in a firm where several hundred hands are employed, and out of the whole number only three men have the moral courage to attend Divine service in the house of God, and these are subjected to the derision of their fellow-workmen, and known as "Bible-back," "Parson," and "Methodist." Some very curious and significant criticisms are passed upon the services. The missionary has heard one say to another, "Tom, that was some good stuff that fellow gave us to-night. I shall come again next Sunday, and bring my cousin, or I shall ask Bill or Jack to come." "I say," said another, one evening, after an Episcopalian minister had been preaching, "that fellow needn't fear disendowment, he's worth his money anywhere." Again, after a Dissenting minister had preached, one among a group said, "If all the clergymen and ministers would unite together, and preach as this man has preached to-night, we'd soon have a different state of things in London." Many who never heard a sermon in a building before speak in high approval of the services at the theatre. Why is this? asks the missionary. Because, he answers, the style of preaching is parabolic or figurative; "not because it is sensational, for we have not had a sensational sermon, nor fine singing, in the whole course. Our preachers have taken their style from the New Testament—earnest, loving, descriptive, pathetic. On one occasion a man left the theatre before the sermon was over, and one of the stewards observed tears rolling down his cheeks. He addressed him, and this was his statement,—“I can't stand it any longer. I've heard a good many things in my life, but no man's words ever cut me up as this man's have to-night.”

At one of these services a queer incident occurred. A monkey was unchained by some mischievous person, and came on to the stage just as the preacher, Mr. Burton, of Kingsgate-street Chapel, was about to commence his sermon. The monkey made the oddest kind of faces at the preacher and the audience, and when seized by a sailor and carried bodily off it howled and screeched most unmelodiously. The preacher, however, succeeded in winning the attention of the people by making a passing allusion to the incident, and then announcing the text. Still it must have been "a trying time."

SISTERS OF—MERCY?

WHATEVER may be the result to the litigating parties of the great convent case which for upwards of a fortnight has been "dragging its slow length along," there can be little doubt of its result upon the public mind. That result is weariness and disgust at the whole system out of which alone such a case could arise. One of the Roman Catholic priests examined avowed that it was one which was calculated to bring discredit upon every convent in England, and, as far as we are able to note the workings of social feeling, his prognostication is amply justified. Against the principles which underlie the resort to conventual life, we have not a word to say, but against the system which hardens these principles into rigid rule it is scarcely possible to speak too strongly. The value of occasional intervals of solitude for the culture of the religious life has been felt, more or less, by those in every religion who have endeavoured to attain to a strong sense of religious realities. The world is too much with us all, and there are probably few who would not be benefitted by having infused into their life more of the silent, meditative element. The craving, too, for authoritative direction in the religious life, the desire for a settled rule to help the spirit in its struggle against the vagaries of self-will, has its foundation very deep in human nature. And in the idea of consecrating the life to one long service of humanity, there may well be a singular attraction to all who are under no strong necessity to pursue some path of ordinary worldly life. The evil is not in these things as elements of religious culture, but in their being formalised and hardened into a rigid ecclesiastical system. So formalised, indeed, instead of helping a healthy religious development, they impede and distort it. They take life out from the wholesome discipline of common cares and duties, to substitute trammels and forces which deprive it of all spontaneity and vigour. They seclude it from the temptations of common humanity, to surround it with a whole creation of small artificial and conventional sins in matters which have no real relation to the moral life. It is not necessary to appeal to the vices which some people allege to be fostered by the monastic system, its very virtues condemn it.

One interesting point, we think, will be brought forcibly home to the public mind by this investigation; viz., the utter difference between all our Anglican Ritualistic playing-at-Catholicism, and the real thing itself. Some people are very much alarmed by what they call the Romanising tendencies of the Church of England. They think that Catholicism really is on the increase. They are afraid of our English men turning priests, and our English women turning nuns. We must confess that for ourselves we never had less fear on the subject. The resemblance we believe to be a mere matter of externals. Between the spirit of abject submission to authority—which this trial shows to pervade Roman Catholic monasticism—and the spirit which crops up in every new development of Ritualistic ardour there is hardly anything in common. Under the stoles and tippets and chasubles in which our ritualistic friends delight to clothe their outward man, lurks a spirit the very opposite to that of respect for a submission to any authority whatever. They abhor and repudiate the name of Protestants, and yet they are in spirit not merely Protestants, but the veriest Independents. We have but to turn to the columns of their newspapers, and read the terms in which they speak of those whom their theory should lead them to respect and venerate to find abundant illustration of this. Only last week, the Church News declared, for itself and readers—"We are not going to submit any longer to the orthodox Episcopal bullying of the last twenty years." Yet this is the party that really believes, or thinks it does, in Apostolic succession and the Divine Right of Episcopacy, and is always calling out for more Bishops. And we are inclined to believe that the spirit which prevails among those young ladies who incline to Protestant sisterhoods is much of the same kind. We doubt whether black dresses and long chains of beads, frequent confession and life in community would have anything like the charm which they appear to have at present for the daughters of wealthy Churchmen, if they did not involve a certain amount of opposition, and if they did involve such hard merciless enforcement of authority as this trial shows to exist in the Catholic Sisterhoods. There is not much fear of Catholicism becoming dangerously prevalent as long as this is about the nearest thing to it.

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD ON "AGGRESSIVE UNITARIANISM."

THE Christian World, which has perhaps the largest circulation of any religious paper in England, has among its occasional sketches of religious parties and movements, by a writer who calls himself Christopher Crayon, articles which are generally characterised by considerable ability and fairness, the following notice of the Rev. J. K. Applebee, under the above heading:

"It is not often that Unitarianism is aggressive, or that it seeks the heathen in our streets perishing for lack of knowledge. Apparently it dwells rather on the past than the present, and prefers the select and scholarly few to the unlettered many. Most Unitarian preachers lack popular power; hence it is that their places of worship are rarely filled, and that they seem tacitly to assume that such is the natural and necessary condition of their denomination. It is with them, as it used to be with the old orthodox Dissenters in well endowed places of worship some thirty or forty years ago. Of them, I well remember one in a leading seaport in the eastern counties. I don't believe there was such another heavy and dreary place in all East Anglia, certainly there never was such a preacher more learned, more solemn, more dull, more calculated in a respectable way to send good people to sleep, or to freeze up the hot blood and marrow of his youthful hearers. Once and but once there was a sensation in that chapel. It was a cold evening in the very depth of winter. There was ice in the pulpit, and ice in the pew. The very lamps seemed as if it was impossible for them to burn, as the preacher in his heaviest manner discoursed of themes on which seraphs might love to dwell. All at once rushed in a boy, exclaiming 'Fire, fire!' the effect was electric—in a moment that sleepy audience was startled into life, every head was raised, and every ear intent. Happily the alarm was a false one, but for once people were awake and kept so till the sermon was done. It is the aim of Mr. Applebee in the same way to rouse up the Unitarians, and in a certain sense he has succeeded. He has now been preaching some six months in London, in the old chapel on Stoke Newington Green, where, for many years, Mrs. Barbauld was a regular attendant, and where long the pulpit was filled by no less a distinguished personage than Burke and George the Third's Dr. Price. The result is that the chapel is now well filled. It is true it is not a very large one; nevertheless, till Mr. Applebee's advent, it was considerably larger than the congregation. Before Mr. Applebee came to town he had produced a similar effect at Devonport; when he settled there he had to preach to a very small congregation, but he drew people around him, and ere he left, a larger chapel had to be built. I take it a great deal of his popularity is due to his orthodox training. It is a fact not merely that Unitarianism ever recruits itself from the ranks of orthodoxy, but that it is indebted to the same source for its ablest, or rather most effective ministers.

In the morning Mr. Applebee preaches at Stoke Newington; in the evening he preaches at 245, Mile-end. It seems as if in that teeming district no amount of religious agency may be ignored or despised. In the morning of the Sabbath as you walk there, you could scarce fancy you were in a Christian land. It is true, church bells are ringing and the public-houses are shut up, and well-clad hundreds may be seen on their way to their respective places of worship, and possibly you may meet a crowd of two or three hundred earnest men in humble life singing revival hymns as they wend their way to the East London Theatre, where Mr. Booth teaches of heaven and happiness to those who know little of one or the other; nevertheless, the district has a desolate, God-forsaken appearance. There are butchers' shops full of people, pie-shops doing a roaring trade, photographers all alive as they always are on a Sunday. If you want apples or oranges, boots or shoes, ready-made clothes, articles for the toilette or the drawing-room, newspapers of all sorts—you can get them anywhere in abundance in the district; and as you look up the narrow courts and streets on your left, you will see in the dirty, eager crowds around ample evidence of Sabbath desecration. I heard a well-known preacher the other day say it was easy to worship God in Devonshire. Equally true is it that it is not easy to worship Him in Mile-end or Whitechapel. The Unitarians assume that a large number of intelligent persons abstain from attending a religious service on Sundays in most part "because the doctrines usually taught" are adverse to reason and the plain teaching of Jesus Christ." Under this impression they have opened the place in Mile-end. In a prospectus widely circulated in the district, they publish a statement of their creed as follows:—1. That "there is but one God, one undivided Deity, and one Mediator between God and man—the man Christ Jesus." 2. That "the life and teachings of Jesus Christ are the purest, the divinest, and truest;" his death consecrating his testimony and completing the devotion of his life; his resurrection and ascension forming the pledge and symbol of their own. 3. "That sin inevitably brings its own punishment, and that all who break God's laws must suffer the penalty in consequence;" at the same time they "reject the idea with abhorrence that God will punish men eternally for any sins they may have committed or may commit." Such is the formula of doctrine, on which as a basis the Unitarian mission at Mile-end has been established, and to a certain extent with some measure of success. It is charged generally against Unitarians that they have no positive dogma. The Unitarianism of Mr. Applebee has no such drawbacks. He has a definite creed, which, whether you believe it or not, at any rate you can understand. In the eyes of many working men, that is of the class to whom he preaches at Mile-end, he has also the additional advantage of being well known in the political arena. As a lecturer on behalf of advanced principles in many of our large towns, he has produced a very great effect. I confess I have not yet overcome the horror I felt when I saw at the last election how night after night he spoke at Northampton on behalf of Mr. Bradlaugh's candidature. Surely a Secularist can have no claim as such on the sympathies of a Christian minister. Yet at Northampton Mr. Applebee laboured as if the success of Mr. Bradlaugh were the triumph of Gospel truth, and as if in the pages of the National Reformer the working men, to whom it especially appeals, might learn the way of life eternal. The more you hear Mr. Applebee preach, the greater is the wonder that he could have stooped to the advocacy of such a man.

In all respects Mr. Applebee is a popular preacher, and after the manner of the orthodox. His sermons are carefully prepared and admirably delivered. No one can deny him the possession of very great oratorical power. In his sermons he carefully excludes anything doctrinal, but dwells on such topics as the love of God and love to God. Said Coleridge—

"He prayeth best who loveth best.
All things both great and small."

And such seems to be the sum and substance of Mr. Applebee's preaching. He has a small head and a pale face, but he has a voice of enviable flexibility and a great command of language, at times as plain and Saxon as possible, at other times very ornate and rhetorical. He can be pathetic or sarcastic as the occasion may require, and of this latter qualification he is not slow to make use when the failings of good people or orthodox people are concerned. His sermons are by no means short, but from first to last attention is kept up. Wherever he is and whatever be his topic, he is the kind of man who will get people to hear him. Of course, with his present views, you cannot wish him back in the pulpit of his youth, but you feel how much more popular would Unitarianism be if it had many such preachers, and that what they gain in him others have lost. Everywhere the heart is true to its old instincts; even Mr. Applebee cannot get rid of what was dear and true to him once, cannot even in a Unitarian chapel sink down into the refined essayist, or compose himself to the delivery of dull and decent formality, destitute alike of utility and power. As a stimulus to the orthodox around him to greater effort—and there is need of it indeed in Mile-end—he deserves a record here.

B A B I S M.

Some time since we gave a short notice of a new religion that had sprung up in Central Asia during the last quarter of a century, and was spreading fast among all classes, but especially among the more wealthy and educated. Of this remarkable movement, which has now brought millions under its influence, the only full account is to be found in three recent French works. Of the information which they contain, Professor Evans has given an interesting digest in Hours at Home, an American publication. From this it appears that the new religion has already a long list of martyrs. It has organised itself into communities and even into armies. It has fought bloody battles in defence of freedom of conscience, and has repeatedly routed the strongest military forces that could be sent against it by the Persian Government. It has, in fact, passed through all the phases of other great historic religions, and is fully entitled to a place at their side. It owes its origin to a man named Mirza-Ali-Mohammed, who claimed to be a descendant of the prophet. His father was a silk-merchant of Shiraz, and had intended that the son should devote himself to the same commercial business. But the young man had no taste for the life of the bazaars, grew hypochondriacal, sought solitude, became ascetic in his habits, and attached himself to several religious sects of the East distinguished for the austerity of their discipline. With a bold, sincere, and open mind he welcomed the light of truth, no matter from what source it might come. During this time he read the Gospels in the translations of the Protestant missionaries and also portions of the Old Testament, which he obtained from the Jews of his native city; familiarised himself with the teachings of the Guebres, and the writings of the Persian free-thinkers, in whose mouths the name of Voltaire, metamorphosed into Valater, is quite common. The pilgrims who came to Kerbela listened with reverence to the young student, whom they regarded as inspired, and on returning to their homes spoke of him with such enthusiasm that his fame soon filled the whole land. He was called "the elect of God," and was supposed to have the gift of working miracles. When, therefore, Mirza-Ali-Mohammed came back to Shiraz, his native city he was welcomed as a reformer and a prophet. His extreme youth, the wonderful charm of his countenance, the sweetness of his disposition, the simplicity and purity of his life, his exemplary piety, and the fervour and eloquence of his discourse, produced the profoundest impression upon all who approached him. He made a pilgrimage to Mecca, which had the effect of totally alienating him from Mussulmanic orthodoxy, and he soon after began to assail the errors and rebuke the corruptions of the popular religion, convicting the clergy from the Koran. The pungency of his wit and the audacity of his sarcasm made such an impression that the orthodox Mohammedans who listened to his preaching still retain an ineffaceable recollection of it, and after the lapse of a quarter of a century cannot speak of his discourses except with a shiver of terror. Whenever he appeared in the mosque, in the colleges, or on the streets, he was surrounded by throngs of enthusiastic disciples. In an upper room of his house he gathered together a few of his most ardent and intelligent followers, and organised a little church, bold, zealous, fanatical in the noblest sense of the word, i.e., each member willing to sacrifice all his property, and even to give his body to be burned for the sake of the truth. It was here that the new teacher assumed his religious or prophetic title, by proclaiming himself as the Bab or the Door by which alone one can attain to divine knowledge. This name, by which he has ever afterward been known, even among his enemies, was probably suggested by the words that Jesus applies to himself in the gospel of John.

Mr. Matthew Shaw, of Stannington.

THIS worthy old man, whose death we have to record, was one of the originators of the Underbank Sunday School, in the year 1814, when the Rev. Peter Wright first settled at Stannington. For twenty-five years, Mr. Shaw was the strict and indefatigable treasurer of the school sick club, his habits of exactitude doing much to keep up its character and usefulness. He always took great interest in the good work of the school, and was also senior warden of the chapel and chapel treasurer, having filled the former post for at least twenty-five years. He was the last survivor of the early workers who first adopted in that secluded district, the now common, but not less useful work of moral education in the Sunday school. For nearly forty years, Mr. Shaw was a greatly afflicted man, and for years had not been able to join regularly in the Sabbath worship of the chapel which he loved to attend. Yet the writer can bear testimony to the quiet religious spirit that actuated his soul. When the last summons came, it happily spared him any prolonged suffering. A few short hours of pain, and he slept the sleep of death.

Lewis Heymann, Esq., of Nottingham.

WE announced last week the death of this true-minded and excellent man, for many years one of the foremost citizens of Nottingham, and an old and attached member of the High Pavement congregation. The Nottingham Express says of him:—"It was not only in his public character as a magistrate and member of the corporation that Mr. Heymann was esteemed; his thorough and intelligent business habits, combined with his sterling and unsullied integrity, earned for him many warm and attached friends and admirers, but it was in a more private sphere that his genuine, innate worth was most convincingly apparent. His private charity was unbounded, and there was no cause having for its aim the welfare of his fellow-men that did not receive his hearty co-operation and support. As a master, too, his loss will be severely felt. From the oldest down to the youngest of his employes he was sincerely beloved—ever ready as he was by his advice and encouragement to help them to improve their positions in life. He had not been strong in health for some time. He suffered from an internal complaint, but we believe that the immediate cause of death resulted from a severe cold, which brought on congestion of the lungs." The funeral took place on Friday, February 19th, at the General Cemetery, and the high respect and affection entertained for Mr. Heymann were shown by the thousands of persons who were present. At the Cemetery entrance the procession, which had been preceded by a long line of the deceased's clerks and other workmen, was joined by a large body of gentlemen, representing not only the magistrates and corporation, but nearly every charitable and educational institution in the town. The service was conducted by the Rev. Wm. James, the doors of the chapel being left wide open, so that his voice might be heard by the crowd congregated outside. "The funeral," says the Express, "was more numerously attended than any that has taken place in Nottingham for many years." On the following Sunday morning, the Rev. J. J. Tayler, B.A., preached a sermon in memory of the late Mr. Heymann, in the High Pavement Chapel, where the deceased had worshipped for so many years, from the First Epistle of John, 2nd chapter, verse 17, "And the world passeth away and the lust thereof, but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever."

REV. T. W. CHIGNELL ON "THE PHYSICAL BASIS OF LIFE."

LAST Sunday but one, Mr. Chignell took for his subject in the evening, at George's meeting, Exeter, Professor Huxley's recent lecture at Edinburgh on "The Physical Basis of Life." He commenced by giving a carefully-prepared outline of the Professor's views, that life is simply the product of a certain disposition of material molecules, and that the extension of the province of what we call matter and causation is gradually banishing from human thought what we call spirit and spontaneity. After alluding to the horror generally expressed at such views in terms of reprobation, and urging that they must not be afraid to face every fact of knowledge, and that, moreover, the Professor's lecture was based upon a most important fact, namely, the relation of all that was called spiritual phenomena to material composition and structure, he went on to plead that, among those very facts which must be faced, were the instinctive perception, by man, of cause and effect in the universe, and the existence of spiritual life in man. Man, he pointed out, had always maintained that there was something in himself more precious than his body—that there was in his fellow-man a ghostly presence looking out through those eye-windows, a ghostly presence altogether transcending anything that the change of position in the particles of the grey matter of the brain could ever bring about. Would they, he asked, resolve friendship, love, heroism for truth and justice—all that we call human nobleness and saintliness—into mere new arrangement of the molecular matter of the brain? He could only say it was against human nature to do so. Men had always stood horror-struck, when logically they had looked at it, at the contrariety between the material appearance and the spiritual things in which they wished to trust. But they had leaped over and conquered the difficulty, and in spite of it they had asserted that their souls, their thoughts, truth, justice, virtue, friendship, beauty, and nobleness of every kind, were altogether of a more transcendent sphere than the brain that worked in the thinking and the hand that worked in the doing. He could only say that this was man; and they might as well try to deprive him of hunger and of thirst as to deprive him of these experiences of his. In conclusion, he would remind them of a saying of the German Richter—that if you confine the human mind to the comprehensible, to what is apprehensible by the senses and by argument, it is just as if you had somewhere closed up space, so that there was no longer infinite space to think of, but somewhere a point beyond which you could not go. Now, their human consciousness rebelled against that—they could not submit to have their natures confined to that which they could only clearly comprehend by logic or apprehend by their senses. Again, the great Goethe, whom Professor Huxley quoted as favouring his theory—very unjustly, he (the lecturer) knew—said the mind was in a state of insipidity when it was confined to the comprehensible only, when it did not reach after the infinite and the incomprehensible. And this was the language of a man who had struggled with these problems and who knew well all the scepticisms they suggested. Let me again (said Mr. Chignell) remind you that man everywhere, where his mind has been alive and sensitive and lofty, has seen intelligence in every point of the universe—has seen in every event that has befallen him a Divine volition—has seen in all belonging to the outer world and himself the very arms, the very everlasting arms, that support the universe; and he has laid hold on God as his great support. He has prayed to Him in his struggles—he has talked with Him amidst the beauty of His works—he has leaned on Him with all his weight when he had nothing else to support him—and (as small objects will grow upward toward the higher that surround them), by this idea of God he has risen into superhuman altitude, and left a memory of himself, as poet, or hero, or very demigod, among men. Well, again, all the common simple souls of mankind have everywhere reflected the idea of God, just as the blue heaven is reflected upon the smallest pools as upon the ocean. Everywhere men have believed in the Light. It has been one of the earliest names which, in some language or other, they have lisped; it has sustained them in the battle field, in sickness, and on the dying bed; and, when all life darkened around them, the idea of God has been the one opening into the blue, into the light—the one outlet of hope and trust; and, looking steadfastly at that, men have endured anything, even the very last conflict with death itself, and have died bravely and magnanimously. But, perhaps, you are saying, "You wish to lead us back to the authority of others." I do not. I simply say, if you examine the universe, you must examine man with it, and you must examine the great experiences that have been common to him, that have been most profound and vital to him all through his history, and which you cannot ignore. And if you find you cannot eradicate them from man, you must see that they point to realities, and you must accept them. This fact of second-sight, this fact of presentiment—the feeling after, dimly and indistinctly, yet strongly, something that cannot be proved by the senses or by argument—these reachings out after what we cannot talk much about, but which are the inmost life and heaven of man—all that is undeniable: it belongs to man as man; and I say you must unmake man before you can eradicate from him these presentiments, these ideas, these yearnings. I part company, then, with the lecture I have read—utterly. I admire the man who gave it; I revere deeply the mental integrity which dictated every word of it; but I disagree with it, and I think that it reduces us to a very cold, barren theory of our existence. Looked at as it stands in the year 1869, it is sad enough to me. There, on the one side, is the superstition of so-called religion, and yonder, on the other hand, is voluptuousness, greediness for wealth, or whatever name you may apply to the workings of the lower instincts of man. And between these two you have got a philosophy—a philosophy that will have nothing to do with superstition, but that really casts about to apologise (though it does not mean to) for the life of the senses, which simply says, "Let us eat, gather, accumulate, and die." Let us, who have any power to grapple with this question, grapple with it; let us get new earnestness if we can; let us get a little bit of our old indifference broken up—that utter lethargy about things intellectual, about things high, which leaves the world to rot and ruin. Let us get rid of a little of that, I say; and get inspiration to-night from what we have been looking into, that we may join in the great struggle for a real belief. And, if we can get that, let us hold it fast, and propagate it if we are able, for it is wanted sadly enough.

UNWITTING TRIBUTE.

A learned critic, meaning censure, says
No subject is too prosy for my mind;
And thus, methinks, unwittingly he pays
A tribute he'd refuse.

Nothing too prosy! wherefore should it be?
He is no poet if, in the merest clod,
He may not find some trace of Poesy—
His all-besetting god.

He cannot hide from it, do what he will;
It gazes out on him from stocks and stones;
The world moves by on grating wheels: he still
Can hear celestial tones.

The cruse that winks through some lone widow's pane,
The birring sonnet of her spinning wheel,

No prosier are than heaven's lurid chain,
Or earth's resounding peal.

The elements that chaunt in epic tongue,
To them the drowsiest senses are awake:
It needs a poet's ear to catch the song
That breathes in things prosaic.

So, as unto the pure all things are pure,
Unto the poet all reflect his dream;
He needs no spiced event, no special lure,
But finds in all a theme.

R. LEIGHTON.

THE "ROB ROY" IN SYRIA.

MR. MACGREGOR, the adventurous canoist (if there be such a word) writes an account of his late voyaging to the Times, dating his letter "Damascus," from which we extract the following.

From Egypt the Rob Roy was taken to Beyrout, and I brought her safely over Mount Lebanon, through snow a foot deep, until we launched her on the river Abana, which bore me swiftly through the magnificent gorge of Doomar to the plain of Damascus. I paddled straight into the town, under the bridges, up to the Pasha's Palace, and then rested the canoe on the water in the marble basin of the hotel, where many visitors came to see her, among others the Pasha and his suite and the English Consul.

The canoe was next carried on a pony's back through the crowded bazaars until again she floated on the Abana, and in two days more I reached the mouth of the river and camped in a desolate marsh for Christmas. Panthers, hyenas, and other wild beasts are said to be common here, but I feared more than these the wild boars, for if wounded they could pursue me in the shallow water, and one thrust of the tusk would finish my voyage. I saw hundreds of the tracks of the boars in the reeds, but never where the water was deeper than two feet. The only boat that has ever been on this lake of Ateibeh was lost the first day three years ago, and after a fortnight the dead bodies of the three men in it were discovered by offering a large reward to a man who went out naked upon a raft of reeds to search.

After the first ten minutes on this lake I became invisible to those on shore for the whole day, being concealed by the dense reeds through which I steered by compass, and placed cotton rags on the higher plants at intervals to show me the way for my return. Next the Rob Roy went to the Pharpar, which river is far less interesting than the Abana. It has few trees on it, little game, and winds excessively, but is monotonously tame. This falls into Lake Hijarieh, upon which I spent two delightful days, and, crossing it, landed the Rob Roy canoe in the Hauran. To come thus to this dangerous and desolate region was, of course, utterly without precedent; and, leaving the canoe, I ran quickly up the nearest hill and gazed over the vast wilderness upon the ruins of the "giant cities of Bashan," and on the two other lakes marked vaguely on some maps, or distinctly (and then quite wrong) upon others. I took compass bearings from the shore and the lakes in every part, but the details of these, which will be useful to geographers, I need not enter upon here.

Being in light marching order, with only saddle-bags, I put up in the Sheikh's house. We entered the yard through a gate with a stone door, still turning on its hinges as it may have done in the days of Abraham. I slept in a room with stone rafters each ten feet long, and a window having for its shutter one slab of stone. I had brought with me half of a Times, kindly sent from England, and here in Bashan I read of the English elections, and of Mr. Bright as a Cabinet Minister.

It was indeed a strange sensation when I closed this window for the night, and the heavy slab turned easily by a push from one of my fingers. Mr. Rogers has sent to the British Museum one of these extraordinary slab doors, about six inches in thickness; also a copy of the inscription on a stone in this particular house, which is in Greek, and dated, I believe, more than 2,000 years ago.

I visited a number of villages in the plain of Damascus. The people there are handsome; many of them are tattooed. They wear very brilliant colours, chiefly red (as in Egypt one sees always blue), and long red boots turned up at the ends. They are strong, healthy, good humoured, and intelligent. Their houses are of mud, but not very dirty. They ran in crowds along the rivers while the canoe passed, but when it was on shore (and wrapped in carpets) it was constantly supposed to be a coffin, and several times the woman shrieked as I took off the cover and launched the boat. Blessed with fine weather and perfect health, I have enjoyed this canoe voyage in Syria and Egypt to the highest degree, and once more over the spurs of Hermon, which is now all white in snow, I hope to launch the Rob Roy on Lake Huleh and then descend the sacred Jordan.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XVII.

HITTING HARD WITH A TEXT.

As illustrative of the covert meaning which may be conveyed by a preacher in the choice of a text, Dean Ramsay relates the following anecdote of Paley, the well-known author. When Pitt, as First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer, revisited Cambridge, where he had graduated, Paley marked with a sarcastic eye how assiduously some of the leading members of the University courted the youthful Prime Minister, and made up to him in view of the good things which he would now have at his disposal. It was Paley's turn to preach before the University at St. Mary's on the Sunday following Pitt's visit; accordingly, he took for his text: "There is a lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes," adding, as he looked round on the crowded church, "But what are they among so many?"

A SHARP REBUFF.

A learned clergyman was accosted in the following manner by an illiterate preacher who despised education: "Sir, you have been to college, I suppose?" "Yes, sir," was the reply. "I am thankful," rejoined the former, "that the Lord has opened my mouth to preach without any learning." "A similar event," replied the latter, "occurred in Baalam's time; but such things are of rare occurrence at the present day."

A REMARKABLE EFFECT OF METHODISM.

In the early days of Methodism some of Wesley's opponents, in the excess of their zeal against enthusiasm, took up a wagon load of Methodists, and carried them before a justice. When they were asked what these persons had done, there was a backward silence; at last one of the accusers said, "Why, they pretend to do better than other people, and besides, they prayed from morning till night." The magistrate asked if they had done anything else. "Yes, sir," said an old man, "an't please your worship, they converted my wife. Till she went among them she had such a tongue! and now she's quiet as a lamb." "Carry them back, carry them back," said the magistrate, "and let them convert all the scolds in the town."

THE LASTING TIE.

Dean Storr, when residing on a living in the country, had occasion one day to unite a rustic couple in the bands of matrimony. The ceremony over, the husband began to "sick in resolution," and falling (as some husbands might do) into a fit of repentance, he said, "Your reverence has tied the knot tightly, I fancy; but, under favour, may I ask if so be you could untie it again?" "Why, no," replied the Dean, "we never do that on this part of the consecrated ground." "Where then?" cried the man, eagerly. "On that!"—pointing to the burying-ground.

WHICH IS THE BEAST?

The Pope and Louis Napoleon till lately divided between them the unenviable distinction of corresponding to the Beast described in the Apocalypse. But the Rev. T. H. Gregg, curate of Cradley, and also the Advertiser, a week or two since, discovered that the letters in the word "Gladstone," if added together as Greek numerals, denote the mystic 666. A writer in the Rock, however, says that they make only 663, and that therefore Mr. Gladstone is not "the Beast." The editor of the Court Journal, in commenting upon such doctors disagreeing, suggests that the letters CUMMING, if Grecised, will be found to make up exactly the required 666.

CARNAL REASON IN A NEGRO.

In a lecture at Sheffield a fortnight ago, the Rev. Newman Hall told the following story. An illiterate negro preacher said to his congregation:—"My brethren, when de fust man Adam was made, he was made ob wet clay, and set up agin de palings to dry." "Do you say," said one of the congregation, "dat Adam was made ob wet clay, and set up agin de palings to dry?" "Yes, sar, I do." "Who made de palings?" "Sit down, sar," said the preacher sternly, "such questions as dat would upset any system of theology."

A FEMALE CONSPIRACY.

UNDER this heading the Pall Mall Gazette supplies us with the following:

At the present moment, when the subjects of women's clubs and the higher education of girls are attracting considerable attention, a strange little book which is now before us, and which treats of both those subjects, seems worthy of notice. The book was purchased some little time ago at a sale by a dealer, who imagined it was some religious work in an unknown tongue, probably emanating from a missionary press in Africa, or one of the islands of the Polynesian Archipelago. Here is its title, which certainly appears to bear out that supposition:—"Ebpob es lyo utlub, umjoml nyflobjof le vyjy sonutof vobo utemo upniffjro," &c. Then follows a motto, "Vonon ubo fibemcoff" Opfb. 3. 11, and underneath is the imprint "London, 1835." The volume happened to fall into the hands of an enthusiastic philologist, who at first began to study it joyfully, but soon perceived to his extreme disappointment that it was merely an English book printed in cypher. Curiosity led him to decipher the title, which turned out to be "Order of the Altar. Ancient Mysteries to which Females were alone admissible. Being Part of the First of the Secrets preserved in the Association of Maiden Unity and Attachment." Beyond this he did not care to go, but we have thought it worth our while to pay the book a little more attention, and we now proceed to make known the result of our investigations.

The book is divided into two parts, the first containing the laws of the "Association of Maiden Unity and Attachment," the second being devoted to an account of the "Mysteries of Vesta, Ceres, and Minerva." From the introduction we learn that "the ultimate object at which this association aspires is to impart a tone to society by securing to the female sex the ascendancy in domestic life to which they are entitled by nature and the laws of civilised society, and to improve, through their influence, not only the manners, but the moral and religious character of both sexes." In order to attain to this end the members of the association are to band together against "the passions and policy of the other sex." They will then add to the moral influence they derive from "the maiden purity of their lives, the decorum of their manners, and the order of their religion, a formidable 'capability to defeat the attempts of secret and masonic societies against revelation, by possessing their private signs and mystic knowledge.' The society consists of a superior called her Highness, and three orders—the first styled that of the Angel, the second that of the Band, the third that of the Altar. With respect to membership "none but maidens are admissible. . . . No maiden who is of low birth or servile habits can be admitted. . . . No maiden who has not . . . received the sacrament according to the rites of the reformed churches is admissible."

Great stress is laid in the rules on the secret

character in which the writings of the society are to be transcribed. There are to be two sets of hieroglyphics, the one to be taught to all the members, the other to be reserved for the use of the higher orders only. All books issued by the society are to be printed in cypher, and they are to be jealously guarded by the members to whom they belong in a sealed packet marked "My dying request is that this packet may be delivered unopened to —"

All this secrecy naturally gives rise to the idea that something very wonderful will be found in the chapters which follow the rules, and which profess to initiate their readers into the "mysteries of Ceres and Minerva." But the promise which they seem to hold out is not fulfilled. There is nothing particularly new or interesting in the information that "the elevation of Joseph to the highest dignity in Egypt rendered him absolute in that country," or the statement that "the doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments was taught in the mysteries of Ceres and Bacchus." Nor does the poetry which here and there diversifies the text show any great signs of inspiration. As an exercise for students of cryptography, we give a specimen of these effusions:—

Le ven lo Ceddosf rrouthlof im yob jro
Yonco busy ebtrabod ovob bofi es fighl :
Vé foq lofo yuant, boqjotop laf botiro :
F'o fpeko; unp beamp yjn giesop olomut mighl.

The book is a mystery for which it is difficult to account. It is too long for a squib, for it contains about a couple of hundred pages. Its printing must, therefore, have cost more money than a mere hoaxer would care to throw away. Is it possible that the association of which it speaks is flourishing among us? Or is the whole book the mere embodiment of the ravings of some lunatic, whose prevailing delusion is the idea that a number of women could keep a secret?

SHARP DEFINITIONS.

AN amusing little book has just been published in Paris, under the title of "Les Formules du Docteur Gregoire," in which a number of clever pleasantries, consisting chiefly of satirical definitions, that originally appeared in Le Figaro, are brought together and arranged in alphabetical order. A few of these sharp definitions may be given.

ABSINTHE is the genius of those who have none, and the death of genius for those who have it already.

ABSOLUTISM is a hammer of which the people is at once the handle and the anvil.

ABDICATION is the renunciation of a throne by those who cannot do otherwise.

THE AGREEABLE consists of the good that is said of ourselves, and, still more, of the ill that is said of others.

AN ALOE in flower is a huge artichoke giving birth to asparagus.

AN AMNESTY is the proof of strength or contempt vouchsafed by the conqueror to the conquered.

ANCESTORS are noble relatives, who often prevent us from being the sons of our own deeds.

ANNEX is a verb conjugated with the auxiliary "cocked musket."

APOLLO is a father who badly clothes his children. APPETITE is a boon of nature, who kindly allows us to mistake a necessity for a pleasure.

ARISTOCRAT is a democrat who has made his way.

CHOCOLATE is an alimentary paste, containing a little of everything, even cocoa.

AN ESCUTCHEON is the sign of an hotel where travellers are not admitted.

A FRIEND is one who will forgive us even of our virtues.

BRISTOL: DOMESTIC MISSION.—The annual sermons on behalf of this institution were preached on Sunday last, February 21, at Lewin's Mead Chapel and Oakfield-road Church, by Revs. Wm. James, A. N. Blatchford, B.A., and J. E. Carpenter, M.A. The collections amounted to about £35, being in excess of what was realised last year. The annual meeting was held on Monday evening, under the presidency of the Rev. Wm. James. The chairman, in addressing the meeting, alluded to the assistance given to the missionary, Mr. Andrews, by his wife. He believed that this was the only mission of the kind in England, or in America, in which a missionary and his wife were both engaged in the work. He must remind them that the same reasons now existed for the carrying out of the mission as at the time of its institution. He referred to the vast amount of pauperism and evil existing in the country, and said it was impossible to remove these evils by the mere exercise of charity. If that had been possible, it would have been done already, for no less than four millions of money were given away in London last year. It was their duty to extend the mission, which were instituted and carried on in a Christian spirit. The report of the committee alluded with satisfaction to the value of the joint labours of Mr. and Mrs. Andrews, whose residence in the mission-house, in the midst of the population among whom their work lies, had enabled them to acquire the affections and confidence of the people surrounding them in a remarkable manner. The treasurer's account showed an expenditure which with constant supervision reached £201, showing a balance of £16 against the funds of the mission, but the treasurer had the pleasure of stating that he had that afternoon received a telegram from an old subscriber and earnest friend of the mission, H. A. Palmer, Esq., of London, expressing his readiness to clear off the whole of the debt. At a subsequent period of the meeting, on the motion of C. J. Thomas, Esq., J.P., seconded by Herbert Thomas, Esq., J.P., the warmest thanks of the meeting were accorded to Mr. Palmer for his generous offer. The missionary then gave an exhaustive account of the condition of the poor of the neighbourhood and the nature of the agencies by which it was endeavoured to bring high personal influence to bear upon the ignorant and degraded families around the mission; the number of persons whom these agencies directly reached, he roughly estimated at four hundred; and on behalf of them, and the thousands who were sunk like them, he pleaded earnestly for better dwellings, the removal of temptations to drink, and compulsory education. The reports were then approved and adopted; the committee and officers were appointed for the ensuing year, and the meeting, having expressed through various speakers its hearty sympathy with Mr. and Mrs. Andrews in their arduous task, separated after a vote of thanks to the chairman, who for so many years successively had presided at similar meetings.

GORTON.—Last Saturday evening a concert took place for the benefit of the library in connection with the above schools. The affair was got up by Miss M. F. Brown, the talented organist of the old chapel, and though the weather was unfavourable it was well attended and highly successful, nearly 300 persons being present. The principal artists were Herr Jacoby, solo violin (from Mr. Hallé's concerts), Mons. Vieuxtemps (principal violoncello at Mr. Hallé's concerts), Miss Häbnel, and Miss Jevons, Messrs. Robberds, Warburton, and Elsworth. The Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., who has been thirty-two years minister of the place, opened the proceedings with a statement of the object of the concert, and at the conclusion of the programme Richard Peacock, Esq., J.P., expressed on behalf of the audience their approbation of the services rendered by their kind friends.

MOSSLEY.—On Saturday, the 13th, the teachers of the above school held a social meeting. The Rev. D. Berry presided, and after the quarterly report had been read by Mr. Seth Charlesworth, which showed that the school was in a healthy condition, and a few questions had been asked, Mr. John Chadwick, of Manchester, gave an admirable lecture to the teachers; subject, "How to make our Sunday-schools efficient, with a little common sense about them."

PRESTON.—On the evening of Friday, the 12th inst., there was a reading of the more interesting parts of Mr. Tayler's account of his visit to Transylvania, given in the schoolroom by G. B. Dalby, Esq. It was for the purpose of giving such members of the congregation as were not likely to read it for themselves an interest in the state of Unitarianism abroad.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Pundit Nehemiah Goreh, a learned Brahmin convert has been ordained a Missionary Canon of St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta, but as no charter has yet been granted he is without any legal status.

After all his troubles, it seems that Mr. Macrorie is to be turned into a Bishop at last. Dr. Gray has made great preparations for consecrating him, and we suppose he is just as capable of conferring the grace of "apostolical succession" as the Archbishop of Canterbury himself. But even in Africa the Metropolitan is not to have it all his own way; and a protest has been signed by large numbers of the laity in connection with the Church of England—High, Low, and Broad—against the consecration. They repudiate the notion of sympathy with the heretical opinions of Dr. Colenso, but feel that he has not been dealt with in accordance with the laws and constitution of the Church of England. His trial, with excommunication following it by the Metropolitan, has been pronounced by the highest authority in the realm in law simply null and void. They, therefore, hold that Dr. Colenso, whatever his heretical faults may be, is still legally Bishop of the Church of England in Natal.

The Madrid correspondent of the Independence Belge says that the Spanish clergy are using extraordinary exertions to obtain signatures to a monster petition which is being prepared, against the introduction of freedom of worship into Spain. The curés, he states, make even young children sign this memorial.

A correspondence has been published at Capetown between Bishop Colenso and the Rev. S. M. Samuelson, of Zululand. The Bishop wrote to say that, "at the proper time, he should claim the right of proprietorship to certain lands granted for the Church of England and held by Mr. Samuelson." The latter replies that he feels sure the Bishop has no title whatever to this land, on which is built the station of Kwa Magwaza; but adds, if the Bishop proves he has, he (Mr. Samuelson) has "a half-penny box of matches," and the Bishop will obtain nothing but a heap of smoking ruins, for he will utterly lay waste by fire, and destroy the labour of eight years. Mr. Samuelson must be a "fiery zealot" indeed, and one we should fancy that insurance offices would rather not have any dealings with.

It appears that the sum which the Marquis of Bute paid as Peter's pence, after his confirmation by the Pope, was 300,000 francs (£1,250).

It is a sign of the changes which are taking place in Italy, that the Court of Appeal in Naples has cancelled the sentence of the Civil Tribunal at Salerno, which had decided, in the case of a priest named Treglia, that a priest being always a priest was incapable of contracting marriage, and has directed that the ceremony shall be proceeded with according to law. This decision, which is only the logical consequence of a Free Church in a Free State, given by so high a Court, is of great importance, and will no doubt be cited as a precedent in similar cases.

Among the bills brought, or about to be, into the House of Commons bearing upon ecclesiastical matters, are the Solicitor-General's University Test Bill; Mr. McLaren's for abolishing the Edinburgh Annuity Tax; Mr. McEvoy's for repealing the Ecclesiastical Titles Act; Mr. Chambers's for allowing marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister; Mr. Gregory's in favour of opening Museums and Public Galleries on Sundays, after the hours of morning service; and Mr. Locke King's to "afford facilities for the performance of Divine Service by ministers of the Church of England."

It is stated that the offertories at St. Andrews, Wells-street, London, last year, were no less than £6,665.

Among the deacons ordained by the Bishop of Oxford a few days since, was Shapurji Edulgi—a Parsee it is conjectured.

At the "high celebration" at St. Matthias, Stoke Newington, it appears that the Privy Council judgment is set at defiance, lighted candles being placed on the altar, and incense and the mixed chalice employed.

Brother Ignatius has re-opened his monastery at Norwich. In an appeal for aid, he says, "The brothers are without beds or bedclothes. They have neither plates, spoons, knives, forks, coals, nor anything else;" and he tells the "Norwich Christians" "a chair, table, or even a stool would be most acceptable." "Will any one" who reads his appeal, he asks, "send a broom, a pail, a blanket, or anything, for the monks have as yet simply nothing?"

We trust that the stuff of which the present fraternity are made is of better quality than that of two former members who appeared the other day in a police court, when one accused his partner in the sale of "bread, butter, eggs, and other things," with having assaulted him and robbed him of £15, while the defendant in return charged the complainant with having taken to rum-drinking, which made it necessary to secure the cash.

The Royal Commissioners in their report gave the income of the Irish Church as £616,000 per annum, but one of them, Colonel Adair, in a pamphlet just published, puts it at £839,000.

It is stated, and the Weekly Register (Roman Catholic) thinks it highly probable, that Mr. Ffoulkes has been warned by the priests of the church where he was in the habit of attending, that, until he formally retracts his recent letter to Archbishop Manning, he cannot be admitted either to the Sacrament of Penance or Holy Communion. It is also said that, at Rome, his heretical pamphlet, which we reviewed a few weeks since, will be condemned and himself excommunicated.

The Rev. Maziere Brady, in an examination of the "private property" of the Irish Church, shows that the sum of £642,587, which is set down for gifts for building, re-building, or repairing churches, from 1833 to 1868, when divided by the number of Anglicans (693,357) in Ireland, yields an annual outlay of 6d. per head of the Anglican population, on an average, during the last 35 years. Or, allowing five persons to each family, half-a-crown per family per year, or threepence per month, has been the sum devoted to building and repairing their places of worship. "Such," he says, "has been the chilling effect of the Establishment upon Irish Churchmen."

The Guardian points out, in answer to those who doubt the development of the voluntary principle in the Church of England, that even in that most unlikely quarter, the cathedrals, its influence is gaining ground. "An offertory income of more than £500," says our contemporary, "must seem strange indeed to those who remember York Minster in a former generation—stranger still, perhaps, that an account of its disbursement should have been allowed to travel beyond the walls of the chapter-house. If such a policy were more common, our chapters would be less unprepared than they are for the revision which they will assuredly have, ere long, to undergo."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Inquirer has again laid its heavy hand on our friend Dr. Beard, but we are glad to learn that he seems likely to survive the present infliction, as he has done several others of a similar kind from the same quarter; and, to our thinking, he may be well content to set against the estimate which our contemporary gives of his recent work that of Dr. Bellows, which our readers will find in this week's "American Notes." For ourselves, owing no doubt to that dulness of apprehension which prevents us, not seldom, from appreciating the judgment and taste displayed by our contemporary, we must confess that we are unable to perceive that there was any necessity for dragging into a notice of the book in question "the author's three devoted colleagues," and attributing to them an imaginary "vote of censure;" and we venture also, with becoming deference, to offer a humble protest against the occasion being taken advantage of to cast a sneer at "the theological course in that famous institution" the Home Missionary Board. Some, whose judgment, if not entitled to quite as much respect as that of the Inquirer, it would yet hardly dare to treat with contempt, are still of opinion, notwithstanding its many various attempts to injure it, that that "famous institution" has been of essential service to our Churches, and deserves well of all who have their real interest at heart.

The other day a plan was submitted to the Pope for a new basilica, the erection of which he was asked to sanction. His Holiness replied:—"If we consult the tendencies of the age, and consider the revolutions which are agitating the world, it is not basilicas we shall feel called upon to build, but madhouses; for it is plain that the whole world is going mad."

The Pall Mall says of the debates in Convocation:

"If they have been fruitful in little else than foolishness, they have served one good end in showing us that the Ministerial policy, in respect to the Irish Church, is making way in unexpected quarters. Sir George Prevost has frightfully scandalised his brother Churchmen by expressing his belief that, after all, the Irish Church will positively gain by being disestablished and disendowed. The position and character of the speaker make this admission not a little significant. Sir George is a representative of the old original Tractarian school of thirty years ago; of the Keble, Pusey, and Isaac Williams type. He is a legitimate descendant of the non-juring class, whose special characteristic it was to regard Anglicanism, with its Prayer Book and rubrics, as the very perfection of human wisdom, and only not quite divine. The loyalty of this school to the Anglo-Irish Church was always something altogether different from the revolutionary democratic spirit which animates our modern Ritualists; and a severance between the State and this Church of their affections was naturally contemplated by them as both a blunder and a crime. Yet even among them it is now coming to be held that justice demands the abolition of the Irish Establishment. We may well ask, what next? We know, too, from Sir J. Coleridge's memoir of Keble, that Sir G. Prevost by no means stands alone. In the interview which Keble had with Dr. Newman in 1865, he gave the latter the impression that he would abolish the Irish Establishment, while, strange to say, Dr. Newman himself said that were he still an Oxford man he would have voted against Mr. Gladstone because he was giving up the Irish Church. This, in fact, is Dr. Newman's own account of what took place between them. Just as astonishing, also, it is to learn that Keble himself was strongly disposed to uphold the present Solicitor-General's Oxford Tests Bill. When the bill is again before the House it is to be hoped that Churchmen will remember that very early in 1866 Keble wrote that he thought 'dear John' (the Solicitor-General) 'will have a blessing on his work,' and that 'for myself, I am a little sanguine about the reform.' Of course Keble looked to the spread of High Church views to counteract any attendant mischiefs; but nevertheless it is undeniable that, in principle, he was for admitting all men to the highest university posts without distinction of creed."

Of the Endowed Schools' Bill the Freeman justly says:

"There are some features in it which should ensure for it the hearty support of Nonconformists and Liberationists. In many cases the endowed grammar schools of the country have been nests of narrowness and bigotry. The dead man's money has furnished a stronghold for the living man's intolerance, and boys have been trained in an atmosphere tainted with musty medievalisms, and fatal to all breadth of mind and freedom of conscience. The Government measure is intended to make a clean sweep of many abuses, and to make master-ships, trusteeships, and scholarships open alike to Churchman and Dissenter. The parent of any scholar may demand, as a right, that his child shall be exempt from any special theological training to which he objects, and this exemption is not to prejudice the scholar in relation to any of the benefits of the school. The fact that a man is a Dissenter is not to be taken as proof that he is not worthy to have a share in the administration of a public charity. Last, but not least, provision is made for the abolition of that relic of folly, superstition, and priestcraft—the requirement that the master of a grammar school shall be in 'holy orders.'"

With an assurance altogether unwarranted, the Rev. A. Roberts writes to the Rock:

"Nothing can be more historically certain than that Calvin had no hand whatever in the burning of Servetus, but opposed it to his uttermost. He believed, however, in common with all the theologians of his day, that the fearful blasphemies of the arch-heretic, Servetus, deserved condign punishment. They conceived, I suppose, that that part of the Mosaic civil codes contained in Deut. xiii. was still binding on Christian communities, and did not sufficiently advert to the New Testament direction in 2 Thess. iii. 14, and to our Lord's correction of the fiery zeal of his two apostles, as also to his teaching in Matt. xiii. 29, 30. Melancthon, Farel, Peter Martyr, and Dr. Owen, all regarded Servetus's capital punishment as well deserved, although they would not, perhaps, have approved of the kind of death inflicted. To this list we may add Dr. Field, Dean of Gloucester in King James's days, a High Churchman, whose learned work on 'The Church' was not long ago re-published under the auspices of the Bishop of Oxford. He says, 'Servetus revived, in our time, the heresy of Sabellius, long since condemned in the first ages of the Church. But what is that to us? How little approbation he found among us the just and honourable proceeding against him at Geneva will witness to all posterity.' Our ultra-High Churchmen are glad to have a fling at Calvin. What will they say to Dr. Field, who went much further than Calvin, by pronouncing the burning of Servetus 'a just and honourable proceeding?'"

Sad to say, a correspondent of the Rock points out a literal proof of a Romanising tendency in one of our contemporaries that we should have least suspected of it. He writes thus:—

"For some weeks past I have noticed in the Daily News a new method of spelling the word Protestant with a small p. At first I was inclined to attribute this to a concealed desire to set up a new system of orthography. But a few days ago I found a paragraph in which the words Israelite, Roman Catholic, Jew, and Gentile, were all spelt with capitals, while the word Protestant alone occurred twice with a small p. There can be no explanation of this upon the principles of orthography, and it cannot be unintentional, as it is persevered in, so there can be no other reason assigned than bigoted spite against Protestantism on the part of some persons connected with the paper. It has been asserted that Romanists are becoming very numerous on the staff of the London press, and this assertion is not likely to be disproved by such instances of partiality in orthography."

The excuse which the News makes that in working off a large impression there is much ink saved by substituting a small letter for a large one, by no means satisfied us, and it might have been a matter for consideration how far we were justified in continuing our support of a paper which could thus make little of Protestantism, but we have determined to give it a further trial, as it says, "in future, regardless of expense, we shall mind our P's, if not our Q's."

For several weeks past a curious metaphysical, but unprofitable, discussion has been going on in the Guardian, raised by a question of Mr. Llewelyn Davies, whether there is any specific difference between the admitted Presence of Christ "where two or three are gathered together in his name," and his Real Presence in the Eucharist. One correspondent says that the Presence spoken of is "not that of Christ, but that of his body and blood;" another maintains that it is "sui generis," but does not offer an idea as to what genus it is of; a third takes exception to the epithet Objective, and proposes that dynamic should be substituted for it; and a fourth employs the following language on the subject, out of which if our readers can extract any definite meaning, they are much cleverer than we profess to be:—

"When Christ took upon him our flesh, was it not to cure its diseases, both temporal and spiritual, so that as from the first Adam we deserved death, so from the Second Adam we might have life. When he returned to heaven with our humanity, he left us in the Holy Sacrament a special means of continually supplying ourselves with the medicine needed, viz., that defiled humanity, over and above the promise of his constant presence by his Spirit. To all his faithful creatures, whether angelic, human, or other, no doubt he vouchsafes his Divine Spirit, especially when they approach him in praise or prayer; but to his human creatures he has by virtue of his Incarnation given a special means of sharing his divinity through his humanity, indissolubly uniting therewith. Thus though the reality of his presence when but two or three are met together in his name is as genuine as that of his presence in the Holy Communion, yet the manner of his presence in the latter is, as has been said, sui generis: a genus to be humbly investigated, but not logically defined. To conclude, let us hold that, whereas in the use of all means of grace we have Christ's real presence by His Divine Spirit, in the Holy Sacrament of His Body and Blood we have besides this, the special medicine for our fallen humanity offered us in His humanity, always perfect, but now glorified: once a natural body, but now a spiritual body."

How different all this is from the simplicity of the Gospel we need hardly say. Over the institution of the Supper our Saviour threw no mystery whatever. It was a meeting of his chosen disciples with their Master, and afterwards it was a meeting of brethren without him, in order to bring to their remembrance his devoted and self-sacrificing love; and there is nothing whatever recorded which would lead us to suppose that it required the presence of a "priest," or one in "holy orders," for its proper celebration, much less that he would be able to work that magic change in the bread and wine which Ritualists suppose.

The Fall Mall says:

"A benevolent enterprise has lately been set on foot which the modesty of the projectors, as it seems to us, would confine to too narrow a sphere. They want to do good by stealth, and may, perhaps, blush to find it fame. We have been favoured with the prospectus of a new weekly periodical, 'for private circulation among the clergy only.' It is to be called The Cathedral, and its mission will be 'to furnish to the clergy a supply of good sermons suitable for public preaching.' The writer of the prospectus assumes, as a matter of course, that a large proportion of the clergy preach second-hand sermons, the assumption being, we suppose, intended to overcome the scruples of any who would like to enjoy the convenience of ready-made discourses if only assured that the practice was generally countenanced by their brethren. He deplores, however, both the poverty of these MS. sermons and their high price. It is perhaps significant of the writer's estimate of those whom he is addressing that the sentence to which the greatest typographical prominence is given, being printed in small capitals, is that in which the new issue of sermons is offered at 'less than half the present price of the cheapest MS. or lithographed sermons.' There can, it is urged, 'be no objection to delivering printed sermons beyond the simple one that when published in the usual way they are supplied to laity as well as clergy, and by that means may possibly be diffused among a congregation before they are heard from the pulpit.' To prevent any contretemps of this kind, The Cathedral will be circulated through the post direct from the office, without the intervention of publishers, agents, or booksellers. It will be received by subscribers every Thursday, so that it may be well studied before Sunday. The price of each number will be a shilling, it being 'impossible to procure contributions from preachers of known ability without providing adequate remuneration.' The discourses will be of a plain and practical character, 'suitable for preaching in any pulpit throughout the kingdom, and inclining to no Church.' There is a frank satire about the whole prospectus which would make one suspect a hoax if the name of a respectable publisher were not given with the terms of subscription."

The Guardian considers that the present unanswerable argument for the Privy Council Court is the impossibility of getting anything better, and thinks it very important that attention should be given to the practical consideration of what ought to be granted to the Church and what ought to satisfy her. It says:

"Certain great landmarks ought to be kept in view in regard to this question. One is, that nothing will keep the Church out of the law courts, in respect to the incidents and consequences following on a state of things in which all Churchmen, like all other religionists whatever, are also citizens, whose most remote rights and most private contracts it is the tendency of modern law to draw within its jurisdiction. The Privy Council has sat and decided on disputes, involving theological questions, of Dutch Presbyterians in South Africa: and the longest cause ever heard at Westminster, which is going on now, relates to the disputes of a convent of nuns as to the meaning of its rules. The other point which cannot be put aside is that the Church, besides the claims of a religious body to be supposed to have supreme spiritual ends and a paramount rule of faith and conduct, has also the responsibilities and liabilities of a Church privileged by law and bound by it. This is an element which is too apt to be overlooked in the discussion of these matters."

CONVOCATIONS.

WHAT the Standard calls "the accredited representatives of the English Church" have been conferring for several days both at Westminster and York, but we are not aware that they have conferred any thing of the least value on the country. Even the Spectator is distressed at the behaviour of the clergy of the Canterbury province, and certainly they made manifest how utterly they are out of sympathy with the mind of the nation. In the lower house they talked the most rank and undiluted Toryism, and got perfectly rabid on the Irish question. The bishops contented themselves, in addressing the Queen, with expressing their anxiety about the proposed legislation respecting "the Irish branch of the United Church," and prayed that "whatever course might finally receive the sanction of the Legislature, it might tend to that which all loyal hearts desire, the peace, the enlightenment, and the good government of Ireland." But this was much too temperate for the spirit of the Lower House; and when the address came down to it, a clause was added, on the motion of Canon Selwyn, praying Her Majesty not to assent to the repeal of any of the statutes "which recognise the Christian Church as incorporated with the constitution of the country, and which secure the rights and privileges of the clergy," and, further, not to consent to the secularisation of any of the Church revenues. Even this was not enough for Archdeacon Denison, who deplored "the great national sin" into which the country seemed to be plunging, and he carried another resolution, declaring that the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland could not be had without repudiating the Reformation. Dr. Jebb called on the assembly to express its "utter detestation of a most ungodly, wicked, and abominable measure." Archdeacon Moore insisted that at all hazards the Queen must interfere to prevent "this dreadful thing"—"better jeopardise her crown than destroy the Church." Dr. Kaye complained of the persecution of the Irish Church for the last 300 years. The Deans of Westminster and Ely and the more moderate men tried to calm their excited fellows, but to no purpose. One of Archdeacon Denison's remarks alarmed not a little some of his friends. There was, he held, only one test of a Church—truth; by the test of success the Episcopalians had no claim to Scotland and Ireland, and only a doubtful claim to England, for they had only half the population. The case against the Irish Church was just as strong against the Welsh Church. This was too much for the Welsh clergy, and the Rev. H. de Winton protested in their behalf. He declined to risk his body on such perilous footing. It was, he said, generous to say that the Irish Church was no worse than the Welsh, but it was not just. The bishops, more prudent than their brethren of the Lower House, the next day unanimously struck out their addenda, but agreed to the insertion of the following clause:

"We look forward with deep anxiety to the measures which may be proposed to Parliament respecting the Church now by law established in Ireland, and we trust that the interests of true religion and the just claims of that ancient and reformed communion may not be lost sight of amidst the conflicts of political parties."

Archdeacon Denison presented a monster petition, setting forth so strongly the doctrine of the Real Presence in the Eucharist that, when he had partly read it, the interruption became such that he stopped, and declared he would leave the House and never return. Whereupon he was allowed to proceed with his reading, and the petition was referred to the Committee on Privileges.

The only other matter in the Westminster gathering that deserves mention was a proposition of Archdeacon Mackenzie that a deputation should be organised for establishing religious intercommunication and exchange of doctrinal ideas between Anglican ecclesiastics and the representatives of the enlightened hierarchy in the dominions of Kassai, Waghsum, Gobyaze, and that most Christian monarch, the late Theodorus, so dear to the people of this country. The feeling of Convocation, however, seems to have been that, at present, there were matters of more pressing importance nearer home.

The York Convocation likewise passed a resolution, by 29 to 6, expressing "sorrow and alarm" at the proposed disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, and protesting against Mr. Gladstone's promised measure "as a fatal encroachment upon the prerogative of the Crown, and as unsettling the constitution in Church and State guaranteed by the Act of Union, and confirmed to the members of the Church by the solemn sanction of the coronation oath."

We wonder whether the clergy of the two Provinces really fancy they have done anything whatever by their resolutions to impede the great measure of justice to which they are opposed. They must have little knowledge of what is the feeling of the country if they do not see that the only effect of their proceedings is likely to be that of weakening their own influence and lessening that respect which it is important they should possess.

REVIEWS.

Patriotism and its Duties; and England's Urgent Need of a System of National Education. Two Sermons by C. W. Robberds. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson. London: E. T. Whitfield. Liberty the Spirit of Protestantism. A Sermon by Richard Acland Armstrong. Belfast.

In the first of these little publications we have the two sermons which the Rev. C. W. Robberds preached to his congregation at Oldham, on the Sundays before and after the first week of the late general election. They are thoughtful and able appeals on the great duties of Christian citizens at the present time. As Mr. Robberds well says to his people, "It assuredly rests with vast multitudes in our land to aid in the work of our country's continuous progress, as it never before rested," and, without a word to indicate even a personal preference for any political party, he simply urges that every man should give a conscientious vote, applying the same principles in the second sermon to the necessity now more pressing than ever for a system of national education. We welcome these words from a quiet, faithful ministry under the influence of which our church at Oldham has grown from a weak and struggling cause to a strong, active, and independent congregation.—Mr. Armstrong's sermon has a different interest, as the first published discourse of one of our youngest ministers, and we have read it with the natural desire to discern what manner of man this is, and what manner of work we may look for him to do. And we must avow our very cordial satisfaction on both points. The man who preached this sermon at the present juncture to an Irish congregation, consisting, in part, of Orangemen and Orange sympathisers, must be a man of fearless, outspoken honesty, and one who will never "shun to declare the whole counsel of God." And the sermon is as able as it is fearless. It is throughout terse, vigorous, interesting, with here and there passages of considerable eloquence. Mr. Armstrong has a future of much usefulness before him, and we cannot but regret, that even the opportunities held out by a Hibbert scholarship have induced him to suspend for a time the active labours which he had so well begun.

PROFESSOR JOWETT ON DOING GOOD.

It is not very often that Professor Jowett appears in the pulpit, but when he does he is sure to say something plain, practical, and to the point. Last Sunday but one, he preached for the Rev. Stopford Brooke, the biographer of Frederick Robertson, from Acts x. 38, "Who went about doing good." The following outline of his sermon will give some little idea of the principles set forth in it. He said it was a great refreshment in these times to study the character which was thus clearly and simply brought before us. The thought of Jesus going about doing good was intelligible to all. It involved none of those fierce controversies about his rank in the universe, or about the particular efficacy of his mission, which had often resulted in violence and blood. Surely it is more important to contemplate a good life, and to see how far it can be imitated and reproduced in our own lives than to be debating such mysterious and barren questions as relate to the nature of baptism, or the mode of observing the Lord's Supper. Such discussions have little practical value—can only interest a few compared with bringing the mind and heart into sympathy with the wondrous goodness of Jesus. There may be some things recorded in his extraordinary history which lie beyond the sphere of our imitation; but his human qualities, his meekness, purity, and beneficence concern us intimately. Some are inclined to urge the miraculous element of the Gospels as the chief ground of their persuasiveness and power, in preference to their great moral and spiritual teaching. But those who do so in this age of critical inquiry, when so many scientific men are tracing the fixity and universality of nature's laws, cannot perceive the dubious service they are rendering to Christianity. They are exposing it to unnecessary attacks, and they may be basing it on an untenable foundation. When we consider the difficulty there would be in proving the reality of a miracle if it occurred in our own day, we may be able to see that this difficulty is not lessened, but increased in the lapse of many hundred years. Therefore, leaving doubtful speculations aside, we should fix our attention on those personal qualities, those daily acts of Jesus which are recorded for our example and instruction in personal practical righteousness.

We see the living spirit that animated him in his intercourse with the different classes and different sects of his day. He sought to raise and to bless them all. He did not estimate them by their rank, or by their professions, but in a spirit of enlarged humanity. He healed all that were sick, irrespective of other distinctions; he taught those who were ignorant; he invited all the weary and heavy laden to come to him. He regarded men in the aspect in which they appear to the mind of God, as having a divine nature, as capable of progress, and as worthy of being cared for and redeemed, whatever might be their imperfections. We see how tenderly he dealt with the sinner whilst he reproved and discouraged the sin; breaking not the broken reed, and fanning the little spark of repentance, of hope, and of virtue into a flame. The same deep interest in humanity made him active in removing the burdens under which he saw its energies and intelligence repressed—the burden of the law, of the letter, of rites and ceremonies, of ecclesiastical traditions. In such pregnant utterances as these we see the greatness of his purpose:—the Sabbath is made for man, not man for the Sabbath; not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man, but that which cometh forth from the heart; the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem worship the Father; God is a spirit. From what burdens of superstition these grand principles are fitted to free us! A glance at history or the movements of our own time shows us the efforts that are still made to fasten burdens of superstitious rites or beliefs upon us, from which the life of Jesus is an emancipating power.

The question we have faithfully to ask ourselves is, is this many-sided wisdom of Jesus imitable by us? Can we reproduce it in our own lives? Can we go about doing good? Can we be devout without being formal—unworldly and yet not morose—feeling for others' sorrows and yet full of hope and cheerfulness—hating the sin and yet cherishing the sinner—full of interest in the race, yet neglecting no individual—with strength to rebuke the proud, and yet with gentleness to bless the little child? All men feel within them a capacity for some one virtue or an occasional goodness, but here is a combination of apparently contradictory excellences. History abounds with examples of great and good men—men like Loyola for example—conspicuous for some noble quality, zeal, heroism, benevolence, endurance, godliness, whose life is an illustration of some exaggerated virtue, whose goodness is one-sided, whose example it would be unsafe to follow, but who, nevertheless, show to us with what various qualities and noble capacities our nature is endowed. Could we, as it were, adjust the balance of our faculties, check the evil tendency by strengthening the good, embrace every opportunity of usefulness as it arose, and keep steadily before our minds the shining character of Jesus, who can tell what progress towards his perfection we might achieve?

It is difficult to lay down any law of doing good; for every one must be guided by his circumstances, and his opportunities; and the spirit of his life is rather to be considered than the outward act. Our characters, training, and powers are very different, of course wisely so, that we may occupy different spheres, and contribute in various ways to a common end. We may, however, as in the case of any acknowledged evil—pauperism, for instance, a monster of increasing magnitude amongst us—easily gain a higher conception of our duty. By giving our time and our thoughts to the study or alleviation of pauperism; by learning all the degradation it implies, its causes, the remedies applied to remove it, the mistakes of charitable boards, the doubtful benefit of indiscriminate almsgiving, and all the operations and difficulties connected with the administration of relief, we may in some measure carry out the spirit of Christ, who went about doing good. With what unspeakable sorrow would he have looked upon many of our social miseries. How tenderly would he have regarded the human affections that are now crushed and brutalised in a mass of squalid and vicious pauperism; and by revealing the sacredness of family life under the most repulsive circumstances—the child-angel turned into a being of premature vice and ruin—he would have opened up channels of healing and beneficence, and touched our hearts with his own overflowing love.

MR. GLADSTONE'S SCHEME.

THE announcement of the Government plan for the practical carrying out of the great movement initiated last session has been looked forward to with eager interest by all parties, alike religious and political. No one has distrusted either Mr. GLADSTONE's ability or his willingness to find a thorough and comprehensive solution of the great problem which lies before the country. But the interests at stake are so complicated, the opinions which have already shown themselves in the Liberal ranks are so various, and the opposition which has to be faced is so fierce and unscrupulous, that a secret apprehension had begun to be felt lest the Government measure might be one of timidity and compromise. All fear upon that score, however, is now at an end, and the measure which Mr. GLADSTONE laid before the House of Commons and the country on Monday night is at once so thorough in its carrying out of the principle of disestablishment, so considerate in its dealing with every interest involved, and so wise and statesmanlike, alike in its proposals for the future of the Church and for the apportionment of the surplus property, as to have not only secured the united support of his own party, but to have half disarmed some of the anticipated opposition.

As to the principle of the matter, the disestablishment proposed is absolute. Legal and technical disestablishment will take place on the day when the bill receives the royal assent. During a short subsequent period, until the first of January, 1871, the actual status of the Church will be provisionally continued; vacancies in benefices and sees will be filled up, but so as to create no vested interest; while the entire property of the Church will be vested in Commissioners, to be appointed by the bill, who will at once begin their work of dealing with the complicated questions of commutation and compensation involved. On the first of January, 1871, the disestablishment will be absolute and final. The government of the Church will then pass into the hands of a governing body, to represent, in some way, alike laity and clergy, the formation of which is to be left entirely to the Church itself; the Ecclesiastical Courts will be abolished; the ecclesiastical laws will cease to have any force, except that they will continue to be recognised as the voluntary contract binding our clergy and laity, until altered by the new governing body; and, perhaps the most striking change of all, the Irish bishops will cease to have seats in Parliament.

As to the endowments, the proposed measure distinguishes between public and private endowments, leaving the Church all such property as has accrued to it from private sources since the year 1660. The fixing upon this year as the date at which the Church of Ireland assumed its present character shows the thoroughness of Mr. GLADSTONE's measure, it having been, we imagine, generally expected that he would, after the manner of most Churchmen, treat the Reformation as the point of demarcation. The value of these private endowments is estimated at about £500,000. The public endowments amount to about £15,500,000. Of this vast sum about one-half will be absorbed in various forms of compensation. Not only all benefited clergymen, but even curates in permanent occupations, will either have their income secured to them during the performance of their official duty, or will be able to commute their interest on liberal terms. The tithe rent-charge will at once pass to the Commissioners without the intervening of any life interest, and the landowners will be able to redeem it at twenty-two and a-half years' purchase. The churches will be handed over to the new governing body on its undertaking to maintain them or rebuild them for public worship, and in the case of St. Patrick's Cathedral and a few other churches which are regarded as national monuments, some small permanent provision is to be made for their maintenance.

The intensest interest of public expectation has gathered around the question of what was to be done with the surplus property. The secret has been well kept, and among the many suggestions which have been made, we believe that none had anticipated Mr. GLADSTONE's proposal. That proposal is, in brief, to appropriate it to the relief of Irish suffering and calamity, especially in those forms which are beyond the reach of the Poor Law, with the distinct proviso of not interfering with the obligation of property for the relief of the poor. Hospitals, Lunatic Asylums, and other kindred institutions, so far as they exist in Ireland, are provided for at present by the county cess—a tax which is felt as a special burden upon the poor, falling upon occupiers alone, and there being no limitation, as in the case of poor's rates, to assessments above four pounds a year. Of the £311,000 which it is supposed will be the annual income of the surplus endowments, three-fourths will be absorbed in this way—the remaining sum being appropriated to County Infirmaries, Reformatories, and similar objects.

That this measure will satisfy the Conservatives of course is not to be expected, but, what is much more to the purpose, it will unite the Liberals. The danger of shipwreck to the whole movement lay in the extreme difficulty of getting all these to act together, but Mr. GLADSTONE's scheme is one which inspires confidence at once by its thoroughness and its moderation. It is so palpably not a tricky measure—not a bill brought in to satisfy a party and not intended to pass. It bears on its very face the character of an earnest and sincere desire to deal in a broad statesmanlike and yet kindly way with an abuse which is no longer to be tolerated. Objectors may echo Mr. DISRAELI's word that it is after all a measure of mere confiscation; but there are degrees of confiscation, and the landowners of Ireland are not unlikely to think that, the principle of disestablishment being already doomed, they may as well make the best of a scheme which, at all events, will give them twenty-two and a half years' purchase for property the ordinary market value of which is sixteen or seventeen years. The proposal for the disposition of the surplus endowments is also, we think, a strong point of the measure. The great cry has been against secularising the property, but that can hardly be raised against the Government proposal. Hospitals for the sick, institutions for the blind, deaf and dumb, reformatories, and nurses for the poor, are objects entirely akin to that material charity for which in great part the religious endowments of Catholic times were given. At any rate there is more religion in supporting these than in keeping up churches where the only congregation consists of the parson, clerk, and sexton, with their families. We wish Mr. GLADSTONE a speedy issue to his labours. He has deserved nobly of his countrymen, and both his measure and the tone in which it was proposed are calculated to elevate the standard of statesmanship, and to awaken in Parliament a spirit of active patriotism of which it has known little for many years.

A SUNDAY IN MADRID.

We abridge a letter of the correspondent of the Daily News, who, not being able to obtain even a standing place at the Spanish Protestant service, last Sunday but one, strolled into several of the Roman Catholic churches. Madrid abounds with these, some of them of very great antiquity, but not one of them with any pretensions to architectural beauty. Neither externally nor internally do they impress one as those in Paris or Rome do. Mixed and nondescript architecture without—dark, gloomy, and very dirty within—they have a tendency to depress the spirits rather than raise them, as religion was intended to do. There are no new churches, all exhibit more or less the marks of time. Not one of them has stained-glass windows. Very few have windows at all, or any other means of lighting than the long thick altar candles which are kept burning all day and all night. They are perfect embodiments of what the monks of old understood as "the dim, religious light." With its hundreds of churches, convents, monasteries, and religious houses of one sort or another, Madrid boasts no cathedral. Other places, Zarragoza and Cadiz, for instance, have two. We miss the exquisite architecture and stately grandeur of Notre Dame or Westminster Abbey, Strasburg or Cologne. Quality here has been sacrificed to quantity. The pious Madrilenian has never far to go for a place to perform his devotions. They are almost always open. The merchant as he proceeds to his business; the politician as he goes to his club; the "aguadero," or water-carrier, while his barrel is filling at the fountain; the melon-vendor, while his faithful donkey is feeding; the cabman, while his fare is making her "call" or doing her shopping; the postman, while you are waiting for your letters; the policeman, when he hears the first sounds of a row; the bull-fighter, as he goes to the Toro; and the beau monde, as it takes its afternoon stroll in the Prado, can all find a place of prayer close at hand. There are no chairs, and very few benches. Most of the floors are matted, and the people kneel on this. The vestments of the clergy are richly embroidered and very gaudy, but, like the churches themselves, are mostly very old. "No novelties" seems to be the rule. The priest of to-day wears the identical robes his predecessor of fifty, a hundred, and even two or three hundred years ago wore. You will rarely see a new garment.

The churches have all bells, of course, but no chimes. We miss the exquisite sounds of the "Sabbath bells," so grateful to the ear and so exhilarating to the spirit in the cities and villages of England. The "call to prayer," on the contrary, here reminds one forcibly of the prison bells of Newgate announcing the exit from the world of the soul of some unfortunate criminal. It is dull, heavy, and monotonous, the same to-day as it was in the monastic ages. Take it whichever way you will in Madrid, religion seems to be a miserable and gloomy thing. Miserable in its pomp and show, with its tinkling bells, gilded candlesticks, and tawdry altars, its dirty images, and their still dirtier clothing, cold and gloomy in its services—a fitting match for the wretched outside and dark inside of its temples. I strolled into the church of San Gines, in the Calle Arenal. It is approached by nine stone steps leading to a small paved court-yard, which a hundred years ago evidently was the parish burying ground, as a few of the old and almost defaced gravestones still remain. In one corner is what looks very much like an old English bathing machine, minus the wheels, but on approaching it you find it is an "Escritorio publico," one of those curious but very necessary institutions in a country like this, where the art of writing is not known by the many. Here the poor and unlearned can go and have their letters written for them, and read for them, for a few cuartos, and with the utmost professions of "inviolable secrecy." These "Escritorios" exist all over Spain, and in Madrid there are several. The proprietor of one of them, doubtless finding time hang on his hands, has lately added the sale of Bibles, Gospels, and tracts, in Spanish, to his business, and is doing a brisk trade. "Here we sell the Holy Scriptures," "Here you can buy the Gospels for two cuartos (ld.) each," and similar announcements appear in his little window.

But to return to the church of San Gines. On each side of the steps was a man selling pin-cushions and porcelain ornaments, the former mostly taking the shape of Christ in the cradle, and the latter Christ on the cross. Shocking as this making a "mart of merchandise" of the temple on the Sabbath may appear, one might charitably excuse it from the religious associations connected with the articles sold; but mount the steps into the yard, and your charity vanishes on seeing there a vendor of children's rattles and other toys busily plying his vocation, and doing a "good stroke" with pious mothers and tender fathers as they emerge from the sacred precincts and set out on their way to the "little ones at home." Inside the porch, which is dark and gloomy, and smells musty from age, you find an army of beggars. This church seems to grant this privilege especially to the blind, and the words "ciego, ciego" ring in your ears from a chorus of fifteen or sixteen of them in all sorts of rags and tatters. "Senorito, an alms to the blind;" "Senorita, remember the blind. Help the blind, God will pay you. Pity the blind, and Mary will reward you." Standing some time in this porch, I came to the conclusion that all who were thus engaged were not blind. When no one was near they kept silence. As footsteps approached they began their whine, but always distinguished the sex of the comers.

As the people emerged from the church I noticed several of the men avail themselves of the shelter of its porch to light the cigars and cigarettes they had reverently put out on entering. From San Gines I went to the Church of the Italianos, which was too full for me to enter. Outside, in the street, was a small table covered with black velvet, with dirty gold edgings, on which was a wax figure of a human bust from the waist upwards in the midst of what was intended to represent flames. The eyes had a very beseeching look upwards, and the whole visage betokened intense suffering. On each side of the figure was a glass lantern with a lighted candle. In front was a locked tin box with a hole in the top, and an inscription in front to the effect that alms were solicited to release from Purgatory the souls of the poor who die in the General Hospital. A man was in charge of this box, who was selling for a real a little book explanatory of the "Forty Hours' Jubilee," and giving the various churches at which it is to be held for each day in the year.

As I passed along the streets I noticed the walls covered with bills of the day's performances at the various theatres. At the Teatro Espanol, at half-past eight, Le Luna de Hiel; at the Variedades, performances at half-past four, and again at eight, and again at a quarter to ten; at the Opera, a Grand Masked Ball; another at the Infantil, another at the Zarzuela, another at the Capellanes. At the Circo de Price, a grand exhibition of wild beasts; and at the Plaza de Toros, a Bull-fight at half-past three, ending with a grand display of fireworks. An "extra attraction" was to be introduced for "this day only, and the first for many years"—viz., a combat between a wild boar and dogs. I passed the bull-ring about half-past four, and saw the dead carcasses of two noble "toros" dragged out from the portal by the usual three gaily-caparisoned mules; and heard the enthusiastic shouts of the assembled thousands which greeted the entrance of the boar into the arena, and the loud barking of his canine enemies, as they were launched upon him to make a Spanish holiday.

AMERICAN NOTES.

In a powerful discourse delivered to a large audience, at one of the theatre services which our American brethren are holding with so much success, Dr. Freeman Clarke said with point and truth:

"Jonathan Edwards, in one of his sermons, describes the saints in heaven looking down and seeing their relatives in endless misery, and happy in the sight and glorifying God for His justice. Jesus Christ, on the contrary, describes the rich man in torment looking up to Abraham, and desirous, if he could not himself escape his fate, to have his relatives saved from a like fate. So I think the wicked rich man in the mind of Jesus, better than the saint in the mind of Jonathan Edwards."

The Liberal Christian has a notice of Dr. Beard's "Manual of Christian Evidence" by Dr. Bellows, who says:

"This interesting and instructive volume, by the venerable historian and champion of Unitarianism, Dr. J. R. Beard, of Manchester, is well worth the attention of theological students, and even of general readers. It goes over too much ground to be very systematic or exact, but it is all the more fresh and interesting to the common reader on that account. Nowhere can one find a more pleasant and candid account of Renan himself. Indeed, one of the charms of the book is the numerous biographical notices of distinguished men, connected with the evidences of natural and revealed religion, which the author has skilfully thrown in. It makes the work thoroughly pleasant reading, as well as instructive criticism and argumentative dissertation. Dr. Beard has a spirit as fresh and cheerful as if he had not spent a long life in an active ministry, and a studious devotion to theological learning. There is nothing dry, dogmatic, or unelastic in his views or feelings."

And after giving the contents of each chapter, Dr. Bellows, speaking of the Eighth, which he regards as the most interesting and important in the volume, says:

"It treats with competent learning, and in a free yet devout spirit, the testimonies of the New Testament literature to the reality and historic truth of Jesus's life and character. It disproves the alleged spuriousness or legendary character of the Gospels, adduces the concessions of Strauss, whose earnestness the author contrasts with Renan's levity; discusses the claims of the fourth Gospel with candour, and finally shows the universality, the Divine tenderness and the absolute adaptedness of the religion of Christ to the wants of our common humanity." And in conclusion Dr. Bellows adds: "This work, sufficiently learned and scholarly, is yet still more truly popular and attractive to the general reader. It differs from other works on Christian evidences by the absence of formal logic and a nicely woven chain of testimony. It rather communicates faith by its spirit and temper, and catches the confidence of the reader by its naturalness, frankness, simplicity of heart, and high-toned confidence in truth. There is something specially confidential and personal in the author's relation with his reader, which charms and instructs. We hope earnestly to see a considerable demand for the book in this country."

We mentioned some time ago that the American Unitarian Association was co-operating with the African Methodist Episcopal Church for the good of the coloured people in the States, who, it is found, can be most successfully reached by the agency of ministers raised from among themselves. Without the least compromise of their own theological position, both parties have worked together most amicably in certain broad methods of intellectual, moral, and spiritual elevation, which are recognised by Christians of every name. As we learn from its Monthly Journal, the money placed in the hands of the joint committee by the American Unitarian Association has been thus employed:

1. A certain proportion has been devoted to the aid of worthy and needy students at Wilberforce College, and other institutions;
2. Another proportion to aid in the support of teachers in these. 3. Another to provide tracts and papers approved by the joint committee for circulation; 4. And the largest of all for the establishment of libraries, designed for the better education of the ministers and others who may seek improvement in this way. We shall watch with interest this novel plan of two sects working together for Christian ends, and heartily wish it may be attended with success.

We learn from the Liberal Christian that Massachusetts has one hundred and seventy-four Unitarian churches.

The American writer, Carleton, in a letter from Salt Lake City, says:

"There is no religious doctrine too absurd for human belief. It is possible for ignorance, fanaticism, and superstition, in the name of religion, to transform sensuality to virtue. Do we ask if these women of Salt Lake believe in polygamy? I answer, yes. They believe that Brigham is the servant of God; that his revelations are from God. They are sincere and earnest in their belief. Do you ask if they like polygamy? I answer, no. They accept it as a religious sacrifice. It is the will of God. Accepting it, they glorify him, secure their own salvation, and bestow eternal happiness upon souls waiting for earthly tabernacles. I venture to say that there is not one really happy woman in Utah, if united to a man with more than one wife. Polygamy is against nature. You see nature's protest in the sad and careworn countenance of every woman you meet. Brigham preached upon this unhappiness of the sisters, saying: 'It is frequently happening that women say they are unhappy. Men will say: My wife, though a most excellent woman, has not seen a happy day since I took my second wife.' There is the secret. Woman's love must be undivided. It is not to be shared by another—a score."

OPEN CHURCH PAPERS.

By BROOKE HERFORD.

X.—OBJECTIONS TO THE OFFERTORY.

ONE of the objections which I know weighs a good deal with some of my friends is this: they think that support by the offertory is likely to have a tendency to lessen the independence of the ministry. They speak of its being undignified to be "sending the box round for the minister every Sunday," and point out the fear of offending his congregation to which he may be subject, when any such offence may be immediately visited upon him in the amount of the day's offertory. Now, in the first place, if this argument is valid, it would carry us not to pew-rents but to a general system of endowments. If the principle is accepted that the support is to depend at all upon the hearers, the most independent plan is that which will widen as much as possible the area from which the support is drawn. A minister whose income is raised by two or three hundred people of very different classes will, other things being equal, be more independent than a minister who is at the mercy of a few rich seatholders. Now the offertory, as I have shewn, is the only plan that practically enables the poor to do their fair share towards the support of their place of worship, and in so doing it helps to place the minister in a far more independent position. As to the unpleasantness of the box going round every Sunday, I can only say that it seems to me much more unpleasant for the pew-rent collector to be going round every quarter. Let any one who doubts which plan involves the most serious unpleasantness, ask any pew-rent collector about the people who are a little in arrears, and learn how their subscriptions, thus required of them in the lump, press upon very many even of those above the class earning weekly wages; and I think he will feel with me that there is a truer dignity and more real independence in a plan which, while putting it fairly to every worshipper that it is his duty to help, leaves it to each to give much or little as he may be able, asks not whether any one's gift be a penny or a sovereign, and precludes the possibility of any one ever being troubled for arrears.

Some feel it a difficulty that the income on the offertory plan is likely to be uncertain. Now, seeing that wherever the offertory has been fairly tried as yet, in about a dozen of our own chapels, and in many of the established churches, it has, in every instance as far as I know, resulted in some increase, generally in very considerable increase of funds, I do not see that there is any great discomfort in the degree of uncertainty involved. Any congregation adopting the offertory might safely guarantee their minister that his income should not fall short of what it had been previously, and most ministers would not be altogether averse to an uncertainty which merely took the form of leaving the amount of increase doubtful. When, however, the minister himself has faith in the plan, and in his people, he will do more wisely to ask no guarantee. If any guarantee is given, the people, if the amount raised even slightly exceeds it, are almost sure to feel something of satisfaction, possibly may be led to relax a little in their efforts. Let a minister simply put it to his people that it is their affair to keep him comfortably while he does his religious work faithfully among them, and that he asks no guarantee but that they will do their best, and every generous feeling is aroused, and he is sure to find that they will do far better than either he could have dared to ask or they could have undertaken to promise.

As to the open system and the offertory creating a greater inducement to sensation preaching, their natural effect is exactly the opposite. And for this very simple reason: that, inasmuch as it is more difficult to induce the outside public to attend a place where the seats are allotted than where they are all open, any minister, whether his powers be small or great, will require to make greater and more special efforts to win a good congregation if he has to invite them to a pewed chapel than if he can invite them to one that is open. My own experience strongly confirms this. I never did so little in the way of advertised courses of lectures as I do now; never found so little announcement necessary. Indeed, one of the most encouraging effects of the open church plan is its creating, on the part of outsiders, of a feeling of being able to come perfectly freely. In any chapel in a large town there will always be a floating average of casual attenders. It is a point of the very greatest importance to get these to feel able to come just as often as they may be inclined. Now they do not feel so where they have to be shown into a pew. In that case, after attending a few times, they begin to think that it will seem strange for them to keep on attending constantly without taking a sitting; and if they are not prepared to commit themselves so far (and it is not to be expected that they should be until after a considerable time has elapsed), they give over attending except at intervals. Now, in the case of an open church, these casual outsiders will keep on attending, week after week, for months together, sometimes for a year or more. They do not feel that they are committing themselves. They are perfectly free to go. Paying their little contribution every Sunday, they feel just as independent as if they had sittings, but without being in any way compromised. Thus time is secured for their prejudices to be gradually overcome, and for them to become so attached to the service that at length they can venture to take the step of enrolling themselves as members of the congregation, a step the difficulty of which, to orthodox people coming amongst Unitarians, it is almost impossible to estimate.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

UNCLASSICS.

UNVERSED in classic lore, and all unread

In the great masters of old Greece and Rome,
Much of the modern is to me half dead,
And wholly dead is some.

Unknown the instances on which they build,

The names they use, and references, unknown;
Though in good English given, to me they yield,
Instead of bread, a stone.

Excluded thus, what chance have I to make,

From gleanings in my own unlettered waste,
Aught of commanding interest to take
The literary taste?

For what would all its learning serve were it

With any recognition to receive
As critically "literatesque" and fit,
The unschooled things I weave?

I must not hope to win such classic praise,

But trust for lower audience; and for themes,
Find them at home, along the trodden ways,
In work-begotten dreams.

Or, if among the humbler things I find

A dim deep thought that wants the light of words,
It will be such as for the unclassic mind
God every day affords.

And that I'll give as plainly as I may

In Saxon tongue, for Saxon eye and ear,
So plainly that the classic taste will say,
"Pooh! pooh! there's nothing here!"

THE "ROB ROY" ON THE JORDAN.

AT the end of the letter which we gave part of last week from the adventurous canoe voyager, Mr. McGregor, he mentioned that he was about to launch the Rob Roy on Lake Hulch, and descend the sacred river. Another letter from Tell Hum, Sea of Galilee, dated January 22nd, informs us that he carried out his intention, and with what results. He says:

I brought my canoe from Damascus round the spur of Hermon by very rugged roads, with the ice crackling under our feet and the snow beside our path. The Rob Roy was then launched on the perennial source of Jordan, near Hasbany, and paddled down until she was transferred to the pool at Dan, where from out of the moist earth there gushes the largest single spring in the world. The third source is at Banias, the ancient Caesarea-Philippi, where a torrent rushes out of the rocks, and then these three rivers, each born full grown, the Hasbany, the Leddani, and the Banias converge in the plain of Earleb, and unite in a small lake 'the waters of Merom.' To trace the course of water through this marsh, eight miles long and four wide, was my object, and the Rob Roy was carried to the furthest point where a horse could take her, and then I launched her alone. The plain is flat. The people are nearly black in colour. The houses are little reed huts, and great buffaloes—the 'bulls of Bashan'—plash through the morass or swim the numerous streams. The natives ran from the fields to see the canoe. They shouted aloud for 'buck-sheesh' and threw mud and stones to stop me for this. Their numbers increased and their excitement. Soon they waded out to intercept me, but I eluded them. Then they stripped and swam to me, but I distanced them every one. Men now joined with guns, and roared out to me to come ashore. Women and children joined the chorus, 'Baroda, baroda' (guns, guns) until at last one man fired at me quite close. I still paddled on, laughing and trying to keep a bold front, until at the village of Salhyeh a dozen naked men, just like savages, with faces tattooed, and only long, twisted top-knots of hair on their heads, were waiting in mid-stream with poles and bludgeons. It was impossible to paddle past without striking these men, and one of them, waving a huge shank bone of a buffalo in one hand, seized my canoe. The others soon closed, and they dragged me ashore. I refused to get out, as I knew they would rifle her, and my pistol at any rate would have disappeared, so they hoisted the canoe upon their shoulders and bore it, with me sitting inside, to the tent of the Arab sheikh. A large crowd followed, shouting and dancing. Insisted upon having the Rob Roy brought into the tent. A grand palaver was held. I told them I was an Englishman. 'Sowa, sowa,' they said (friend). I said I must pass on to the lake. They assured me there was no road. I said I must go to see. The seniors of the tribe assembled to consult, and several precious hours were wasted in talk. Meanwhile I made sketches for some, gave a lesson in geography to others, fired off some wax matches for the rest, and cooked my luncheon of hot soup in my 'canoe cuisine' to the wonder and delight of all. Over and over they pressed for 'buck-sheesh,' and I answered, 'Certainly, but it must be given to your sheikh.' He winked at me. I knew I had bought him then. I privately gave him a gold Napoleon, and he pressed me to stop the night in his tent, but I was at last allowed to go on, and so in triumph launched the canoe again on the fast-flowing stream. The crowd soon followed, and on both sides of the river, when away from their sheikh, they began again for 'buck-sheesh.' One man pointed his gun at me at least twenty times, but he did not fire. My speed tired them all out except a dozen. These were nearly all naked, and they dashed into the water like ducks to ford the countless streams. At last the river branched out into three, and the branch I followed ran straight to the great barrier of reeds, papyrus, and canes. This is three miles broad, one mile thick, and often fifteen feet high. Still I plunged on, and at length I jumped into the water myself. A sharp twinge on my bare leg reminded me that here are water-snakes and that in a pool near Banias leeches are caught by thousands merely by a momentary dip of the naked limbs. Having fully proved that no boat could go further (and probably no human being could in any way whatever penetrate this marvelous floating jungle), I acknowledged they were right, that there was no road, and I turned back. After a most tiring paddle against stream to the village, I took my canoe to a tent. The village worthies assembled at night, and a bowl of excellent 'busknoosoo' was brought, with delicious clotted buffalo milk. We at the top of the table (or floor, rather) ate with three wooden spoons, the rest with their hands, but all from one bowl. Everyone gave me his pipe to smoke, and I lighted my canoe lamp and had a page of the Times to read. Only one of them had ever before seen an Englishman. The great fire in the tent now smouldered down, and they gave me carpet to sleep upon, for my clothes were wet. Seven hours before this I had managed to send off one of them on a good horse to my dragoman, who was, with my tents, many miles away, and in the dead of the night I heard his distant hail, as the faithful fellow, Michael Harry, of Beyrout, came over the marsh, after fourteen hours of riding that day. I shouted aloud, and the old Arab in the tent was amazed. Things now changed entirely, and after a good sleep I took the Rob Roy next day round the obstruction of reeds. Four days I spent in her upon Lake Huleh, and I succeeded in finding the mouth of the Jordan there, and went up three miles to an inner lake of great beauty, where most probably no man has ever been. I traversed the lake in all directions, and took soundings and compass bearings everywhere, and without entering into details, I may state the following as my conclusions:—

The Hasbany River is the true Jordan. The River Leddun spreads almost at its birth into a hundred streams, and gets lost. The Banias and Hasbany Rivers each lose one-half of their bulk in this way, but they unite at Tell Sheikh Yusuf. The united stream runs south about three miles, and then spreads into a morass. On this is a vast floating forest of papyrus and cane, perfectly dark inside. I could never penetrate more than 3ft. I measured one cane, and (allowing 1ft. for the root) it was just 20ft. high. The papyrus is called babir by the Arabs. Many of the stalks of it are as thick as my arm. The water percolates below and through the spongy marsh, and loses at least one-half of its volume by absorption and evaporation. The impassable barrier is only a mile thick. Until it comes to Jacob's bridge the river flows deep and smooth, but the canoe had to be carried past the long line of torrent. After that I paddled her into the Lake of Gennesareth, where I have spent six hours of the fine summer-like day in a careful scrutiny of the water on the north-east shore."

NAMING TOWNS AND STREETS.

In the American Christian Examiner, Dr. Freeman Clarke has an article on this subject, which contains some curious particulars. He tells us that scarcely a town in Massachusetts but has borrowed its name from some English town. There are in the United States twenty-four Fairfields, twenty-six Adamses, twelve Adamsvilles, thirty-nine Salems, nine Roxburys, twelve Bostons, five Baltimores, two Philadelphias, forty-five towns named Richland, thirteen named Rome, and eleven Paris. The insignificant name of Centre has been given to forty-seven towns; nineteen have been called Browns; ten, Smith, beside many Smithfields, Smithlands, Smithburgs, and Smithvilles. There are ten towns for which no better name could be found than Settlement. Of statesmen and heroes there are fifty-seven towns named for Perry, fifty-two for Wayne, twenty-seven for Van Buren, fifty-seven for Harrison, eighty-three for Franklin, eighty for Jefferson, one hundred and twenty for Jackson, and one hundred and thirty-four for Washington. There are in the Union, ninety-nine towns named Union, and sixty-five named Liberty; from which it might be inferred that our American cousins love Union about one-third more than they love Liberty. The worst point about this repetition is that there are often many towns of the same name in the same State. Thus, there are thirty-nine towns named Jackson in the single State of Indiana; eight towns named Pike, and thirteen named Springfield, in Ohio; six called Sugar Creek in Indiana; thirty called Union in Ohio; and thirteen called Union in Arkansas.

Dr. Clarke gives a curious, but barbarous, derivation of the original name of Cincinnati, which, he tells us, was composed of four languages, Greek, Latin, French, and English. It was Losantiville—meaning a town opposite to the mouth of the river Licking: L for Licking; os, mouth; anti, opposite to; and vill, town. Pedantry this with a vengeance!

Dr. Clarke suggests a remedy for the inconvenience arising from the present method of naming places, which might be taken advantage of by us, as well as his countrymen. A name, he says, should be chosen that is individual, that sounds well, and is in good taste. It should have some local or historical association. This he enforces with great plausibility in reference to streets. Numerals have no meaning and are hard to remember. Why plaster a city all over with high-sounding, fancy names, when they were once trodden by men and women whose names are historic? Every city should preserve its history in its streets.

A HAREM.

In an American publication we have the following account by a lady of a visit to one of these prison-houses:

We were shown into an ante-room, where we waited until our guide had announced us. We then followed him into a small room, with alcoves upon three sides. In these alcoves, reclining upon couches, were the inmates of the Harem. They were variously occupied, one in adding an extra touch of henna to her finger nails; another in cutting the designs from bits of flowered silk; a third was at her favourite occupation—preparing candy. A brazier stood upon a tripod before her couch, and she was lazily shaping the sweet compound, with more the air of a time-killer than that of one desiring to accomplish aught.

Their gross, uncouth figures were covered with badly-shaped robes of thin material; the braids of their black hair were disheveled; the barbarity of barbarism was typified in the massive appendages that dangled from their ears; bracelets were upon both wrists and ankles; rings in profusion were upon their fingers; their bare feet were carelessly slipped into sandals—making a tout ensemble indicative, in the highest degree, of vulgar, low-bred luxuriousness. Upon being presented to them, they expressed much cordiality, and beckoned us to sit beside them on their couches. The red hair of one of our party gained for her the greater share of attentions. They were curious to know if any application would convert their own jet black locks into so beautiful a colour. From the surprise and admiration they manifested, it seemed they had never looked upon the like before. Our complexion, features, and dress were marvellous to them, and we thought to add to their surprise by telling them we were from America, but the name had evidently no significance for them. They made no inquiries respecting our country, our homes, or our customs—only our apparel excited their inquisitiveness.

The effect of this aimless life was visible upon all the inmates of the Harem. Not a countenance was lighted with intelligence. Large, lustrous eyes; long, silken lashes; arched eye-brows, pearly teeth; alabaster complexion—these fairest daughters of Circeia were to me, compared with thinking women, as wax fruit to nature's own sun-ripened. Had our journey been direct from busy American homes, whose labours and interests are shared equally by women, the sense of these luxurious surroundings, so wanting in all that makes of life living, would have seemed even more appalling; but as our journey in the centre of so termed European civilization had prepared us to meet more stoically serfdom of soul as well as body. Swaddled in the wrappings of ages of degradation, of ignorance and superstition, shall we ask of these women, bought with a price, if they will accept freedom and education? And if they say No, must they still bear the sacred name of mother, when every tendril they give forth adds to the Upas shade that makes the whole land pestilential?

Yet, with heaven's own approval stamped upon its face, this Eastern land only awaits a regenerated government to become an earthly paradise. And this it will be when mothers worthy of the trust rear noble sons; a principle holding true with Christian as well as Mussulman nations. Ye who would have the stream pure, so make ye also the fountain!

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE sixty-second social meeting of the members and friends of this society was held at Radley's Hotel, Blackfriars, on Wednesday week. The weather was exceedingly unpropitious, and the attendance was accordingly much smaller than usual. Mr. I. M. WADSWORTH was called to the chair, and among others present were the Revs. P. W. Clayden, M. C. Gascoigne, T. Rix, R. Spears, James Cooper, J. Taylor, T. L. Marshall, and A. Lunn (Chatham); Dr. Davison, and Messrs. Richardson, J. T. Preston, I. S. Lister, W. N. Green, J. Conway, H. H. Stannus, S. S. Taylor, J. Spiller, G. Carter, A. Laurence, R. Keating, A. Titford, &c.

The subject announced for discussion was "The Progress of Religious Liberty."

The CHAIRMAN, who was received with applause, said that "civil and religious liberty all the world over" had always been a favourite motto with us. How far in the history of our church we have been faithful to it, he must leave it to them to judge. There was a time—a very short time ago—when we had to stand upon the defensive. We find now many persons belonging to Orthodox churches who are far in advance of us, and we are sometimes obliged to take the attitude of Conservatism in advocating principles which were once unpopular. As ages move on it is the intention of the Almighty that men's minds should open up to new truths, and each century as it comes reveals new meanings of the old Gospel, and has its special mission for its own age. Our duty, and the preacher's duty especially, is to understand what the Gospel of the nineteenth century is. He who could do this and faithfully preach it, is the Prophet, the Evangelist of our age. Our particular branch of the Christian Church should take the foremost position. It is entirely free; not bound down by creeds or articles of faith; we have perfect freedom to bring criticism and learning to bear upon the Scriptural records, and to speak in reverence all we think. With the Gospel in our hands, and the experience of past ages, we ought to be able to speak to the multitudes who belong to no church but have deep religious convictions, and hold fast to the great fundamental principles of religion. There seemed to be wanting to our particular branch of the Christian Church a clear notion of what is the work before us, and then an earnest spirit to do it. The way to advance our religious opinions is to throw ourselves heartily into the work that lies around us. (Applause.)

The Rev. R. SPEARS, who was received with much applause, then opened the discussion in a long and able address, in which he gave a clear summary of the progress of religious liberty in modern times. He commenced by referring to the strife and warfare throughout Christendom on account of the unjust demands made by churches and priesthoods on national and individual life, the suppression of the freedom of religious worship, and the unjust taxation for the support of religious faith and worship. Mr. Spears reviewed the indications of the great advance made among the nations of the world in the last fifty or a hundred years in the direction of religious liberty. In India there are religious reformers who are tending to destroy the system of caste and introduce freedom of thought and worship. In the West we find in the United States of America a nation without a State Church, where religion nevertheless flourishes. The probable extinction of the Irish Establishment was another auspicious movement in the direction of religious liberty. The way was gradually being prepared for the abolition of the Establishment in Scotland, while in Jamaica, we learn from a despatch recently forwarded from the Colonial Office, that the connection between Church and State is soon to cease. In Spain the most hopeful sign of the Revolution is the ecclesiastical one—the right of free religious worship. In Austria there were also most encouraging signs of religious liberty, as indicated in the recent address of the Prime Minister opposing State religion as a superfluous thing; while in Italy the conflict between the King and the Pope arises from the demand of the Italian people for greater religious liberty and the extinction of ecclesiastical monopolies and privileges inconsistent with civil and religious liberty. The progress of opinion within the last twenty years is very remarkable, especially in countries which were once considered the most retrograde and priest-ridden in Europe—Spain, Austria, and Italy. Religious truth and religious freedom are twin sisters. The "Gospel of the nineteenth century," to which the chairman had alluded, is a mixture of Paganism and Christianity, of tyranny and freedom. Their object should be to bring back the Church to the first ages of Christian history, to the simple lessons taught in the life and teachings of our Saviour. What in the present time so much impedes the progress of our views is creeds, State Churches, and the repressive influence of public and private opinion. Wherever a church has laid its basis in perfect freedom it has ultimately ascended to Unitarianism. Instances in point were the English Presbyterians, the Unitarians in America, who sprung from Congregationalism, the "Christians" and Universalists of the same country, who have developed simple Unitarianism. This shows the intimate connection between the free interpretation of the Bible and our own views. We have, therefore, everything to hope and nothing to fear from freedom. We may not live to see absolute, perfect liberty, but we can range ourselves in the ranks of those who are struggling for impartial justice and unrestricted liberty all the world over. (Much applause.)

The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN, in response to a call from the chair, said he thought that the chairman and Mr. Spears both meant the same thing in their allusion to the Gospel of the nineteenth and first centuries. What we want is the ancient Gospel applied to the nineteenth century in new meanings. He took very much the same view of religious liberty as Mr. Spears, looking upon the question from the dissenting point of view. But he must say that there was something more in religious liberty than mere exemption from the interference of the State with religious matters. He had no hesitation in saying that there was more religious liberty in the State Church than in the leading Nonconformist denominations. (Hear.) What were called Free Churches were based upon the principle of uniformity of dogma, and the necessity of enforcing dogma upon their members often led to the infringement of religious liberty. In the Established Church, on the other hand, although in defiance of law and custom and the creeds which they repeat, men take the liberty which is professedly withheld from them; and therefore in the Established Church the principle of religious freedom is making progress. In the Established Church, and in all the periods of the world of which we know anything, religious liberty has rested chiefly on scepticism. The world has not yet arrived at a state when it will rest upon the universal religious principles that lie at the root of our nature. In its present condition free inquiry must begin with scepticism as long as Churches rest upon the dogma that man's salvation rests upon something to be believed. If we admit that any dogma must be held as a condition of salvation, or even of Christian communion, we shall thereby put a restraint upon our religious liberty. The tendency of the age is to destroy one great department of religious tyranny, interference of Government with religious freedom, making men pay for a faith they do not believe; but there is something more serious than this, and that is the alienation of friends and old companions on account of conscientious fidelity to our own principles. That is an evil which is not yet destroyed in the world. There is scarcely any one who has made the change from Orthodoxy to Unitarianism, or from Unitarianism to some yet freer form of faith—if there be one—who has not felt this: the loss of friendship and social penalties. We must thoroughly understand that religious liberty can never be complete until every man is at liberty to follow his own conscience, and is ready to allow that whatever religious convictions he arrives at his opinions do not affect his salvation; and as a corollary that they do not interfere with our conviction that he is a sincere and conscientious man, and do not affect our friendship and appreciation. He could not agree with Mr. Spears that absolute religious liberty would always lead to Unitarianism. It might lead to something beyond Unitarianism. But he never met with a Unitarian who would not rejoice in the progress of free thought, even if it led to conclusions quite different from his own. This was our peculiar glory and distinction. (Applause.)

The CHAIRMAN, in explanation, said he did not go back to the first ages for the Gospel of Christ or of God, although he did not give up one single element of truth in the past; yet God must be revealing himself now as well as eighteen centuries ago. Therefore, he wanted—with the Scriptures in our hands also—to have an open eye to the present, an open ear and heart to understand what God is speaking to us in this nineteenth century, and in this way we must be just as liberal to every Christian church.

The discussion was continued by Revs. M. C. GASCOIGNE and T. RIX, Messrs. N. M. TAYLER, S. S. TAYLER, the CHAIRMAN, who quoted some extraordinary passages from an extremely orthodox catechism published in America, and expressed his belief that such opinions were no longer held by any prominent church or theologian; by Mr. H. STANNUS, Mr. J. T. PRESTON, and the Rev. A. LUNN; and after a few words in reply from Mr. SPEARS, the meeting was brought to a close by prayer from the Rev. JAMES COOPER.

INTELLIGENCE

BLACKLEY: PRESENTATION.—On Saturday evening last, a tea party was held in the Schoolroom, for the purpose of taking leave of Mr. and Mrs. Rushton, who are going to Hindley. Mr. Lamming presided, and addressed the meeting. Afterwards, on behalf of the members of the congregation and teachers and scholars of the school, Mr. John Eckersley presented Mr. Rushton with a valuable marble-mounted timepiece, and Mrs. Rushton with a beautiful walnut workbox. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. Latta, Johnson, and Bennett. Regret was expressed at the departure of Mr. and Mrs. Rushton, and many good wishes uttered for their future prosperity and success. In reply, Mr. Rushton reviewed the course of progress at Blackley during the last seven years. In that time it was stated that nearly a thousand pounds had been raised by bazaars and subscriptions in connection with the chapel and school, both of which are now in a healthy condition, and promise well for the future.

KIRRIEMUIR.—The fourth lecture, illustrative of the principles of Unitarian Christianity, was given last Monday night, by the Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee, to an audience of about two hundred. When the discussion began, it needed considerable energy and tact to keep order. Questions were answered and objections met, apparently with some success.

LEEDS: SCHOLARS' MEMORIAL TO THE LATE GEORGE TALBOT, ESQ.—On Tuesday evening, the 2nd inst., the scholars in the Mill-hill schools took occasion to manifest their respect for the memory of the late George Talbot, Esq., who had been a warm friend and supporter of the schools, by presenting an address, and a large and well-executed photographic portrait in oil of the deceased gentleman to Grosvenor Talbot, Esq. The portrait bore a small silver plate, on which was engraved:

"Presented by the scholars of the Mill-hill schools as a token of their respect for the memory of the late George Talbot, Esq.—Leeds, March 2nd, 1869."

The presentation was suitably acknowledged by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot. It is intended that the portrait shall be hung in the Congregational Hall, alongside those of other eminent Leeds Unitarians.

LONDON: CARTER-LANE.—The annual sermons on behalf of this mission were preached on Sunday, at Unity Church, by the Rev. W. James, of Bristol, the collections at both services amounting to £65. 8s. 2d., which sum was afterwards increased, by the contributions of friends unable to be present, to £69. 9s. 2d. On the following evening, the seventh annual meeting of the friends and subscribers was held at the Mission, under the presidency of Samuel Shaen, Esq. Among those present were the Revs. Thomas Hunt (curate of Lambeth), William James, Henry Ierson, M.A., T. L. Marshall, R. Spears, T. Hunter, T. Rix, and J. Cooper; and Messrs. Bartram, Harold Lees, J. S. Lister, J. T. Preston, Stannus, Cowell Stepany, S. S. Taylor, A. and W. Titford, J. M. Wade, &c. The treasurer, Mr. John Warren's report showed an expenditure of £607. 12s. 9d. and a balance due to him of about £18. The report of the committee, read by the secretary, Dr. Davison, expressed great satisfaction in the educational department. The average attendance in the mixed school at Christmas last was ninety-five. The number in the infant school was 162. Mr. F. Nettlefold read the teachers' report; after which the Rev. John Taylor, the missionary, read a long and extremely interesting report, of which the following is an abstract:—

The congregation now number some 50 worshippers; of these 45 had taken members' tickets, and contributed £5 towards the funds. The Lord's supper had been administered twice, at which about 30 attended. The body of teachers had also been increased from the congregation, who were mostly poor people. The Band of Faith had not been quite so successful as was anticipated, still there was some vitality among its members, some of whom conducted the Wednesday evening lectures. A sum of £4. 10s. had been raised towards the purchase of an harmonium; they now appealed for help from their richer friends. (In the course of the evening the chairman stated that the whole amount required had been subscribed.) In the mixed school of 126 children, 73 were qualified for examination; of these 65 presented themselves, all of whom passed in all the branches except arithmetic, where five failed. During the past year, under the kind and amiable supervision of Miss Watchurst, the infant school had doubled its numbers. In addition to the various agencies before mentioned, there was the evening school under the zealous conduct of Mr. Gregg, the old scholars' meetings, the mothers' meetings, the reading-room and library, the penny readings, a mutual benefit society with thirty-two members and a sum of £114 standing to the capital account. Passing on to the out-door operations, Mr. Taylor gave various instances of the efficacious aid rendered to many of the poor by the sanatorium, which had been opened during the summer in Surrey, at an expense of £28. The adoption of the reports was moved by the Rev. Thomas Hunt, who stated that during the past two years he had buried about 10,000 (?) persons, and married about 1,000 couples. Having regard to the improvidence of many of those who came to be married, he had greater pleasure in burying than in marrying them. He found that there was a great deal of labour to be done among the poor, and but a small return. Referring to the various Christian sects, he lamented the want of unity amongst them; there seemed to be less of charity or love than belief. He knew he was addressing an assembly of Unitarians, and he frankly stated that the name Unitarian was the worst invented except perhaps that of Trinitarian. (Laughter.) He should endeavour to convey the idea that God is our Father in heaven, who cares for us and guides us. The want of unity amongst Christians was the cause of the loss of a great deal of power. Mr. Stannus, Rev. H. Ierson, and most of the other friends we have named, afterwards took part in the meeting.

MANCHESTER—STRANGEWAYS UNITARIAN FREE CHURCH.—On Wednesday evening, the 24th of February, the annual meeting of this congregation was held in the school-room; about 200 persons present. Mr. Harry Rawson presided, and after reviewing the events of the past year in other denominations, congratulated the congregation on the harmony that existed amongst them, and the success of the work done during the year. The annual report of the committee was read by Mr. George S. Woolley, the warden of the church. The following extracts may be read with interest:—

"The roll of members this year shows an increase of 46 names over that of 1868; the numbers being respectively 297 and 343. Fifty-eight new names are added to the roll, viz.: 14 of persons who have recently joined the church, and 44 of members who have attended for some time, but have not till this year given in their names. The attendance at the ordinary services has been more uniformly large than in any previous year. On many Sundays the evening congregation has been as numerous as the morning one; and has been very satisfactory in all cases. The offertory has worked with increased success, producing £515. 8s. 2d., nearly £16 more than in the preceding year. The arrangements for collecting remain, in principle, unchanged. Three of the committee, with three other members of the congregation, are appointed at the end of each month to undertake the duty for the month ensuing. It has been very pleasant to observe the kind and willing spirit in which this non-official aid has been rendered. It has had, too, an excellent effect, in widely diffusing, by the sympathy of co-operation, a stronger personal interest in the congregation's affairs, than would otherwise have been possible. The committee may perhaps allude, in this connection, to the yet deeper conviction, which another year's experience has produced, of the marked advantages of the present over the old, and generally adopted systems of church finance. The greater ease with which the required supplies are obtained;—the extraordinary regularity of the amounts received quarter by quarter;—the exemption now enjoyed from the annoyances and expense incidental to the collection, by an agent, of the contributions of the members;—the facility with which the revenues of the church are made available, for the discharge in a single day, at the end of each financial period, of its various claims and obligations,—all these are matters which conduce so much to the comfort, and lessen so greatly the labours of management, that your committee have special pleasure in thus alluding to and commending them."

After the report had been read, brief addresses were delivered by Mr. Alderman S. C. Grundy, Councillor J. Ashton, the Rev. Brooke Herford, and others, and the committee for the ensuing year were elected.

NORTHAM.—On Sunday evening, Feb. 21st, the small, neat chapel at Northam, Sussex, was reopened by the Rev. J. Bayley, of Cranbrook, having been closed eleven years. About 200 persons were present. He preached in the morning at Cranbrook, in the afternoon at Rolvenden-lane, nearly eight miles distant, to about fifty persons, and in the evening at Northam, five miles from Rolvenden. The cause looks promising at both these places. It is Mr. Bayley's intention to supply the two chapels once every three weeks.

STAND.—Twelve lectures on "Founders of Orders and Sects," and six lectures on "Unitarians are not Unbelievers," have been delivered by the Rev. W. C. Squier, on Sunday evenings during the winter. They have awakened much interest, and drawn large congregations, especially those on "Swedenborg," "John Wesley," and "Joe Smith."

TAVISTOCK.—The Rev. Touzeau Parris, minister of the Abbey Chapel, having intimated that it was his intention to resign the pulpit, two special congregational meetings have been held, at the second of which a resolution requesting Mr. Parris to reconsider and, if possible, withdraw his resignation, was unanimously adopted, on the motion of Mr. W. Cross, seconded by Mr. J. Walters. We regret, however, to find that Mr. Parris felt unable to comply with the request.

WALMSLEY.—On Saturday evening last, 180 of the Walmsley congregation partook of tea together in their spacious schoolroom, after which Mr. Thos. Bromily, of Bolton, was unanimously voted to the chair. A very agreeable and pleasant evening was spent in recitations, speeches, songs, and glees, intermingled with various pieces of music on the piano.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A correspondent, with reference to the article copied from the Christian World last week, mentions that, previous to his joining the Unitarians, Mr. Appleby was a Swedenborgian minister in Birmingham, and perhaps in that capacity as far from orthodox as now; so that the reasoning of the World, founded on the assumption of his previous orthodoxy, rests on a sandy foundation.

W. N.—We had not room for your letter at the time, but are sorry we omitted to acknowledge it.

K. AND PERTH.—Next week.

THE "CHRISTOS ADELPHOS"

To the Editors.—I was surprised to find a paragraph in your last number, copied from the Bristol papers, referring to a sect with the above name as a novelty, and apparently endorsing the idea that it is unknown in this country. Allow me to correct this impression. The American who appeared in court, and stated that he thought he was the only one of his faith in England, must be sadly wanting in information concerning his own friends and fellow-believers. I am not aware that there is any society in Bristol, but there may be one or two individuals holding these views; and I have before me a list of thirty-nine towns, &c., where members of this sect are to be found. The headquarters in this country are at Birmingham, and the leader of the sect Mr. Robt. Roberts, who has published numerous works in exposition and defence of his views, and also issues monthly a magazine, called "The Ambassador of the Coming Age," which has a wide circulation. Dr. Thomas, of the United States, is the founder of the sect, and is expected shortly to visit England—a second time.

They take the name of Christadelphians, from Christos Adelpheos—disciple of Christ. A brother of mine has recently joined them, but their views are far too narrow to suit me. They are very strong in their views on the kingdom of God, expecting an early appearance of Christ upon earth, and the setting up of a literal kingdom. They also insist on the necessity of baptism by immersion, which must only be applied to those who believe "the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ." They further believe that man is not by nature immortal, that literal destruction awaits the wicked, and they believe in the non-personality of the devil. In short, they think every sect in error but themselves, and yet that their faith is necessary to salvation!—Yours respectfully, Bristol, March 1st, 1869. T. F. OSBORNE.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Pope, the other day, gave an audience to two hundred foreign Catholics, including English, French, Germans, Belgians, and Americans. They were headed by an Austrian noble. In a long address, of the most fulsome character, he spoke in extravagant terms of the blessings bestowed on mankind by the Pontificate of Pius IX., and the beneficial results to be expected from the Council, and concluded by fervent expressions of attachment to the Holy Father. The Pope, in reply, told the assembled company that he prayed the patron saints of their different countries to preserve them in peace, and that he, like themselves, entertained the best hopes of the Council, finally dismissing them with his blessing. At this point a Portuguese threw himself at the feet of the Holy Father, and in the name of the true Catholics of Portugal implored pardon for all the evil produced by the "perverted faction" which had seized on the government of that country. The Pope sought to calm this fanatic, and said that the present movement in this peninsula would soon expend itself, when the Church of ancient Lusitania, now under occultation, would recover its ascendancy, and the enemies of Catholicity there be covered with confusion. This speech has given deep offence to many of the Portuguese, and is very ill taken at the embassy, where they express astonishment that the Holy Father, without any provocation, should apply such language to the Government of his Most Faithful Majesty. Infallibility seems often at fault in mundane matters, whatever it may be in spiritual.

The arrangements for the (Ecumenical are to be decided on in June, before which the vacant cardinals' hats, twelve in number, will be bestowed. One is offered to the Archbishop of Paris, on condition that he will make a simple statement of the manner in which he has administered his diocese, but he declines to yield even this concession, and will only enter the Sacred College unshackled. Indeed, it is known at Rome that should the question of Gallicanism be raised in the Council, he will head a protest of the French episcopacy against its discussion. Hence there is an eager desire to bring him to terms.

The Vatican is placed in another difficulty by the mental eclipse of Monsignor Talbot de Malahide, who has either lost the power of speech or remains silent from stupor. The Pope has tried in vain to induce him to speak, being in great need of his assistance at a time when so many wealthy English converts and promising Ritualists are in Rome. Monsignor Talbot was to have received the Cardinal's hat in the next consistory. A consultation of physicians has been held on his condition, and recommends a sea voyage and change of scene. We should have thought this was a case for relics. If Romish authorities tell true, they have been efficacious in far more difficult ones.

Ajani, the conspirator, seems to have been by no means grateful for the commutation of his capital sentence into imprisonment for life; and when Monsignor Randi visited him in his cell to announce this decision of the Sacred Consulta, he told him that he had always been the enemy of the Pontifical Government, which he considered to be the most wicked on the face of the earth, and that he should retain this attitude to the end of his days.

The Papal Government refuses to acknowledge the Spanish Minister at Rome as representing Spain. There is no doubt a difficulty, for the recognition of the Government de facto would be to ignore what the Vatican considers the Government de jure; and then what would become of the ex-Queen?

The Rev. Shapurji Edulji, the Parsee, whose ordination by the Bishop of Oxford and appointment to an English curacy we reported a fortnight ago, writes to correct the statement that he did not purpose engaging in missionary work among his own countrymen. That, he says, is his object, but it appears that both the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel and the Church Missionary Society object to send out ordained natives. The reason of this we are unable to fathom; we should have fancied that natives, understanding the habits and modes of thought of their own people, would have known best how to influence them for good.

One would think this was hardly a time for the display of priestly intolerance on the part of Welsh clergymen, when the position of the Establishment in the Principality is beginning to be regarded as anything but equitable. A Rev. D. W. Davies, rector of Llandysilio, seems, however, to have thought otherwise. The Rev. Henry Rees, father-in-law of Mr. Davies, M.P. for Anglesey, who was looked upon as the leading man among the Welsh Presbyterians, was buried the other day in the small churchyard of Llandysilio. The funeral was attended by thousands from all parts of Wales, and no better proof was wanted of the esteem in which Mr. Rees was held than seeing the people walking through pelting rain to pay their last tribute of respect to his memory. In Wales it is customary when a Nonconformist is buried to sing a hymn, and in the case of public men to deliver short addresses over the grave, and it is seldom that the officiating clergyman begrudges this privilege to sorrowing friends. On this occasion, however, the rector positively refused any such defilement of consecrated ground, although Mr. Rees was a man, not only universally respected, but of a truly Catholic spirit and of moderate opinions. This intolerant act, performed against the remains of one who was beloved by men of all classes and shades of opinion, has aroused an intense feeling of indignation throughout the Principality. It affords another proof, if such were needed, of the necessity for some such Bill as that of Mr. Hadfield with regard to the use of parish burial-grounds, and in favour of which it might be well to send up petitions.

From a statement made in the House of Commons by Mr. Gladstone, the Government estimate of the value of the property of the Irish Church, and of the charges which would remain upon it should his measure pass, is as follows. The tithe-rent charge is put down at £9,000,000, the proceeds of leased lands and perpetual annuities at £4,000,000, the glebe and other lands let for short terms without lease at £1,500,000, the "lands in occupation" at £750,000, and the "miscellaneous funds" at £750,000; making altogether a total of £16,000,000. The charges are estimated as follow:—Life interest of bishops, cathedral dignitaries, and incumbents, £4,900,000; curates, £800,000; lay compensation, chiefly to clerks, sextons, and others holding freehold appointments, £600,000; value of advowsons, £300,000; private endowments, £500,000; glebe building charges, £250,000; the Presbyterian and Maynooth grants, £1,100,000; expenses of the commission for ten years, £200,000. These charges amount in the aggregate to £8,650,000, leaving for disposal a balance of £7,350,000.

We have not, it appears, heard the last of Mrs. Star and her comrades and her victims. An appeal is about to be made to the judges in banco against the recent verdict. If this is unsuccessful, the defendants will have to pay the costs of the plaintiff, in addition to the expenses of the recent action, which the Tablet puts at £6,000, and towards which subscriptions are requested.

Manchester has its St. Alban's as well as London; and some time ago the Bishop of Manchester revoked the licence of the Rev. J. E. Sedgwick, the clergyman who officiated there, on the ground that he was in the habit of hearing confession and adopting ritual practices, which the Bishop disapproved of. Mr. Sedgwick appealed against this sentence to the Archbishop of York, who has, however, just confirmed it, at the same time expressing a hope that his brother prelate would give the erring presbyter a hearing, and take a favourable view of his case, as if the sentence were not revoked the consequences would be so serious to him—in fact, might mean utter ruin.

A step has just been taken by the Fellows of Oriel College, Oxford, towards shaking off the exclusive clerical ascendancy in the Universities, which the Liberal members feel cramps their freedom of action, and diminishes their influence. Although there is no rule against the Provostship being held by a layman, certain clerical benefices which go with it practically amount to a prohibition. A Bill has been introduced into the House of Lords to disannex these benefices from the Provostship, then to exchange them for livings, and to apply part of the proceeds of these to make up the income of the office, which would then be open equally to laymen and clergymen.

LONDON: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, BAYSWATER. The Rev. W. H. Channing has announced to this newly formed congregation that he intends to return to America in the autumn.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Times seems to think that the Papacy, as regards its temporal power at least, is in a bad way. It says:—

"We already see the consequences of the work of Cavour in the attitude the Papacy has assumed towards the Civil Government of the two hemispheres. Ten years ago the Pope was the Sovereign of a considerable territory, and his direct political influence, to say nothing of his spiritual power, extended over all Italy. He was then as a monarch in league with the monarchs of the earth, and would have thought it treason to his order to divide himself from them. Now only a fragment of his dominions remains to him, and it is as certain as anything in human affairs can be that in a few years he will have no dominion at all. He will still be the head of the Roman Catholic Church, and in some respects the most important personage in the world. His spiritual authority and the veneration which attaches to his office may be even increased, but his temporal power will have come to an end. Not a Zouave will wear his uniform, not a police agent will obey his secretary's orders; he will coin no money, he will grant no passports. Though protesting angrily against such a consummation, the Papacy forsores it, and is already prepared to make the best of its new position. It casts itself on the faithful multitude throughout the world, and is inclined to anticipate its opponents by the boldness of its Liberal policy. We must not be surprised if we find before long the Church proclaiming itself the champion of democracy and the asserter of popular rights against such effete traditions as monarchy and nobility."

Our Roman Catholic contemporary, the Tablet, takes umbrage at the fact that Baron de Rothschild, a Jew, should have been allowed to present a clergyman to a living, and feels aggrieved that religionists of its own communion should not be able to do the same. It seems that the Duke of Norfolk is patron of thirteen livings, the Marquis of Bute of ten, Lord Dunraven of seven, Lord Orford of seven, Lord Gainsborough of seven, Lord Beaumont of one, Lord Stourton of one, Lord Petre of five, Lord Arundell of Wardour, of two, and Lord Clifford of three—in all fifty-six livings, besides many others of which Roman Catholic commoners are patrons.

Islington has been looked upon as a sort of sacred preserve of Evangelicalism, but, if we may trust the High Church Times, its results have been anything but satisfactory. This is what it tells us:

"There is no Ritualism, but downright heathenism flourishes more rankly there than in any parish of the metropolis. And this, in spite of Evangelical parsons, closed churches, pewdom, dull services, and the black gown."

The Contemporary Review of this month has a remarkable article, apparently by Dean Alford, on the "two religions"—the Low Church and the High Church—found in the Establishment. The writer starts by showing "the confusion, the collisions, the seething and fermenting state" of his Church, and admits that a series of events has practically brought home to the minds of the clergy that this Church was the child of compromise, and that schools of the most direct antagonism can find in her services grounds for justifying their co-existence within the same communion." The consequence is that the world is puzzled, and "people are asking what the Church of England really is, not only in respect of its constitution, but in the much more important matter of the religion which it professes." He contrasts this condition of things with that presented by Scotland, where, notwithstanding the rapid multiplication of sects, and the heat of religious controversy, the religion is essentially one. "The same doctrines are preached in all the churches: the differences turn on modes of church government, and matters unconnected with the religious creed of the people." At present, "two great religions co-exist in the Church of England." The Broad Church is not made a "third religion," since it rules over very small numbers in the nation.

In an article in Macmillan, Dean Stanley speaks thus of Keble's "Christian Year," two concordances to which, one of them by a blind man, are about to be published:

"It has taken its place—certainly for this generation—next to the Authorised Version and the Prayer Book, far above the Homilies and the Articles. For one who would enforce an argument or defend a text by quoting the Eleventh Article or the Homily on Charity, there are a hundred who would appeal to the 'Christian Year.' And it has reached far beyond the limits of the Established Church. Wherever English religion spreads, there also is found this little volume. It is within the memory of the present writer, that, on a Sunday in the desert of Mount Sinai, where books were naturally of the fewest, of four British travellers—two of them were Scotsmen—it was found that three had in their small travelling library brought out with them the 'Christian Year.' In the sermon of a distinguished Presbyterian preacher, on the 'Religion of Common Life,' the chief illustration was borrowed not from the 'Westminster Confession,' or from the 'Paraphrases,' but from the stanza, 'The trivial round, the daily task,' &c. In the Crimean war some fanatical chaplain had opposed the introduction of the 'Christian Year' into the hospitals; but by the next arrival from England was a whole cargo of 'Christian Years' brought by the daughter of the greatest of Scottish divines—Dr. Chalmers."

In an appreciative notice of the "Memoir of Travers Madge," which appears in this month's Good Words, Professor Plumptre, after expressing a wish that a fuller account had been given of the influences which led him, after passing through his several "phases of faith," to find rest in the bosom of the Established Church, says that his life suggests a question which cannot be lightly passed over:

"Those who read it must, I imagine, feel that there was hardly any stage of Travers Madge's life of which they would not have said, Sit anima mea cum illo. The heretic, the schismatic, the unauthorised 'celebrant' of what ecclesiastically was a mock communion, wins our admiration and our love throughout. We cannot admit for a moment, however much we may rejoice that he was led on from truth to truth, the thought that had he been called away at an earlier stage he would have been on the 'left hand,' among the accursed and condemned. And if so in this, as a typical representative instance, may it not be so in twice ten thousand instances? May there not be in others, as in him, an unconscious faith in the midst of a verbal negation of the truth? Is no Meliora latent a motto for us also in our judgments or our hopes for others? And if so, again, is it well to surround the witness which the Church bears to the truth with anathemas which at least seem to reverse that judgment and to shut out that hope? The 'damnatory clauses' of the pseudo-Athanasian Creed have, it is true, been explained over and over again, as sentencing only the unbelief which knows itself to be unbelieving, the heresy which believes itself to be heretical, the denial which involves not merely intellectual error but moral evil—and in that sense thousands of the clergy accept them, and tens of thousands of the laity are content at least to acquiesce in them; but in the ears of yet more, among both clergy and laity, they seem to say, and that with no faltering voice, that those who fall asleep, being as Travers Madge was till the last few years of his life, shall 'without doubt perish everlastingly.' Is it not time to get rid of defences which do not defend, warnings which do not warn, words that have to be explained in a non-natural sense, aids to faith which surround the truth that attracts by its own beauty and completeness, with that which simply repels, and rouses, as by way of protest against the denunciation, a not unnatural antagonism."

The Standard asks whether any one can doubt the result of passing Mr. Hadfield's Bill to throw open consecrated burial grounds for Dissenting services? You will have brought the Dissenting minister and the Catholic priest to the very door of the parish church. Is it likely that they will long be content to stay outside? It is only another step to fling it open and invite Mr. Binney to speak his few words from the pulpit, and Dr. Manning to celebrate high mass at the altar. The horse-leech policy of the Liberation Society renders it necessary that propositions of this kind should always be viewed in connection with results which they may render possible or inevitable. We have to consider, not merely whether a certain claim may be regarded as fair and reasonable in itself, but whether it is of a nature to open the door to other and less justifiable demands. The plain English of which is, don't do right lest evil should come.

The English Independent says:

"Even Convocation is moving on with the times. In the York assembly the admission of laymen was discussed, and eight clergymen had strength of mind enough to vote for it, though they of course formed but a very small minority. A committee was appointed to examine the canons 'with a view to their adaptation to the present times.' Think of that! The Establishment undertaking to adapt itself to the times!"

In some remarks on Sunday dressing, the Daily News observes:

"Dress is always a relative term; and what is Sunday best to one person would fall far below the week-day worst of another. And yet a line somewhere there must be; and when we come to speak of the classes amongst whom dress is one of the main concerns of life, we cannot doubt that the majority of church-goers are on the wrong side of it. They go to church over-dressed rather than dressed. Their raiment is for the benefit of the congregation, and anything but donned out of serious reverence for the Creator and the sanctity of the spot they are visiting. They make Sunday a pretext and an excuse for outdoing themselves in extravagance of attire. Abundant evidence has been given before Royal commissioners to prove that the most severe hardships inflicted on milliners and their assistants spring from an exacting determination of fashionable and would-be-fashionable women to have their new dresses, bonnets, or mantles home on Saturday night, or even on Sunday morning, in order that they may appear for the first time in their new and gorgeous livery—at church. Does any thought of prayer or piety enter into such pitiless calculations as these? And is it any worse to turn the house of prayer into a den of thieves than to turn it into a Vanity Fair?"

WHO WILL MARRY US?

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

It would be very difficult to point out any single question on which the action of Convocation has at any time been either judicious or harmonious. Whether its members deal with Essays and Reviews, with Colenso, or with the Irish Church, they can never unite unless on a matter in which they are at issue with all other people. But of the various vagaries lately indulged in, the most curious, and, if we may say it, the most comical, is the irrepressible desire manifested by those who assume to represent the English Church to unite themselves with some other body, no matter of what persuasion or what its attitude, hostile, contemptuous, or simply indifferent. The Greek Church and its different branches have been solicited in vain; at least one clergyman has made an unsuccessful pilgrimage to Rome with the benevolent idea of converting the Pope. If we remember rightly, an Indian bishop besought a small body of Syrian Christians to enter into communion with him, which offer was declined without thanks. But if Rome and Moscow, if the Armenian and Coptic Christians are obdurate, Convocation can try nearer home.

About this time last year this august body in its wisdom decided on sending what it called a "Christian greeting" to the Wesleyan community, to the effect that it desired a brotherly reconciliation with them. Now, the Methodists object to some of our ceremonies and practices, and we to some of theirs; but, as a matter of fact, the Wesleys are not hostile to the Church of England, and where there is no enmity there is no need of reconciliation. This message, therefore, must have had some other meaning than what appeared on the face of it. Was it to be inferred that a call to the Wesleyan ministry was to be held as an equivalent to Anglican orders, or that henceforth English clergymen would cheerfully preside in the pulpit and preach a sermon in a Methodist chapel? If so, why was it not plainly stated? If not, what did the greeting signify? Evidently the Methodists considered it as trifling and beside the mark, for in the Convocation just held we find the Ven. Archdeacon Pollock had come there with an amendment in his pocket to the effect that "Convocation, having during its last session expressed its cordial desire for a brotherly reconciliation with the Wesleys, and nothing having since transpired to encourage such overtures, it is not desirable to take further action in the matter." He thought, indeed, that "they had got pretty well snubbed in this country, and that the motion of last year had been a miserable failure. On the other hand, there had been a response from the other side of the Atlantic." This streamlet of consolation did not meet with the welcome it deserved, perhaps because it did come from the other side of the Atlantic. The Ven. Archdeacon went on to give as a reason for his friendliness towards the Wesleys that "he had never on any occasion found the ministers mixed up with the system of proselytizing going on. He had, indeed, found local preachers and class leaders trying it on," but since these vulgar and intrusive attempts were confined to underlings his amiable and friendly dispositions were, it may be, jeopardised, but not materially disturbed. Now the Wesleys have never held what has been sarcastically called with respect to the English Church, "the divine commission not to preach," and so far as we can see, the distinction between teaching and proselytizing depends upon whether the teacher addresses those of his own sect or otherwise; therefore, if anything like real recognition or union with the Methodists be in contemplation, this vehement and scornful objection to proselytizing ought not to exist. The Archdeacon of Carlisle was good enough to say that he thought the main body of Wesleys had not fallen into the extravagances with which some of them had been charged; he confessed that after what had taken place—to wit, the "Christian greeting"—he should have preferred to hear that some resolution had been taken on the subject by the Methodist body, but we gather from his speech that on the whole he accepted the slight with manly resignation. The Prolocutor spoke with more spirit, as a woman might do who did not relish being twice rejected by the same man. He had a lively recollection of the message of last year, which he regarded as the expression of an endeavour to bring the Wesleyan Methodists of this kingdom into the bosom of the Church of England; he "had no special complaint to make of their politics," whence it is obvious that objectionable political views would in his mind be a serious obstacle to Christian unity. Having tried persuasion in vain, he would suggest defiance as better adapted to promote harmony. "He had never found that any sincere and honest Wesleyan Methodist had been gained over to the Church by what he might call a timid policy of conciliation." He would therefore move that "Nothing having occurred since the last meeting of Convocation to encourage further overtures to the Wesleyan Methodists of England, it is not desirable to take further action on the present occasion;" or, in other words, having been smitten on the right cheek, he utterly dissented from any policy which would involve the turning of the left cheek also.

The Dean of Ripon asked "whether all the traditions and ceremonies of the Church were felt by them to be of Divine authority, or whether there were some that they admitted to be only of human authority;" and no one seeming to affirm the first proposition, he went on to remark that they had no reason to complain in not having received a response, since, if they could relax in nothing, it could not be expected that the Wesleys could have anything to respond to. The president, however, confessed that they had received a response which was not agreeable. "Why," he asked, "should that House be harshly answered by any religious body they might address?" No one appearing to know why, or indeed any reason why not, this very pertinent question elicited no reply. He proceeded to admit the fact that they had been harshly answered by the Wesleyan body last year. Nevertheless he did not regret the policy of generosity they had adopted, and thought it would in the long run tend to diminish the confusion which existed. The reasons for this conclusion the president did not impart to Convocation, and the rest of his observations were in harmony with the great want of harmony which was apparent, not only among the speakers in general with each other, but with each particular speech with itself. He urged that union with the Wesleys was desirable, but that they did not propose to absorb that community into their own. If by this he meant that the Church ought to be absorbed into the Methodist body, he omitted to say as much clearly, and it may have occurred to some present that bodies moving in two parallel lines will never unite unless one or other deviates from a straight line. He admitted having heard adverse words used about the Wesleys within those walls, but then the very persons who had uttered them had also joined in breathing the word of peace, which he inferred ought to amply atone for everything. It was then suggested by a venerable archdeacon that the old Christian greeting of last year might be sent over again with advantage, inasmuch as this Convocation might be considered as a new one. Whether the idea was ventilated to save the venerable body from the indignity of having its advances twice rejected, or that it was generally felt that the old Convocation having received a slap in the face, it was advisable and indeed only just that its successor should share its fortunes, it is impossible to say, but the resolution was carried by a large majority, there being only two dissentients. After this, one of the speakers who had advocated union with the methodists rose to propose that a committee of the Lower House should be formed to co-operate with that of the Convocation at Canterbury in promoting intercommunion with the Eastern orthodox Churches. Can human inconsistency go further? One dignitary proposes to unite with Rome, another with Moscow, but they have no love for the Scandinavian or Lutheran branches of Christianity. Others cast affectionate glances towards the Methodists, or advocate a parley with the Baptist body.

Now, admitting that the Church of Rome recognises the orders of the Greek Church, and even of the Coptic, Armenian, and other Oriental communities, and refuses that civility to the English Church, is that a reason why we should beg all round for favours repeatedly refused, or make overtures which are visibly unwelcome? To use Emerson's words, "Why insist on rash personal relations with your friend? Leave this touching and clawing. Are these things material to our covenant?" Common sense would suggest that the fusion of a number of religious sects, each regarding the other as imperfect, can never produce either perfection or real union. Those who believe it to be the future destiny of the English Church to receive both the Latin and Greek communions, after due correction, into her own bosom because they now recognise each other and persist in ignoring her, are, we confess, more sanguine than we feel ourselves to be. Let the English Church fix her eyes steadfastly on her own duties and the fulfilment of them, since the contemplation of the works and the virtues of others evidently affects her with vertigo. Amiable as is the union scheme in detail, there is a want of dignity about it regarded as a whole. We venture to say that since the time when seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, "We will eat our own bread and wear our own apparel, only let us be called by thy name to take away our reproach," there has been seen nothing, as the nuns would say, more "disfignifying" than the spectacle of Convocation, presuming it to represent the English Church, thus continuing to send messages and greetings broadcast, which are neglected or ignored, and persisting in smiling and beckoning to parties who refuse to give as much as a nod in return.

SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.

WHEN Winchester came from America as the apostle of Universalism he "established a considerable congregation at Parliament Court," Artillery Lane. On leaving England he was, in 1794, succeeded by Vidler. In 1802, Mr. Vidler became a Unitarian; a circumstance which caused his salary to fall from £250 to £30. The new convert, whilst thus abandoned by his own friends, was not enthusiastically received by organised Unitarianism. "An extemporary preacher was scarcely known in the denomination, and was not likely to be generally welcomed. The Presbyterian stiffness bound up the body, and rendered it averse to all zealous exertion." After a time, the congregation began to recover from the shock of the minister's heresy, and his income—which seems to have been singularly fluctuating from year to year—increased somewhat. In 1817, he was succeeded by W. J. Fox, at that time the Unitarian minister of Chichester. So great was Mr. Fox's success that a new chapel became necessary, and on February, 1824, the present one in South Place was opened. The old building in Artillery Lane has since passed through many hands, and is now used by the Jews. I lately visited it, finding it with difficulty, for Parliament Court is unknown to modern maps, and is to be discovered only through an unpromising archway. A Hebrew inscription is above the chapel door.

Mr. Fox was educated as an Independent, but, becoming heterodox, his first settlement was over a Universalist congregation. Thus, like his London flock, he came to antitrinitarian views, but in complete independence of the Unitarian denomination. The Unitarians hailed the erection of South Place, and its pastor was for a time identified with them. But the alliance soon ceased, and the Finsbury congregation, true to their historical origin, have long pursued a distinctive path of their own, in solitude and independence. They have been with Unitarianism, but neither in it nor of it; standing in relation to it much as it stands in relation to Protestantism in general.

When the new chapel was built it was crowded throughout, and even long afterwards we read of its six hundred seats being regularly filled, though a shilling was charged for admission. But the charm began to lose its power, and by 1852—if we may trust a hostile critic—the average attendance had fallen below 200, and sometimes was "barely a hundred." The history of the decline I do not know; in part, no doubt, it was due to the westward migration of the population, in part also to Mr. Fox's increasing heterodoxy of thought and practice. But the principal cause must have been one which is present in nearly all Liberal congregations, and was sure to be fatally prominent in the congregation most fearless in developing the logical consequences of Liberalism. It was the absence of united congregational life.

The Protestant does not come to his Sunday service for the sake of any special rite or sacrament which can be enjoyed only there. He believes the home or the roadside just as fit for prayer as the pew. Hence to him the principal peculiarity of the Sunday's service, the chief object for which he attends it, is the sermon. The sermon becomes the prominent feature, and the prayers and hymns and worship sink into mere adjuncts, or, as the Scotchwoman defined them to be, "preliminaries." Now the spread of education and the development of the periodical press have greatly lessened the attractiveness of sermons. Not only do they render the hearer more critical, but they enable him as he sits at his ease by his fire to listen to a preacher of superior ability, who will discuss whatever topic he may feel an interest in from whatever standpoint he may occupy. Thus the temple has a small and lessening hold on those who enter it only for instruction. However good your instruction may be, however brilliant your pulpit fireworks, there is pretty certainly something equally good and brilliant to be heard or read outside your chapel walls. You cannot compete with the entire world.

Thus a really cohesive and permanent congregation can be gathered only by appealing, not to their intellects, but their hearts. You may drive them away by foolishness, but you will not retain them merely by wisdom. They will come to the church assuredly, if it interest their hearts; if in association and sympathy they find that devotional glow and rapture which few souls are privileged to obtain in solitude. They will come to the church if it is linked and connected with their weekday life; if they know the face that is in the pulpit, the faces that are in the pews; if A, and B, and C, who are sitting near, have been working with them in the week in some unselfish labour that it is pleasant to look back on; if the church is not merely a place of periodical talk and discourse, but is actually and visibly connected with their efforts to fulfil its lessons. One hour of work for his church gives a man a hearty interest in it, which he would not have derived from the most appreciative listening to a hundred of its sermons.

* Vanderkiste's "Six Years' Mission." The preceding facts I owe to the Spectator, and Monthly Repository.

But for this Mr. Fox never sought. He was content to take and even define his position as neither priest nor pastor, but baldly a theological lecturer. Once a week he stood in, as it were, a public hall and lectured to all who cared to hear. No wonder that links so slender did not bind. The lectures were not fruitless. The changing band of listeners contained many who have influenced English thought and life. Many who speak and write to-day for human rights and equal laws are only giving forth the echoes of words that first rung through them in South-place Chapel. Many bold thoughts to-day are fruits of its old lectures. But another fruit of them is that the congregation within those walls is only one-fifth of what it was forty-five years ago. The time that should have brought development has only brought decay.

We believe that at present a section of the congregation, with the approval of the minister, are desirous to sell the chapel and migrate to a fresh neighbourhood. They urge that the tide of population flows away from the city, and the chapel consequently stands at present in the midst "not of houses but of warehouses," its attendants being gathered from a circle of many miles' radius. But to migrate eastward would be to lose that nearness to railway accommodation which now aids the access of many of the scattered congregation, and of probably all the strangers whom newspaper advertisements attract. To migrate westward would almost necessarily involve collision with some existing Liberal church; and if the congregation, on migration, is to be formed, not of—as in ordinary cases—the Liberals of a particular district, but of those who may be drawn together from different sides by the abilities of the present minister, it is difficult to see what prospect it could have of surviving after any termination of his connection with it. The one bond of union being gone, the various atoms would fall back into their accustomed orbits. The more westerly position of Essex-street Chapel has not saved it from a decay far more complete than that of South-place. And if the object of migration is to become the rallying point of the more radical thinkers, it must not be forgotten that there is already, three miles west of South-place, at least one congregation (Dr. Perfit's) as large as its own, of equally advanced views and equally unconventional in its worship.

Any large increase of the congregation, as it now exists, must be drawn locally from the class of skilled artisans. To them the discussion of social and political topics from the pulpit offers especial attraction. Some such are already among the most zealous friends of South Place, and they declare that a few thousand handbills of the services, distributed through city workshops, would bring together numbers of their brethren.

Mr. Fox's memory is still held in intense veneration by his flock. I have heard with interest one old man publicly relate how he had helped him into the pulpit the first time he ever was in it, and had piled together bricks—Mr. Fox's short stature is well known—for him to stand on. His present successor, Mr. M. D. Conway, exercises a personal influence hardly inferior, and in his difficult post has won singular regard. To his teachings, one at least of his hearers owes consolation and encouragement in many an hour of anxiety and sickness of heart.

Walking down the City-road, I have often thought that there the history of Nonconformity was visibly embodied. You stand in Bunhill Fields, and the stones around you cover the hands and tongues that won for Nonconformity the right to exist. The walls just beyond you still echo with the voice and preserve the dust of the man who breathed the breath of life into the nostrils of decaying Nonconformity, and gave it a living soul. And not far from the temple that enshrines the ashes of Wesley stands that in whose alembic old narrownesses and dogmas were distilled into water of life, and Nonconformity into free development of the higher nature.

Long may it be what for its half century it has been—the freest church in Europe. K.

XI. (AND LAST).—FURTHER OBJECTIONS. CONCLUSION.

ONE of the most widely-spread objections which meet me in conversing with people on this subject is this—that a great part of their comfort and pleasure in attending worship would be destroyed if they had no longer a special seat of their own to go to. This objection takes various forms.

Sometimes people speak of the attachment which they feel for their old accustomed seat. They have sat there for years, perhaps used to sit there with their parents when they first went as little children; very tender associations have grouped themselves about that particular place. The simple answer is—the open church system (though it aims to substitute for this feeling in the future that of attachment to the whole temple, as a place in which it is a joy and privilege to sit anywhere) does not interfere to any appreciable extent with those old associations where the pew system has already led to their formation. This difficulty met us at Strangeways in full force. The way I met it was this. I put it to my people that if they had no special attachments of that kind, it would be better for a time to avoid even the appearance of virtual appropriation, by distinctly striving against the tendency to take the same place Sunday by Sunday; but if they had such attachments, it was a free church, and consequently they were as free to sit in their old accustomed corner as anywhere else; only, if now and then they came and found it occupied they must not look, or feel, as if "their seat" had been taken. As a fact, it is not one Sunday in three months that such people—who are not very many in any congregation—if they come in decent time, fail to get the seat they prefer. Many others, from natural habit, frequent very much the same part of the church Sunday after Sunday. It cannot be too clearly understood that there is no reason why this should not be. The objection is not to people occupying the same places when they are present, but to their being regarded as in any way their places when they are absent.

The same answer meets the difficulty some people anticipate with regard to their families. They say, what a misery it would be to have one's family scattered, some here, some there, instead of all sitting comfortably together, as we have been accustomed to do. But why should they not "sit comfortably together?" Did any of my readers ever see his chapel so full at the beginning of service, that even the largest family would have any difficulty in at once finding a vacant seat that would hold them all? If, indeed, the throwing of a chapel "open" should lead to such an increased attendance as to oblige family people to be present five minutes before the beginning of service, in order to secure their all sitting together, I apprehend that there are few Christian families that would not rejoice at a prosperity which involved even that hard necessity! Besides, even on this subject of comfort to worshippers, there is another side to the question. We have to consider, in reality, not which plan best promotes the special comfort of a few, but which plan promotes the greatest comfort of the general body of worshippers. There are many in every congregation who need rather special accommodation in order that they may be comfortable in a place of worship. The sickly, the infirm, the deaf; poor mothers with little children, and so forth. The pew system binds these down hard and fast to some special seat, and that, if they be poor, not selected by what will promote their comfort, but by what they can afford. A poor woman, living in a cellar near our chapel, attended a Wesleyan chapel in the neighbourhood for many years. A few years ago she began to grow deaf. She could no longer hear from the far-off corner, where, on account of the cheapness of the seat-rent she had always managed to keep a sitting, and she spoke to the persons in authority, asking them to try and let her sit nearer. All the nearest seats, however, were taken—rented in whole pews,—and though she might have had a sitting about half-way down the chapel, she would have to pay double the rent for it that she had previously paid. Being very poor, she could not do this, and so she discontinued attending. A little while after she heard of our open church. I think one of our visitors told her how with us she could sit wherever she could hear best, and that she could give week by week just what she could afford. From that time she has been a constant attender, being able to get a seat somewhere in the front where she can hear quite well. This is only one illustration out of many that occur to me. The pew system gives a great deal of comfort to a few who can choose their permanent seats in the best places. The open-church system enables all the congregation, rich and poor alike, to choose such places as best suit their various and changing needs. A poor woman with a little child can get a place quite close to the door, whence she can slip out without disturbing any one, if the child begins to be troublesome. The old have no need to mount the gallery stairs because the pews there are cheaper. The sickly can take a place near the stove on a cold day. With a spirit of mutual courtesy, and the Christian watchword "In honour preferring one another," there is no plan which will enable so many to be seated comfortably and which makes it so easy to maintain something of the true brotherhood of worship.

In conclusion, let there be no mistake as to what is likely to be the effect of the open church system. Some people imagine, and many I believe fancy that I imagine, that it will attract a rush of people from without. Indeed, many of the objections to the system are founded on this supposition. For my own part I do not look for any thing of the kind. The real attraction to places of worship must always be of a very different nature—must be the higher thought and quickened feeling and Christian sympathy which its services and associations arouse in those who attend. But believing as I do that the substitution of a system of private reserved occupancy for the ancient freedom of public temples has raised up a great hindrance to the attendance at places of worship of any except those distinctly and formally connected with them—in these days a minority of the people—I think that the restoration of the ancient system will, gradually, revive something of the old feeling, do away with a serious hindrance, and lead in the long run, wherever it is heartily and fully carried out, to a steady increase first in the number of casual attenders, and ultimately in the number of attached worshippers.

MR. GLADSTONE'S SCHEME.— WHAT IS THOUGHT OF IT.

NEXT to the eagerness with which people waited for the announcement of the Government scheme for dealing with the Irish Church, is the anxiety to note its reception. How it will be met by the opponents of all disestablishment remains as yet to be seen. The only sign at present from that side is a general uncertainty how to receive it, a waiting for the leaders to give the cue. Nobody cares much for the little scream that Lord REDSDALE let off in the House of Lords, which will probably have about as little practical result as the sarcasm attributed to Lord WESTBURY, that it is rather supererogatory to take the property from the Irish Church to give it to idiots and incurables! We look to Mr. DISRAELI for the real method of attack, and Mr. DISRAELI is far too knowing to show his hand. We are inclined to think, indeed, that the mere fact of his having allowed the first reading to pass unchallenged has of itself been a discouragement to his followers. After working themselves up into a Protestant fervour, and preparing to dispute the progress of the measure inch by inch, with Mr. DISRAELI as a sort of political Leonidas, after all the blatant talk of the Irish Orangemen and the English parsons, it fell with a chill of doubt upon the ranks of the opposition, alike in the House and out of it, to find it treated simply as an ordinary affair of divisions and majorities, and allowed to pass the first stage without a whisper of that desperate resistance which was to strike dismay into the ranks of Mr. GLADSTONE and his party. And, moreover, the delay which thus takes place will make it more difficult than ever to get up the kind of opposition which was threatened. Instead of consolidating, time only weakens it. First one and then another slips away. Sir GEORGE PREVOST declares in Convocation that he believes the Irish Church will positively gain by being disestablished and disendowed. One of the most striking of all the utterances which Mr. GLADSTONE'S measure has drawn forth is the article in the Guardian. It hardly touches on the scheme itself, has no word as to its merits or demerits, but there is something infinitely suggestive in the quiet way in which it gives up the whole game, and treats the question as virtually settled. MR. GLADSTONE'S resolutions of last year "had not passed an hour when it was seen, as a truth of political reason, that the days of the Irish Establishment were numbered." In a very soothing way the Guardian goes on to explain how, in spite of this being so evident, the clergy could not admit the fact of what was coming, and a feeling which was "honourable, elevated, and conscientious," "made them, in common with the Conservative party, fight against the inevitableness of the event." But a year, it argues, makes a great difference—"all the difference—between the busy excitement of a fight of the day and the solemn consciousness of entering on a new era."—

"There is no good in ignoring and shutting our eyes to one result of this bill, which comes upon us like a strange idea, and to which it will take us some time to get accustomed—the fact, we mean, that in two years' time a portion of the existing establishment of this country will be a free Anglican Church, with a Synod managing its own affairs, and with voluntary tribunals judging its own clergy, and interpreting its own formularies. That is a phenomenon which simply alarms some, and raises conflicting expectations in others; we can only say the day has come in the career and progress of our church, that such a phenomenon should arise. We are taken out of the ephemeral excitement of a party struggle, and planted in history."

We can imagine that a good many of the clergy will rub their eyes when they read this article. It is more difficult to keep in the high heroics when a friend whom you have been in the habit of respecting smiles good-temperedly at your tirades as having nothing in them, than if he should take a tone of vehement opposition or elaborate argument. Thousands of clergymen who have been nailing their ecclesiastical colours to the mast for the past six months, and who have denounced any hint at surrender as treachery to the Church, have been accustomed all their lives to look to the Guardian, as, in a quiet but effective and unimpeachable way, the strongest Church paper in the country; and it cannot but modify their tone, while it will give many weak brethren courage to speak out, to find their cherished organ thus cheerfully accepting the inevitable.

But the real auguries of the prospects of the bill are not to be gathered from the attitude of Mr. GLADSTONE'S opponents, but from the tone of his supporters. The weakness of Liberalism has for many years been not in the strength of their opponents, but in the seeming impossibility of getting Liberals to agree. The great triumph of Mr. GLADSTONE is in having produced a measure which alone of the great measures of our time has united nearly all sections of the Liberal party in its hearty support. Such millennial characteristics as the lion lying down with the lamb, are mild types of the state of things in which the Fenians and the "cultivated Liberals," the Irishman and the Pall Mall Gazette, the Times and the Star, the Spectator and the Saturday Review, the rhetorical Telegraph and the cautious Economist are all found fiddling one tune. Yet so it is. We look in vain for any serious objection or proposal of emendation. There is a unanimity of approval from which even the wildest tactics will hardly succeed in detaching any stragglers.

We prefer thus to dwell upon the opinions of others than to exercise the conventional journalistic function in criticisms of our own, because we frankly own that there is nothing in the bill that we care to criticise. We do not pretend to think it perfect in every point, but it is certainly a great deal nearer perfection than we ever dared to hope of any measure of the kind to be proposed in our day. Thorough as it is in principle, we do not care to nibble at its details. What does it matter whether the landlords redeem their tithe charges at a year or two's purchase less than the market price, or whether the clergy get their parsonages for an old song? We should not have been disposed to higgie even at a much worse bargain for the country.

THE PRESS ON MR. GLADSTONE'S BILL.

The Times thinks that it is a scheme which, as a whole, fairly accomplishes the task before the Government, and deserves, as it will doubtless receive, the warm support of Parliament. It is a great, a comprehensive work.

The Daily News thinks that the most remarkable and the most satisfactory part of Mr. Gladstone's scheme is the provision he makes for the voluntary organisation of a Protestant Episcopal Church out of the present Establishment. Mr. Gladstone neither attempts too much in this direction nor too little.

The Pall Mall Gazette says it is bound to defend the scheme as "in all its main features it exactly coincides with a proposal on the subject" put forward in its own columns last December. "It appears to us to afford by far the best and most simple method which has been, or probably can be, suggested of removing everything which can reasonably be looked upon by the Irish as a grievance, and of extricating the nation at large from all connection with ecclesiastical questions in Ireland. It fully appreciates and effectually deals with the great leading difficulties of the case."

The Economist criticises Mr. Gladstone's proposition to sell the tithe to the landlord who pays it at 22½ years' purchase. Supposing, as is very probable in Ireland, that he has no money to invest even at 4½ per cent., or does not want to invest it, the State will lend it him at 3½ per cent., and he will clear nearly one by his bargain. There will be an outcry about this, but though the Economist admits that the landlords will benefit in pocket by the arrangement, it nevertheless sees little to object to in the plan. They are the people who lose by disestablishment. Protestants own two-thirds of the soil of Ireland, and it is they who are mainly injured, who will have to pay for the voluntary Church, which will nevertheless be governed by communicants' votes irrespective of contributions, and who will suffer in social dignity by the loss of their unjust but still legal ascendancy over other creeds.

Mr. Gladstone's reply to the question, "What is to be done with the surplus?" pleases and gratifies the Advertiser, but its temerity (it adds) almost takes our breath away. This surplus money is estimated as amounting to eight millions sterling. And the difficulty, how to dispose of the money, has been from the beginning the chief problem in the whole case. Mr. Gladstone solves it in a very simple and effectual way. His reply is, "Secularise it all." That is to say, "Give it to county infirmaries, lunatic asylums, and similar institutions." This mode of action avoids many troublesome controversies. It will quiet the public fears that, by hook or by crook, the Romish priests would contrive to get hold of a large portion of the money. In this way our opposition, which would have been given to any plan for increasing the power of Rome, is silenced.

The London Review says that only statesmanship of a very high and subtle and beneficent order could have reconciled so thoroughly the requirements of justice and the promptings of generosity.

The Spectator considers that the Government have solved the very difficult problem as to the surplus with great wisdom and tact. The appropriation of the revenue to be derived from the surplus to a peculiar class of charitable objects which are at once greatly needed in Ireland, and never likely to be achieved out of the only available tax, the county cess, is a thoroughly national use for it—in every true sense, a use of it for unsectarian spiritual purposes. It is a real and great subtraction from the popular miseries of Ireland, without being a bonus to any special class.

The Saturday Review says that the two great successes of Mr. Gladstone's scheme, each of which shows great felicity of contrivance, great originality, and great political tact, are the creation of the Church representative body and the destination of the surplus. The latter, which was always said to constitute the main difficulty of the scheme, is so adroitly managed that there is probably no part of the scheme that will meet with less opposition. The expenditure of the money on works of mercy has a sort of semi-religious sound about it which may comfort those who object to the utter secularisation of Church property; it will benefit the poor only, Irish people only, and the only class of poor who would not be demoralised by having money laid out in large sums for their benefit. Fond as they are of jobbery, not even Irishmen will turn blind or mad to profit by the spoils of the Irish Church. And then even those who most like it must own that the scheme is a very clever scheme in the subtle and delicate way in which it tempts—or, as Sir Stafford Northcote said at the Middlesex banquet on Wednesday, bribes—people of all kinds to agree to it. There are little bribes held out to every one.

The scheme "excites the wonder and admiration" of the Christian World. "To say that every part of so vast and complicated a scheme is perfect,—to adopt as infallible every one of a hundred proposals and provisions,—would be to treat Mr. Gladstone as more than human; but we have confidence in declaring that in the fundamental principles and organic framework of his great measure he is conspicuously right, and that no essential modification of its terms will take place in its passage through Parliament."

The Dublin correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette writes an interesting account of "What Irishmen think of it." "The majority of moderate Irishmen, irrespective of difference of faith, regard the bill with approving eyes, some honestly delighted with its provisions, others regretfully admitting its necessity. The Church party, as they call themselves, point to the many difficulties that unavoidably will present themselves in carrying the scheme into effect, and exaggerate these into impossibilities. What is to be done with old clergymen who, past their work, cannot comply with the provision that they are to be salaried as long as they do duty? Are these men, who have done good work in their day, to be turned adrift to starve? Are curates under the same decree to remain curates for ever? or will their stipends be secured to them if they become rectors? Why is Maynooth to have fourteen years of grace while the Established Church is to perish in a year? What are these charities to which the surplus is to be applied? Are not all charitable institutions in Ireland more or less sectarian, and are not many of them connected with nunneries or monasteries, and consequently solely managed by Papists? The facility with which most of these queries may be answered, if they have not been already disposed of in Mr. Gladstone's speech, will show that there are but few real objections to the minor details of the bill, and most objectors confine themselves to opposing the plan in its entirety. The Roman Catholic political parties have but few observations to make on a bill which they thoroughly approve. If fault is to be found, it is in the proposal for granting an annual sum for supporting twelve old cathedrals, among which will be found St. Patrick's and Christ Church, Dublin, St. Canice, Kilkenny, Armagh, Derry, Limerick, and Cork. It is asserted that if these cannot be supported by their own congregation, they will, on being handed over to the Roman Catholics, be willingly and entirely supported by them. The extreme democrats differ in their language on the bill. Some, echoing the moderate Roman Catholics, express their hearty approval of this long-delayed act of justice, and claim for the Fenian Brotherhood the honour of having forced England to listen to Ireland's complaint; others almost treat the subject with contempt, as a vain attempt of terrified Britain to conciliate oppressed but now powerful Hibernia.

"Among these different views it is not a little singular to find all parties unite in complaining of one injustice to Ireland. Orange and Green, moderate and extreme, remark that hitherto Maynooth and the Regium Donum have been paid from the Imperial Exchequer, but that for the future they will be endowed by a sum obtained from Ireland alone, so that England will be a gainer and Ireland a loser by the transaction to a considerable amount. It is like the well-known proverb of feeding a dog with morsels of his own tail, and surely only a dull dog would be content with it."

The Irishman regards the offer made to tenants of Church lands to purchase their farms and become peasant proprietors, paying a fourth of the purchase-money, as a "highly satisfactory feature in the scheme," but objects to the "nobler ecclesiastical and historic ruins, such as Cashel, merging with the burial ground to the custody of the Poor-law guardians."

The Nation says that, "compared with the Disestablishment Act of 1869, the Emancipation Act of 1829 was a miserable compromise." The application of the Church funds it regards as a minor question, but considers that, on the whole, "Mr. Gladstone's is not an un-national or a bad one."

AMERICAN NOTES.

In remarking on the supply of vacant pulpits the A. U. Journal has the following observations, which admit of application elsewhere than in the States:

"A society loses its minister, and its pulpit must be supplied, and a new man found through the efforts of the parish committee. The committee are usually very imperfectly acquainted with ministers, and write to the officers of the American Unitarian Association, asking a supply. They, in reply, take pains to select from among those available for the day one who seems most likely to be acceptable, and he preaches for them. If he does not suit, they ask for a different man to be sent the next Sunday; and, if he does please pretty well, they are just as likely to ask the same, because it leads them to think that good ministers are plenty, and they wish to see if the next one may not please a little better. And so it goes on, every new man either making some prefer him to anybody else, or else making everybody discontented and uneasy. The prolonged habit of listening to preachers merely with the view of trying them—as one tastes the flavour of tea—creates a fastidious spirit; and, meantime the absence of regular pastoral ministrations makes the religious life of the parish decline. In nine cases out of ten, if the societies, now long without a minister, had settled one of the first three men they heard after their former pastor left, it would have been better for them."

As we mentioned some time ago, negotiations have been going on in America among the various bodies of Presbyterians, with a view to merge minor differences and effect a general union. The same jealousies, however, seem to have been exhibited there as here; though Dr. McCosh is hopeful that the union will be brought about sooner than many suppose. There, he says, men are not required to subscribe to all the statements in the Westminster Confession of Faith as here, a kind of general subscription being regarded as sufficient. This, however, answers all the purpose which a creed is thought to ensure, for, according to him, sounder doctrine is nowhere preached than in the American Presbyterian pulpits.

The Atlantic, in an article on "Ritualism," says, and we think truly, that its success (which, however is less than the writer supposes) does not come from its attempt to galvanise dead ideas, nor the gaudy and tawdry costumes in which they clothe their worship. Only the smallest number are attracted to the movement by these things which are so much talked about and are so absurd. It owes its growth almost entirely to the charity of its zealous advocates and devotees. The English Ritualists have organised a beneficence, and are doing for the poor and sick, the orphans and widows, what no other church and no other branch of a church has ever attempted on so large a scale. They are putting the glorious principles and precepts and spirit of the Gospel into practice, in deeds of healing mercy and givings and watchings and an almost saintly guardianship, and have made the common people feel that their religion is a reality and not a pretence; while even the rich and cultivated are moved and melted and drawn in by the call upon them for self-sacrificing devotion to the good of others. It is this vital and practical Christianity, which has not the least necessary connection with Ritualism, but which its friends have had the wisdom and foresight to organise and identify with this movement, which gives it the hold it has upon the Christian public. We do not mean to imply that the charity is unreal, but nevertheless it is the sail which catches the breeze of popular favour and carries the craft. And this is just what will make any church or sect popular and successful. We have reached a point in human development at which charity is more revered than church or creed, and practical beneficence is more popular than doctrinal soundness. The religion of to-day is humanity. Our teachers and sectarian leaders may shut their eyes to the fact if they will, and spend their strength and breath upon theological refinements and ecclesiastical bolts and machinery, but they thereby lose their hold upon the sympathies of the public, and drop out of the main line of advance, to straggle by the way or fall behind. The people have read enough of the Gospels, they have caught enough of Christ's thought and holy temper to know and feel that love of man is the larger half of true religion, and only as a man has love for his kind, and shows his love by kind acts and a generous sympathy and a noble helpfulness, can he worship God. The church that does most for men, deals the most directly with human wants, does the most to relieve the wretchedness and woe of human-kind, and ministers the most successfully to the common needs and aspirations of human beings, will win to itself the most popular sympathy, confidence and support. The question for the future is not one of ritual, nor form of government, nor statement of faith, nor of party name. It is a question of humanity. It is a question of beneficence. The problem that confronts us to-day is how to make the Church that practical, philanthropic working power in the community which the awakened Christian consciousness demands that it shall be, or be left behind.

Referring to the attempts which have been made in some Evangelical circles to get rid of the fact that certain very repulsive doctrines once generally held by the Orthodox are now being abandoned, and an approach made towards Unitarianism, the Liberal Christian very pertinently asks:

"What was it provoked the Unitarian and Universalist revolt at the end of the last and the beginning of this century, if no doctrines more repulsive and horrible than those now taught in our large cities were preached, and only dove-like denunciations dropped from perfumed and honeyed lips? The fact is, there would have been no organised Liberal Christianity in this country to-day, but for a Calvinism that was as cruel as it was irrational, as impious as it was inhumane. And Liberal Christianity has done its greatest work, and perhaps its best, in modifying the views and sweetening the temper of Evangelical denominations, until they are more Unitarian and Universalist in faith and spirit than the pioneers of either of these sects. It is really a question whether they are not doing more to diffuse and popularize Liberal Christian sentiments than either body of Liberal Christians, and whether they are not to become, in the Providence of God, organic centres of its influence and ideas. Certain it is that Beecher is doing more for Universalism than any man in America, not excepting Chapin, and that Bushnell has demonstrated the possibility of subscribing to the old articles and believing every Unitarian idea."

LITERARIA.

THROUGH the kindness of Baron Tauchnitz, of Leipzig, to whom continental readers are so much indebted for the re-publication in a cheap form of English works, we have received a copy of the Thousandth volume of his series, which is a very beautiful edition of our authorised version of the New Testament. It has been carefully edited by Dr. Tischendorf, who gives in the foot-notes the various readings of the Sinaitic, Vatican, and Alexandrian MSS., as far as they can be made evident by a change in the English text; and, as a frontispiece, a facsimile of a small portion of each of these "primeval documents." He has also prefixed a short but interesting introduction, in which we have an account of the three great MSS. just mentioned. The work bears this graceful inscription from Baron Tauchnitz—"I dedicate this volume to my English and American authors; as a token of esteem for the living and a tribute of remembrance to the dead." We will only add that, though published at half-a-crown, the type is one of the clearest and most pleasant for the size that we have ever seen; and we can unhesitatingly recommend to such of our readers as require a portable edition of the New Testament this one of Dr. Tischendorf, and we feel no doubt that the hope which he expresses will be fulfilled, and his present labour receive from our countrymen the same favour which he gratefully acknowledges that his previous ones have done.

Under the title of "True Nobility," the Religious Tract Society has published Sketches of the Life and Character of the Fifth Earl of Aberdeen, which, though somewhat heavily written, are worth reading. The subject of these, a descendant of the Gordon of Haddo, the persecutor of the Covenanters, and a son of the once Prime Minister of England, with some little fanaticism was evidently a man of sincere and fervent piety. What he deemed his conversion, though he seems to have been of a religious turn before, was of that sudden kind which some of the orthodox still look for and to which they attach so much importance. One night when he was taking off his clothes, the thought of doing this for the last time, and lying on the bed a corpse, so powerfully impressed him that a peculiar change came over him, and henceforth he resolved to devote his life to God. Falling into ill-health, he went to Egypt with the sentence of death upon him, whence he wrote some touching letters to his father, and received some no less touching from him; returned home, reprieved for a season; had again to visit Egypt; engaged in endeavours to evangelise the Copts; heard of his father's death, and came back to Scotland, where he took great pains to promote the moral and spiritual good of his dependents, and died in 1864. Our readers may remember the accident which befel his second son (of whom the volume gives a short account), a young man of much promise, who was killed, a short time ago, by his own gun while a student at Cambridge.

We have frequently had the pleasure of pointing out the improved form which orthodoxy is taking, as shown in recent publications. The old, hard, cruel creeds are clearly becoming much milder, more humane and merciful, and the way being prepared for the substitution of a religion of love for a religion of fear. In "Five Discourses on the History of Balaam," by the Rev. Wm. Roberts, we have an instance of this. The first is in great measure occupied with an argument to prove that the Jews were never the sole possessors of religious truth, and the author characterises as "monstrous" the notion that "while the final plan of mercy was in course of development the great wide world, without the parallels in which it moved, was utterly neglected and forsaken of its God." On the contrary, "two lines of culture have been going on side by side, with a view to the ultimate salvation of the world." This we verily believe, but it is utterly at variance with the Westminster and other Confessions of faith, and, not so long ago, would have been pronounced damnable heresy.

GOOD WORKS IN PARIS.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Daily News, describing the ways in which Parisians spend Lent, gives the following interesting particulars:—

In no country as in France is the system of association for purposes of charity practised, and in no part of France as in Paris. Every lady of any birth, or fortune, or standing, has her own pet "work," and is, besides that, a member of several other "works" organised by her friends. It is a vast net spread over society, and break through it or escape from it you can't. Of course there is immense exaggeration in all these œuvres, and a large proportion of them are nearly useless and fated to collapse; but some are really excellent, and they furnish part of the "neutral ground" on which different opinions and classes are drawn together.

Every foundress of a "work" aims at giving a concert or a "play." She is up early and retires late, and "hunts" celebrities all the night and day. When she has got a few of them together she begs twenty or more of her friends to take so many tickets, and these are disposed of at a high price, and the "work" in question realises one, two, or up to five or six hundred pounds, as the case may be. This goes on till Easter. After Easter come the small private balls (by far the choicest things of all) and the "sales." This is another form of the charity tax-levying, and it falls chiefly on the persons who are possessed of gardens. However, as I said, some of these "works" are so genuinely useful that any one giving his money to them may feel glad that he has done so.

There is the "Œuvre de la Miséricorde," which is for the assistance of such unfortunates as, while they may be dying of hunger, must "keep up appearances"—poor clerks, professors, &c., whose living would be taken from them if they could not maintain a decent style of dress. The good done by this association is incalculable. It was founded by the Prince de Chalais, counts one hundred and twenty patronesses, is principally superintended by the Countess de Flavigny, and on an average gets by its annual concert or fête about £800.—Then there is the "Professional School" of the Princess de Beauvau, a most admirable institution. It is a fact that the number of poor women for whom vice is a refuge is chiefly increased by the helpless condition of the petty tradesman's daughters. The petty tradesman in Paris can earn a tolerably comfortable livelihood, but no more—he can lay nothing by. If he dies before his daughter marries, she is usually left destitute and without education to enable her to gain her bread. She is too often reduced to sell her self for this. The Princesse de Beauvau (a Pole by birth) has founded a school where, for ten francs a month, the daughters of small tradesmen can receive completely such education as their parents desire. They may become governesses (with their diploma), or teachers of music or drawing, or dress-makers, or ladies' maids; whatever the parents wish for them is carried out. They may be of any religion, Jew, Protestant, or Catholic, so long as they have a religion, and the instruction given to them is the most solid that can be imagined. There is an atelier for dressmaking, where Worth sends his patterns, and which is headed by one of his deputies. In short, a more practical establishment can scarcely be conceived. Of course mere private resources are insufficient, for the school which began with twenty pupils has increased to near ninety in one year. Well, for this, too, a fête of some kind has to be given.—The third association is also one worth ministering to. Its object is to found agricultural colonies in every department in France. The principle is that of co-operation. A landlord takes a farm of his own, and gets it farmed by twenty or thirty "colonists" between the ages of 12 and 21, under the direction of an able agriculturist. The farm is found to prosper in an unbelievable degree, and in four years to have paid all its expenses, and be worth per annum more than the double of its worth before the trial was made. The principle is a moral one, and is founded on the quality as well as quantity of the labour furnished. At the end of the year, the profits being divided, each youth finds himself possessed of his labour's gains, and he quickly learns that every delve of his spade in the earth means money. But if he leaves the colony before he is 21, he forfeits his "purse," and here is the landlord's guarantee. The experiment has been tried individually, and succeeds thoroughly, and what I am stating on this head I state de visu. I have examined the accounts of a farm in the district of Blois, and found that at the end of the four years' work of nineteen colonists not one boy had less than ten pounds laid by—one lad, approaching 21, had £28, and has been taken as sub-director of another group. The landlord five years ago was unable to let this farm at all, because it yielded nothing. He can let it now, if he choose, for £300 a year. This institution counts among its patrons the highest names in France, and M. Drouyn de Lhuys is its president—but again, it needs funds! It is evident that the large mass of "works" torturing the public with their concerts and fêtes are simply a nuisance, but some few are really and truly interesting; and there seems here but one way of obtaining money in support of "private initiative." Things must be played or sung for, and during Lent, in the corner of every saloon, there is hidden a "patroness," who darts upon you like a siren from her rock, and pay you must. This is the form affected by social enjoyment in the Carême.

OLD MOTHER YEAR.

(BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CLOUDS.")

Old Mother Year

Has daughters dear—

One, two, three, four;

And though she has been a wife so long,

And still continues hale and strong,

She ne'er had more.

And ne'er, I ween,

Were all four seen

Aboard together;

But each in turn her season knows

And forth upon her furlough goes,

Whate'er the weather.

No mother bore

Four daughters more;

Unlike each other;

For save in love of yearly roaming,

They've little else they hold in common

Except their mother.

The youngest, Spring—

A skittish thing—

Delights in green;

And when she comes abroad she weaves

A chaplet gay of buds and leaves,

And, certes, is, as she believes,

A dashing queen.

The second daughter

Follows after,

Full of laughter,

Fruits, and flowers—

Sets the streams and birds a-singing.

And the woods and fields a-ringing,

Winds, and waves, and clouds a-going,

And the roses all a-blowing,

Bright amidst their bowers.

With sunburnt air,

And yellow hair,

And golden zone,

A buxom maid across the mead

Comes Autumn with her oaten reed,

Her merry maids behind her dancing,

And laden wains in troops advancing

With gleaners scattered round.

Last and forlorn,

The eldest born,

In turn appears—

Her face is sharp and white and cold,

The obvious visage of a scold,

Which evil temper hath made old,

And not her years.

Hence frequent wars,

And family jars,

She spiteful breeds;

But still as she's been a mortal may,

Her sisters bear her sulky sway

And surly deeds.

Thus Mother Year

Has daughters dear—

One, two, three, four;

And though she's been a wife so long,

And still continues hale and strong,

She ne'er had more.

RELICS ECCLESIASTICAL.

UNDER this heading the Cornhill has two articles, which give some curious particulars concerning Church relics, and similar matters, and show what demands Romanism has made, and still makes, on the faith of its votaries. We single out three instances.

This is its account of the famous Glastonbury thorn. Joseph of Arimathea set off from Palestine with the determination to wander about the earth till he had found a second Mount Tabor. Eventually he landed on Wearily Hill, near Glastonbury, the low grounds in those days being covered by the sea, and in the Tor recognised the object of his search. He struck his stick into the ground (another tradition says, a thorn from the Crown of Thorns), where immediately it took root, becoming, in fact, the famous Glastonbury Thorn, which, according to a most true and veritable chap-book, budded on the morning of Christmas-day, blossomed at noon, and faded away at night. The original tree existed till the time of Queen Elizabeth, when one of its two trunks was destroyed by a Puritan, who would have cut down the other as well, if a chip had not jumped up, of its own accord, of course, and put his eye out. A military 'saint' in the time of Charles I. completed its destruction. Descendants, however, which still bloom at Christmas, may be seen in the abbey grounds. Another famous tree at Glastonbury was the walnut, brought by a pilgrim from Palestine, which came suddenly into leaf every St. Barnabas's-day, fragments of which were highly esteemed as charms against every sort of misfortune. King James, though he did not believe in tobacco, was a firm believer in the Glastonbury walnut.

We are furnished with these particulars of many-bodied saints. It may seem strange that any uncertainty should exist as to whether Mary Magdalen was the same person as Mary, the sister of Martha, or not, yet not only is the point uncertain, but so strong is the evidence on both sides, it appears absolutely indeterminate. Common tradition, however, makes them the same, and represents the Magdalen coming, with her sister and Lazarus, to Marseilles, where Lazarus was the first bishop, and taking up her abode in a cave called Le Saint Beaume, between Toulon and Marseilles. Her relics were discovered in the thirteenth century at St. Maximins, and "were authoritatively proved genuine by many monuments found with them." Charles of Anjou, who had been taken prisoner by the King of Arragon, ascribed his liberation to the Magdalen, and caused her remains to be transferred, with great pomp to the church he had built at that place; and there they exist still. The head is in a subterranean chapel, in a gold case set with large diamonds. It consists only of her skull, except a small portion of the forehead,—the spot where our Saviour is said to have touched her. But there are other claimants for the possession of her relics. As Calvin says, "There followeth after Lazarus and Magdeline his sister. As touching him he hath, as farre as I know, but three bodies; one is at Mersels, the other at Authum, the thyrd at Avalon. Forasmuch as Magdeline was a woman, it beheveth that she should be inferiour to her brother, therefore she hath but two bodies, whereof the one is at Vesele, near Auserre, and the other, which is of greater re-nome, at St. Maximins, in Province. There where the head is a part, with her noli me tangere, which is a piece of waxe, which some doe thynke to be the marke that Jesus Christ gave her in despit because he was sory that she woulde touch him." The Vezelay one, Butler suggests, may be that of "some other Mary mentioned in the Gospel." Calvin, however, had never read "Willibald's Travels," or he would have known that a third body was at Ephesus, which the Greeks held to be the genuine one, and which was translated to Constantinople by Leo the Wise. Of the apostle chosen into the room of the traitor—St. Matthias—one body is in the abbey church of Trier, another at St. Maria Maggiore at Rome,—though this last may possibly belong to another Matthias, one of the early bishops of Jerusalem; and Calvin declares there is another at Padua. "Besydes this, he hath a head and an arme parte likewise at Rome."

And this is what is told us of miraculous wafers. One of these is in the cathedral at Brussels. As in many other cases, the Jews were charged with blasphemous conduct towards it. These poor creatures, in the Middle Ages, seem to have been looked on much as King John used to regard his dearly beloved subjects, as so many money-bags to be squeezed as long as anything could be got out of them. In 1290 there was a universal massacre of them throughout Germany, on the charge of having insulted the Host; and at Bacharach are the ruins of a very beautiful Gothic chapel, dedicated to St. Werner, a boy said to have been crucified by the Jews in derision, with just as much truth, no doubt, as tales of similar atrocities at Gloucester and Lincoln. The body was then said to have been thrown into the river, but instead of floating down the stream, went up to Bacharach, where it was taken care of and afterwards canonized. The Brussels wafer was stolen by a Jew, one Good Friday, about the end of the fourteenth century, and carried off to the synagogue. Here it was pricked by the knives of the congregation, on which blood gushed out, and the impious people were stricken senseless. On their crime being discovered, the ring-leaders were put to death with horrible tortments. A special Sunday is set apart for the commemoration of this miracle, and the wafer itself is exhibited on that day. A somewhat similar story is told of the wafers at Deggen Dorf, in Bavaria. After various insults, all of them defeated by miraculous interference, the wafers were thrown into a well; but a brilliant light upon the waters revealed the crime. This led to the discovery of the offenders, and of course to the confiscation of their goods. The wafer preserved in the Escorial was the one that shed blood at Gorcum, in Holland, in 1525, when trampled under foot by the Zwinglians. It had a narrow escape at the French invasion, when it was hid in the cellar, other contents of which were better appreciated by the soldiers. It was restored with great pomp by Ferdinand VII., in 1814.

SOME of our Ritualist friends, whether on account of the Mackonochie judgment or not, we cannot say, have been keeping this season with more than ordinary austerity, and their "lenten fare" has been of a very meagre kind indeed. Now against a little fasting occasionally we have nothing to say, for, as a medical friend of ours learnedly puts it, we are persuaded "far more die of repletion than of inanition;" but we sometimes fear that this practice of being specially devout for forty days is made to stand for acts of piety at other times, and that religion is then "done up" for the year.

The origin of Lent, like many other Papal observances, is lost in the obscurity of those early ages when errors multiplied in the Church with amazing rapidity; but it is supposed by many to date from about A.D. 250. Venerable as it is, however, it cannot be traced back quite far enough to become of binding force with those who seek apostolic authority for their observances, and seems rather conducive to a religion of times and forms than that "worship in spirit and in truth," which cannot be confined to any particular season, but pervades all seasons and makes holy the commonest scenes and events of every-day life.

The mistaken notions caused by the minute washing of the outside of the cup and platter, required by the churches which impose the Lenten fast, are well hit off in the following lines of Herrick, who, it must be remembered, was a clergyman in the Charles's days:—

"Is this a Fast, to keep
The larder lean
And clean
From fat of veals and sheep?
"Is it to quit the dish
Of flesh, yet still
The platter high with fish?
"Is it to fast an hour,
Or rag'd to go,
Or show
A downcast look or sour?
"No: 'Tis a fast to dole
Thy sheaf of wheat
And meat
Unto the hungry soul.
"It is to fast from strife,
From old debate
And hate;
To circumsise thy life;
"To show a heart grief-rent,
To starve thy sin,
Not bin:
And that's to keep thy Lent!"

INTELLIGENCE

ACCINGTON DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.—A meeting of this union was held at Rawtenstall on Saturday afternoon, when about fifty or sixty persons were present, from Accington, Burnley, Newchurch, and Rawtenstall. After tea Mr. Bibby, of Burnley, presided, and Mr. Farn, of the same place, read a paper. Subject: "How to make Sunday schools successful." In the discussion which followed Messrs. Aitken, L. Ashworth, Noble, Herd, Hargreaves, John Ingham, Rawstrone, Holt, Hitchen, and Holden took part.

DUNDEE.—On the evening of Tuesday, the 2nd inst., the Dundee Unitarian congregation held their annual soirée. The chair was occupied by the Rev. H. Williamson. About 120 persons sat down to tea; after which the chairman delivered an address, in which he reviewed the history of the cause in Dundee, and expressed an opinion that its present condition was of a very promising nature. Two previous attempts had many years ago been made to obtain a footing for Unitarianism in Dundee, but these to all outward appearance had failed. He, however, hoped—and circumstances justified him in hoping—that this third attempt to introduce into this important town the principles of Free Christianity would be successful. He adverted to the very encouraging state of the movement recently set on foot for the erection of a Unitarian chapel at Dundee, and to the moral support and pecuniary assistance so liberally afforded to the movement by sympathisers in other parts of the country. Mr. Williamson then went on to speak of the progress made by the congregation during the past year, the roll of members having been augmented by about fifty names, and the Sunday school having increased in the same ratio. After a hymn had been sung, the financial report was read by the treasurer, Mr. Briggs, who also gave an account of the very liberal way in which his call for subscriptions to the church building fund had been responded to in various parts of the country. The rest of the evening was occupied with short speeches, congratulations, and music.

EDINBURGH.—The Rev. J. Frederick Smith, author of two excellent articles which have recently appeared in the Theological Review, has accepted an invitation to fill the pulpit of St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh, during the absence of the Rev. R. B. Drummond. Mr. Smith was formerly a Baptist minister, and about two years ago resigned his pulpit in consequence of a change in his religious views. He has been residing for some time past at Göttingen, where he is at present.

GLASGOW.—The annual business meeting of the St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church was held last Sunday, at the close of the morning service. There was a numerous attendance of members and friends of the church. Mr. J. Hay occupied the chair. The secretary submitted the annual report of the committee, which congratulated the congregation on the satisfactory condition of their affairs. The treasurer's statement showed an income of £712. 16s. 3d.; expenditure, £702. 7s. 3d.; leaving a balance in his hands of £10. 9s. Equally favourable reports were submitted respecting the Sunday school, Benevolent Society, library, and other institutions connected with the church. On the motion of the Chairman, the reports were unanimously adopted. The committee and office-bearers for the ensuing year were then appointed, after which the chairman intimated that the Rev. Mr. Crosskey had been waited upon by a deputation from the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, who had been appointed to urge upon his acceptance the pastorate of that church. A lengthened consideration of the matter took place, in which all who took part expressed their sincere regret at the prospect of parting with Mr. Crosskey, who for sixteen years has been minister of the church, and under whose care it has greatly prospered, and their earnest desire to retain him in their midst should this be in accordance with the best interests of all concerned. A deputation was appointed to wait upon Mr. Crosskey and convey to him the views of the meeting on the subject, and the meeting adjourned for a week to receive their report.

HEYWOOD.—On Monday the 8th inst., the Unitarians of this place assembled in their schoolroom and had a cup of tea together, after which a meeting was held, when the affairs of the congregation were discussed. The minister, the Rev. J. Fox, presided, and briefly reviewed the progress made during the last five years, and introduced one or two topics to the consideration of the meeting. Various members took part in the discussion, and altogether the tone of the meeting was hopeful, and the prospects of the congregation considered to be encouraging.

LONDON: LAYING THE FOUNDATION STONE OF A CHAPEL AT STRATFORD.—On Saturday, 6th inst., Alfred Lawrence, Esq., laid the memorial stone of this new chapel. There were present about 100 persons, and all seemed deeply interested in the service. The locality is the most eastern part of London, and in the neighbourhood of the railway works of the Great Eastern Railway, which employs about twelve hundred men. The chapel is in one of the most frequented and open thoroughfares, called West Ham-lane, with an increasing population. It will be a beautiful little chapel in the Italian style, designed by T. C. Clarke, Esq., and will contain seats for two hundred persons. The service was commenced by a hymn, which was given out by the minister, the Rev. T. Rix. Passages of scripture were read by the Rev. R. B. Aspland, and the prayer offered by the Rev. R. Spears. Mr. Aspland then introduced Mr. Lawrence in a brief address, and Mr. Lawrence having placed a bottle containing four Unitarian periodicals, Inquirer, Unitarian Herald, Christian Freeman, and other papers and tracts under the stone, and performed the necessary part of the service, declared the stone "well and truly laid," and proceeded to speak of the pleasure with which he took part in the ceremony, and of his deep interest in the erection of a place for the worship of God according to the pure faith taught by our Lord Jesus Christ. He also dwelt upon the work which lay before the future congregation, and expressed his earnest hope that they might build up a true and living church. A hymn and benediction concluded the service.

LONDON UNITARIAN LAY PREACHERS' UNION.—A meeting under the presidency of Samuel Sharpe, Esq., was held in Stamford-street Chapel, on Monday evening. Mr. Sharpe said that this was the third year of this society's usefulness, and though the zeal of some of the members had a little abated, yet a good work was still going on which he hoped would be continued. He urged the importance of founding Sunday schools wherever preaching was conducted, for a church was very incomplete without they cared for the instruction of the young. Reports were then delivered by the representatives of the different stations. The Rev. T. Rix, from Stratford, assured the meeting that the lectures delivered there had done our cause some service. Mr. James Wells gave a favourable account of the success of their evening services at Mile End, and Mr. S. S. Tayler of the doings at Forest Hill. The cottage services at Hoxton, Mr. Julian reported had been very well attended, and the two branches of our cause in Clerkenwell had joined, and would hold their Sunday school and morning service in Plummer's-place, the evening service in the commodious chapel of St. John's-square. Mr. Carter, of Walworth, said that the services, morning and evening, in St. John's Chapel, were tolerably well attended, and all friends there were hopeful. Mr. Charles Harris was present from Woolwich, and it was agreed that a meeting house be at once taken at Woolwich, and services commenced during the present month. This trial to be made for one year. Week evening lectures were arranged for the above places, and a resolution passed recommending the engagement of another minister to aid the lay preachers in the work of those different stations. Upwards of twenty of the preachers were present at this meeting.

MANCHESTER: LOWER MOSLEY-STREET CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY.—On Wednesday evening last, the fifth annual meeting of this society was held in the girls' schoolroom, when about 160 persons were present. In the absence of the Rev. James Drummond, B.A., through illness, R. D. Darbshire, Esq.,

B.A., presided. The reports were read by Mr. Jesse Pilcher, and stated that the evening services were fairly attended; seven new members were that night to be added to the roll; visiting by the members was still carried on, and 7,500 tracts had been distributed. The receipts of the year, including a balance on hand, had been £16. 0s. 3d., and the expenditure £11. 12s. 10d., leaving a balance on hand of £4. 7s. 5d. The Rev. J. Page Hopps moved, and Mr. Reynolds seconded, the adoption of the reports. The resolution being carried, officers for the next year were appointed on the motion of Dr. Marcus, after which other addresses were delivered, and the meeting terminated in the usual way.

MIDDLESBOROUGH.—Mr. Weatherley, who has been superintendent of the Sunday-school for some time, and to whom it is greatly indebted, is now leaving the district, and has been presented by the congregation, teachers, and scholars, with a valuable collection of books, including Dr. Channing's Works, "Sermons" by Rev. R. Collyer, Dr. Beard's "Biblical Cyclopaedia," and Rev. J. Martineau's "Endeavours after the Christian Life."

PERTH.—A lecture was delivered in the Masons' Hall here, on Wednesday week, by the Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee, on "The Idea of God." Mr. Williamson compared the popular idea of God with that held by Unitarians, and was listened to with earnest attention by as many as could gain admittance, numbers having to go away for want of accommodation. A discussion took place at the close, but the opposition was so feeble that a decided impression was made in favour of liberal views. The local committee have made arrangements for a larger hall for future lectures. On the 3rd inst., Mr. Williamson delivered a lecture on "Morality," to about 200 persons, after which a discussion followed.

DUNDEE UNITARIAN CHURCH.

Subscriptions from the friends of the cause of Unitarian Christianity are solicited on behalf of the Building Fund. The present meeting place (a public hall) costs about £40 annually, available only on Sundays. If the congregation could be relieved of this expense, the cause would be nearly self-supporting.

About £1,500 will be needed. Toward this sum the following subscriptions have been received:

Amount previously advertised	62	14	0
Miss Mather, Liverpool	10	0	0
A Friend, Liverpool	10	0	0

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

As yet, neither Roman Catholic nor Protestant Christians seem to have done much to conciliate the Japanese priests. In a memorial presented to the Government by a body of them, they describe the former as making converts, "either by giving money to the poor, by performing miracles to those who love wonders, or by appealing to the passions of the people;" and a certain spy once "heard a priest of the false religion expounding as follows: 'Those that become of my faith, and believe in what I preach, will ascend to heaven and enjoy everlasting happiness; the followers of Buddhism and Sintoism will be cast into hell and be in everlasting misery.' After this, in the midst of a ray of glorious light, a magnificent lofty palace appeared, and lovely beings were seen in sweet communion together. Consequently, the wish to die and go to these heavenly places has taken hold on the hearts of men to such an extent that they fear no punishment." These deceivers are Frenchmen; but there are English Protestants who likewise lay themselves out to deceive, and are even more mischievous than the former, outwardly appearing to teach astronomy, geography, medicine, &c., but all the time seeking "to instil the poison of their false religion." The memorial prays that "good and noble men will not be led away by these false and corrupt doctrines," and that they will "use every endeavour to keep the country as firm as a rock in its established faith."

An important sign of the spread of anti-ecclesiastical feeling has just been given by the Ayuntamiento of Barcelona, who, having twice before decided against "civil marriages," on the question being brought up a third time, decided in favour of them by twenty-one to eighteen.

Funds have been provided for the establishment of a scholarship in the English College at Rome, to be called "The Wiseman Scholarship," in honour of the late cardinal, who once held the mastership. The number of students is about forty, who are all educating for the Church.

The ceremony of blessing the Golden Rose was performed by the Pope last week. It will be remembered that it was presented last year, as a peculiar mark of regard, to the Queen of Spain. It has not yet transpired what monarch is to be favoured with it this year, but we should think that the one who may be chosen out for the honour will receive it with some little feeling of misgiving.

Last week, too, the English Catholics in Rome celebrated a triduum at the Church of St. George (generally supposed by historians to be a mythical personage), for the intercession of that saint in bringing about the return of England to the true faith.

The Catholic papers inform us that the fifteenth anniversary of the Pope's ordination is to be celebrated on the 14th of next month, when all sorts of presents are to be made to him. Among others he is to receive from the Commission of Hospitals at Rome a missal-stand, surmounted with a statuette of the Immaculate Conception, crowned with diamonds and pearls, the value of the whole being £2,000.

It is stated that in the twenty-three German Universities there are 3,556 theological students and 203 professors.

A Berlin correspondent of the Daily News gives an account of a strange religious sect in Russia, called "The Skopzen," and said to derive its name from the doctrine of the mortification of the flesh. The leader is a rich merchant, whose house is a kind of nunnery, which contained, at the time when the discovery was made, nine resident nuns; and immense treasure is stated to have been found collected in it.

A prayer meeting on a large scale was held in London on Friday last, and we believe in a few other places on a smaller scale, under the auspices of the "National Protestant Union," in accordance with the addresses of the bishops of the Church of Ireland, "calling upon them to assemble their congregations for prayer and humiliation before God at this momentous crisis;" and to entreat His mercy that "the dangers that threaten us be by His grace averted."

Church meetings, likewise, on the same subject have been held in various parts of Ireland, marked by little enthusiasm but by much Celtic strength of language. At one, presided over by the Vice-

Provost of Trinity College, a resolution was passed, declaring Mr. Gladstone's bill "unequal in its provisions," a measure that "would deprive thousands of families of the blessings of a parochial ministry." Mr. Traill, a fellow of Trinity College, who spoke at this meeting, was cheered when he said that "If the first part of the Act of Union was to be rejected, Protestants and Roman Catholics could not be charged with treason in uniting to reject the other half." Another speaker said they would be "much better off legislating for themselves." At a meeting in Fermoy the Rev. Dr. Langley said, "The time had come for a repeal of the Union. Our allegiance to the Queen is binding only so long as she maintains Protestant rights," and declared himself in favour, if necessity arose, of active resistance. The "necessity," of course, will never arise. At a large meeting in Belfast on Tuesday, when the Bishop of Down and Connor, who presided, stated his conviction that the voice of the country had been given against the relationship between the Irish Church and the State, and that he had recommended a conference with Mr. Gladstone to obtain a modification of some parts of his bill, the whole assembly rose and hissed, crying "No, never, never," and when he expressed the opinion that the Prime Minister had approached the subject with no bitter or hostile feelings, he was assailed with hisses, and shouts of "traitor" and "Judas." One of the speakers, the Rev. Dr. Drew, informed the assembly that they were met to oppose national sin of the blackest dye, to rescue her Majesty from evil counsellors and lawyers, who would twist and turn her, and tell her that her solemn oath was no oath at all; and that if Mr. Gladstone's bill passed, there would be an end to all right of property and primogeniture, and then would come vote by ballot, and after that, most probably, repeal of the Union. At the Dublin Protestant Defence meeting, Lord James Butler, describing the bill as "atrocious," raised the cry of "No surrender," and Mr. Traill thought a good prayer for the times would be, "From Jews, Turks, heretics, infidels, and Whig lawyers, Good Lord deliver us!" Such ravings, of course, only serve to show how unfit the men from whom they proceed are to help on the cause of true "Protestant ascendancy."

THE BURIALS REGULATION BILL, introduced by Mr. Haddfield, which if carried will be another step towards placing Dissenters on a level with members of the Establishment, consists of four clauses, of which the first provides that Nonconformist ministers may at convenient times perform burials in the churchyards according to the customary method of the denomination to which the deceased persons belonged; the second prevents any such service from interfering in any way with Divine service in the church itself; the third provides for due notice to be given to the minister, vicar, or incumbent of the church; and the fourth exempts from the provisions of the Act such churchyards as have been given or purchased for the sole use of worshippers in the church to which they are attached. It is also provided that Quakers and Baptists shall "be deemed of equal rights with respect to burial with other denominations."

We expressed our regret at the time of the general election that, owing to the corrupt influences at work, Mr. Miall should have been rejected by Bradford, and we now all the more heartily rejoice in his triumphant return. As editor of the Nonconformist, and in various other ways, he has rendered important service to the cause of religious equality among his countrymen, and there is scarcely any one whom his fellow-dissenters could more fitly choose to represent them in the House of Commons. He re-enters it, too, at a very opportune season. His speech on the Irish Church question, twelve years ago, has frequently been referred to since, for the mastery which it displayed of the facts of the case, and the clearness and force with which they were set forth; and he will be another staunch veteran added to the formidable phalanx which Mr. Gladstone has at his back wherewith to fight the great fight which began last night in earnest. It was only fitting, too, that one who has had so long and arduous a part in the struggle as Mr. Miall should now at last have his share in the coming triumph.

The Church Times considers that the part of Mr. Gladstone's measure which will be called "secularisation" is far less so than the present allotment of the Church funds. It says:

"The ancient distribution of ecclesiastical monies was fourfold—one part to the bishop, one to the maintenance of divine service and the fabric of the church, one to the poor, and the fourth part alone was left for the priest. We cannot conceive a more secular way of spending money than in paying a black-coated farmer for not doing his proper work, and in buying crinolines and pap-boats for his wife and children. St. Atticus sold the vessels of the altar to feed the poor of Constantinople, and was applauded by the Church for his act. Can any one say that docking the non-resident Dublin rectors of their unearned incomes, to help the sick and insane, is a less meritorious proceeding? We throw not. We have kept aloof from another argument, because it is beside the main question before Parliament, though not beside that before the tribunal of Christianity. We mean that to us, endowing a body of clergy which teaches Protestantism is exactly like endowing a hospital where the physicians are all Thugs, and the patients, consequently, sure to be made away with. . . . No grander opportunity for reform has ever been given to any Church, and no Church has ever needed reform more. Of one thing it may be absolutely certain, that no reform or reconstruction which does not accept as its fundamental principle that Protestantism is not only an imposture, but one which has been found out and must be discarded, as the true source of every sin and every punishment the Irish Church has felt, will be of the smallest use in preserving the life of the disendowed and disestablished communion."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The language of the Neapolitan press on the decision of the Court of Appeal in favour of the marriage of a priest, which we referred to a fortnight ago, is: "The Catholic priest evidently infringes, from an ecclesiastical point of view, an established discipline—a discipline monstrous and contrary to nature—a discipline which existed not in the earliest and better times of the Church—but he does not, therefore, put himself out of the communion of the faithful." The people, too, loudly applauded the decision; still, the Naples correspondent of the Guardian seems inclined to think that the result will not be great, but that the question will be suffered to go to rest. "The truth is," he says, "Rome is active and vigilant, and, however quietly and secretly, she exerts a power which is felt and feared, while the State and the people, not knowing whom to trust, do nothing. They make a show of resistance and progress, but advance not at all." There are even some signs of retrogression, to which he refers, in the South, but he looks more hopefully to the North.

Professor Jowett preached on Sunday, at St. James's, Marylebone, from the words, "And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free" (John viii. 32). He spoke of the prevailing mode of interpreting the Scriptures, and remarked that it was just as possible to misinterpret the Scriptures as it was to put a wrong interpretation on the words "the body and blood of Christ," which occur in the Communion service. This was especially the case with the sayings and doings of Christ, which were not written down until long afterwards, and then very imperfectly. No supernatural means were taken to preserve the Gospels, and now the Church was separated from the teaching of the Gospels by the widening thoughts of men and the progress of civilization and science. Some persons affected to believe that in consequence of this state of things the old faith had gone, and that an age of criticism and materialism had succeeded to it. Others desired that Christianity might be protected from freedom of thought, but what sort of Christianity must that be which could not bear the test of the ordinary rules of inquiry?

The Spectator comments on the tone, in which the Lords speak, of infinite condescension, not without a flavour of contempt, for true Christian missionaries, as if they were not the pioneers of civilization, but its most subordinate and insignificant followers. There is a real and sound reason why the State should deal on a different basis with the legal rights of traders and the legal rights of missionaries—namely, that to enforce the latter by armies and fleets cuts the ground from under the missionary altogether, and that this ought to be evident to him, if it is not, when he first incurs the risk from which he suffers. But if we admit this to the full, why should any Englishman who really wishes to be, as well as to be thought a Christian, hesitate to admit the infinitely higher claim of a true Christian missionary on our respect and veneration than of any mere trader? If we assert the rights of the latter more keenly than of the former, it is not or ought not to be because we think them higher and more legitimate rights, but because we think them infinitely lower and less truly spiritual rights. The latter can maintain themselves by the supernatural power with which God inspires the heart of man. The former need human law to back them up. This should, the Spectator thinks, be the tone of any truly Christian legislature in discussing such matters. It is not the prevailing tone of the House of Lords. But then, is the House of Lords, or indeed any other assembly of practical Englishmen, in spite of the English Establishment on the whole a Christian assembly?

The London Review thinks the Duke of Somerset's remarks on the same subject just, and that no satisfactory answer [can be given to his question, What right have we to convert the Chinese? "We have not the shadow of a right to force our religion upon other nations: we have not even the justification of success. Neither in India nor in China does Christianity show any substantial advance, and the few converts that are made are generally described as anything but improvements on the unconverted." We trust this is by no means true, though the conversions reported are too often merely nominal, [and not such as really "turn" the heart and life.

The Guardian says:

"The resolution taken by the chiefs of the Opposition to fight a pitched battle on the second reading of the Irish Church Bill has the merit of straightforwardness, and may for party objects be not unwise. But if so, this is one of the many cases in which the interests of the Conservative party are not the interests of the Church. He must be very shortsighted, who either really thinks that the Irish Establishment can be permanently maintained, or, not really thinking that it can, prefers, instead of trying to make the best of this Bill, to risk the chances, practically overwhelming, of a worse."

Referring to the 22nd clause of the Bill, which practically means that the body appointed by the bishops and clergy to represent the Irish Church, and whom her Majesty may by charter incorporate, must be a lay as well as clerical synod, the same paper observes:

"The formation of mixed lay and clerical Synods, so close to us, is not without interest, and it is possible that it may not be wholly without good effects. For the Christian faith to have its proper strength, and ability to resist assaults, it ought to stand forth as the faith of the body. Of course it does so in public worship, but it is a great advantage also if it can make the whole body, clerical and lay, its mouthpiece in a Synodical character too. We live in times in which every source of freshness and life which exists and can be called into requisition should be summoned and made to act. There is no real difference whatever between the belief of clergyman and a religious layman; but there are a great number who would not be sorry to have it generally supposed that there was. If the real fact is made, by means of public concert and co-operation of the two classes, to stand out in its true light, it is so much gain to the Church. It will be the first introduction of the laity into public religious functions, others than those they possess as public worshippers. . . . Of this we are certain, that the religious laity are part of our Church's strength of which she has not availed herself properly, and to the extent to which it can be made use of. The new Irish Synod is a new fact, then, rising upon our horizon, which may be contemplated in a good light, and may lead generally to a closer public relationship of clergy and laity in the Church at large."

After referring to the manly article of the Guardian on Mr. Gladstone's measure, the Freeman remarks:

"It is, gratifying, indeed, to notice among many of the best Churchmen the growth of a religious faith in place of their old faith in a State Establishment. We believe it will grow yet more and more. Would that the great Evangelical party, in this respect, emulated the High Church and the Ritualists; they, however, seem to be among the last to discover the signs of the times, and so far as they do, with a few noble exceptions, these signs produce in them only despondency or irritation."

The Weekly Register (Roman Catholic), in commenting on the position of Mr. Ffoulkes in the Church to which he still professes to belong, thus decisively lays down the law for him:

"The sphere of Mr. Ffoulkes is, as a humble son of the Church, to submit his very weak and most fallible judgment to her decrees, and thankfully accept her teaching. Aut discere aut discere—learn or go, is what she says to him; she did not ask him to become a Catholic; she got on very well without him before, and will get on very well without him when his brief span of life has come to an end. She was glad when he joined her, as she would rejoice at the conversion of any of the poorest and dirtiest old applewomen in London, neither more nor less."

In an article on the Irish Bill, the Church News, with its usual Christian courtesy, says:

"We do not deny that the mongrel crew at Mr. Gladstone's back possesses a considerable amount of brute force, and that brute force may very probably triumph. But there can be no doubt that Mr. Gladstone's bill is more truly revolutionary than anything which has been done since the so-called Reformation—if we except the Great Rebellion and the hateful incursion of Dutch William."

The English Independent asks:

"Shall the fountain send forth bitter and sweet waters? Shall the Church of England teach transubstantiation with one mouth and with another that the story of the resurrection is a myth? Are Mr. Bennett, of Frome, on the confines of Popery's torrid zone, and Mr. Voysey, of Healhough, in the Arctic region of scepticism, equally loyal sons of the Establishment, and equally valid exponents of its doctrines? An attempt is to be made to settle this interesting question. The Archbishop of York has very reluctantly commenced a prosecution against Mr. Voysey, and in spite of the refusal of the new Bishop of London to countenance the proceeding, the Church association are pushing on the prosecution of Mr. Bennett. The Bishops evidently foresee the great probability of the failure of both, and in that case the Church will be explicitly accredited with the heresies of these extreme men. If Mr. Bennett and Mr. Voysey escape, whether on a technicality or on the merits, the Broad Church will be triumphant—it will be quite unnecessary to stretch it any wider."

We agree entirely with the Times that the University Tests Bill had better be abandoned altogether than passed with the new test which Sir R. Palmer proposes to add to it. Every professor, every tutor, every lecturer is to declare that he will never, in the discharge of his office, directly or indirectly, teach or inculcate any opinion opposed to the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures. It would hardly be possible to devise anything more likely to lead to dissension. What is the meaning of "opposed to the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures?" Surely anything that tends to bring up wretched squabbles of the Colenso and "Essays and Reviews" order ought to be discouraged. It is just the sense of being "cabined, cribbed, and confined" by tests and subscriptions which excites in the universities that anti-theological spirit among some of the members of which Sir Roundell Palmer declares himself blissfully ignorant.

HIGH CHURCHISM.

THE article in the Contemporary Review, referred to in "What is Saying," has the following remarks on this subject.

The High Churchism of our day exhibits one most remarkable feature, which is in the highest degree deserving of attention. It has ceased from all endeavour to establish itself by proof. Great thinkers of every age have felt the weight of the duty to make good the evidences of the Christian religion itself. It has been a task ever enjoined and ever performed anew. So also has it been with the great schools of theology in the past. Their efforts to vindicate their several positions were as incessant as they were noble. But the modern English High Churchman soars in a far loftier region. He recognises no obligation to prove his faith to others. His self-assertion suffices; the assumption of his own infallibility is the only reason which he will condescend to give to those who ask him to give an account of his belief. In the early days of the Tractarian movement, elaborate appeals were made to Scripture and to antiquity in support of the doctrines of that school. Defences were written of Anglo-Catholicism, which, whatever might be thought of their success, left but one universal impression of their ability. The Tractarians had a theology, a body of ably-reasoned and argumentative divinity; the modern High Churchmen have none. Their followers are satisfied with the bare assertions of their clergy; and the clergy feel supreme contempt for all criticism and all argument. Least of all do they think of citing Scripture in their support; and no wonder, for Scripture has not the true Church-tone. Mr. Makonochie indignantly protests against the recent judgment of the Judicial Committee, as cutting off the Church of England from Catholic tradition; and Ritualists passionately exclaim, that without lights and prostrations the Christian religion cannot be carried on. But where, we ask, do these Ritualists place the beginning of Catholic tradition? In the Bible? The Apostle Paul was as fiercely indignant at the manner of celebrating the Eucharist at Corinth as Mr. Makonochie can ever be at its degradation in an Evangelical church or Dissenters' chapel. But is it with the absence of prostrations, and genuflections, and altar-candles, that St. Paul reproaches the Corinthians, as depriving the sacrament of its honour, and imperilling the vitality of religion? If such a thing is conceivable, let us suppose St. Paul to have written a letter to the Corinthian Church, such as Mr. Makonochie would have penned. Would not every one instantaneously feel that something very strange and incongruous had made its appearance, and every critic declare the new epistle to be spurious? It is not then in the words of Christ and his Apostles that the Churchman can find the doctrine and the religion of the Church.

To what authority, therefore, does he refer for the sanction of his teaching? What credentials can he produce? In what book? of what age? And when the age and the book are specified, let the proof be given categorically, that the men of that age, and the writers of that book, be it a body of decrees or any other writing, had a commission capable of being made good upon evidence, which lifted them above the ordinary infirmities of humanity, and enabled them to discern and proclaim the truth. But this is precisely the task which the modern High Churchman is at no pains to perform; nay, he treats the demand itself for evidence as a sign of a wrong-minded man, underserving of attention. Thus he builds on a foundation which to others seems to be one of sand, and to his own mind rests on self-complacent assertion. The result, however, in the present tendencies of so many of the clergy, is nothing short of a great public danger. The construction of a religion built on the idea of Church, and the failure to produce evidence in its support, endangers Christianity itself. In this respect, the absence of systematic proof in a Low Churchman is far less mischievous. He may be destitute of learning, and be incompetent to state accurately the evidences of the Christian religion; but he possesses in the Bible an incalculable advantage over the Churchman. He points to Christ—to what he did and to what he said, to the example of his goodness, his purity, and his love; and when he says that his aim is to be like his Master, and to be filled with the like spirit, he makes a defence of his religion, which, apart from all elaborate statements of learned proof, has commanded in every age the respect and the consideration of even unbelievers. The appeal, on the contrary, of the Churchman to the Church presents no such picture of a goodness which is itself its own evidence. It gives a reference to fallible men, to worldly men, who have shared in the weaknesses and the sins of human nature; to men who, though partakers of Episcopal ordination and of the gifts claimed for this rite, have been universally acknowledged to have fallen into lamentable errors, and to have been too often disgraced by vicious conduct. Who does not at once perceive the difference of the two positions? The Low Churchman takes his stand on the spirit of the Bible—on the character of a Book which speaks for itself. The High Churchman claims submission to an artificial system, of which every Christian has not only the right, but is absolutely bound, to require the proof. That proof is not forthcoming; nay, the very right of the intellect to demand it is contemptuously scorned. Why, then, should the Christian religion be received? mankind will ask. Let the High Churchman say.

THOLUCK.

AN American minister now staying at Halle gives an account of the University there, which has at present upon its rolls the names of seventy-six professors and about nine hundred students, and a notice of Dr. Tholuck, from which we make the following extracts:

Of the theological faculty, the best-known is Dr. Tholuck. He is now sixty-nine years of age, but his mind is still vigorous, and he lectures with all the ardour of a young man. When I remember that his whole life has been a constant conflict with disease, I am amazed at his power. For example, the week before last, in addition to his usual labours, he prepared and delivered a sermon and two addresses. It is now more than forty years since he came to Halle as a professor, for he received his appointment when twenty-four years of age. In all this time, notwithstanding bodily disease—he had a hemorrhage of the lungs when eighteen years old—he has never been obliged to omit a single lecture on account of ill health. "I thank God," he said to me a few days since, as we were coming from the university, "I thank God for what He has enabled me to accomplish." And what has he accomplished? Consider for a moment the state of things in the university when Tholuck took his place in the logical faculty. Rationalism then was in power here, and the young professor found himself alone. Gesenius, at the height of his popularity, was lecturing to four hundred students—so many that it was difficult to find a room sufficiently large for their accommodation. Such was his treatment of the Old Testament Scriptures that Dr. Hodge, of Princeton, who was here as a student, not unfrequently came from the lecture almost in tears, saying that he felt as if he could never hear Gesenius again. Rapidly the new professor won for himself a scholarly reputation, and to-day he, who at that time stood alone in the defence of evangelical Christianity, is the ruling power in the university. Indeed, he has been such for a long time. That the tide of rationalism has been stayed here, that is, in so far as the ministry in Germany is concerned, is due more to his efforts than to those of any other man.

November the first was the anniversary of Luther's nailing his ninety-five theses to the door of the church in Wittenberg, and two days after, November 10th, was Luther's birthday; so he preached a Luther sermon. It was a soul-stirring discourse, but especially at the close, when, addressing the students more directly, he said, "If Luther were to come among us to-day what would he say to you, young men?" and then, as if Luther had indeed suddenly entered the place, he poured forth a torrent of earnest words which might well have come from the lips of the great reformer. The two addresses of which I have spoken had reference to Schleiermacher, the anniversary of whose one hundredth birthday was celebrated here, as elsewhere in Germany, on the 21st of November.

AMERICAN NOTES.

AN American publication thus describes the way in which Mr. Ward Beecher makes his sermons: When he first commenced to preach he wrote out a few of them, until he had enough other writing to correct his style. Since then he has never written out a discourse in full. He has an idea all the week as to what subject he will treat on Sunday. Still, there is no definite plan in his mind until the time arrives. Usually, he does not touch pen to paper before Sunday morning and Sunday afternoon. Then he sometimes gets so many sermons under way that the one he intends to prepare is neglected until the first bell rings, whereupon he throws aside the incomplete work, and, blocking out a discourse, he hastens to the pulpit. Generally, he writes what would make a quarter of a sermon, embracing the leading points to be presented. In preparing a sermon he first "blocks it out," and lays the foundation with a part of the framework. At the proper places he cuts windows, through which the audience may see the beauties of the Gospel. The windows are designated by the letters "Ill.," inclosed in a line thus (Ill.), showing that an illustration is to come in at that particular point. None of the illustrations are ever written out beforehand or with the sermon, but they are given as they occur at the time when they are needed. Often, when in the pulpit, he finds the windows in the wrong place. He always has a variety of new sermons on hand, to be used on special occasions. He said that in old times the housewife kept a batch of dough in the pantry, and when bread was required all she had to do was to go to the tray and cut off enough for baking. So it is with his sermons. He never preaches the same one twice, though he frequently uses the same text, but it is always in a different manner. In reply to the question as to whether he selected his text first, or the subject, applying such a text as would suit, he said that a text may be compared to a gate opening into the Lord's garden; many ministers, instead of unlatching the gate and leading their hearers in to pluck the fruit and flowers, content themselves by getting upon it and swinging to and fro. He always makes it a point to preach his best sermons on stormy days, for then those who are in attendance say to their friends, "You don't know how much you missed by not being present, though it was a stormy day." He well remembered the time when on nearly every Sabbath during the winter it snowed or rained; "for it came near killing me," said he, laughingly. Some one inquired if he studied his prayers. "Never," said he, "I carry a feeling with me such as a mother would have for her children were they lost in a great forest. I feel that on every side my people are in danger, and that many of them are like babes, weak and helpless. My heart goes out in sorrow and anxiety towards them, and at times I seem to carry all their burdens. I find that when one's heart is wrapped and twined around the hearts of others it is not difficult to pray." Another wanted to know if it would not be better for Mr. Beecher to travel about the country, that the people of various sections might be benefited by his preaching. "No," said he; "what would a stove in the Arctic regions be good for if it were carried from place to place? Beside, more people come to hear me than I could reach should I go after them. It is far better for the United States to go through my church than for me to go through the United States."

Mr. J. M. Wilson, of Philadelphia, has published "Statistical Tables, showing the religious condition of the United States," drawn from the census of 1860. It appears that in the church edifices of all kinds (valued at £34,300,000) there were then sittings for 19,128,751 of the 31,500,000 population of the country. The following were the proportions of church accommodation provided by the various denominations:

Methodist	6,259,799
Baptist	4,044,218
Presbyterian	2,565,949
Roman Catholic	1,404,437
Congregational	956,351
Episcopal	847,296
Lutheran	757,637
Christian	681,016
Union	371,899
German Reformed	273,697
Friends	269,084
Universalist	235,219
Dutch Reformed	211,068
Unitarian	138,213
Jewish	34,412
Moravian	20,316
Adventist	17,120
Swedenborgian	15,395
Spiritualist	6,275
Shaker	5,200
Minor Sects	14,150

19,128,751

From this statement it will be seen that the Methodists outnumber the Romanists four to one, and the Presbyterians even have nearly twice as many church sittings as the sect that calls itself "the Catholic Church."

As an illustration of the "wonderful sympathy" which exists between the democratic spirit of America and the Romish Church, the Liberal Christian mentions that the Catholic Bishop having removed the priest of Auburn, N.Y., and appointed another in his place, the people were incensed at the proceeding, and resolved themselves into a meeting in the church, and not only refused to permit the new priest to say mass, but a number of them took him by the arm and gently put him out of the building. And to a Catholic journal which had said, "if there is antagonism between Catholicism and the spirit of American civilisation, so much the worse for American civilisation," our able contemporary replies, "We apprehend that it is so much the worse for the Roman Catholic Church, and if she continues much longer to throw herself as an obstacle in the path of our progress, she will be crushed to powder."

The same paper, after mentioning that Henry Ward Beecher was recovering from indisposition, says:

"Two or three of our political papers of a certain or an uncertain stripe, have expressed great anxiety lest he should have a softening of the brain. They need give themselves no uneasiness on that score. His brain is not of the kind which gets soft."

The Protestant Churchman thinks that the divergent tendencies in the Episcopal body have now become so great that some event, either of organic disruption or of new adjustment, cannot be very long postponed.

The Rev. W. M. Punshon, in giving his experience of camp-meetings, says of the famous Sing-Sing one:—I was hardly prepared for anything so systematic or so vast. The ground covers eight acres, and is held by trustees, like any other church property. On this ground was erected a City of Tabernacles, with main and side avenues, intersected by First, Second, Third, and Fourth streets. The preacher's stand is in a circular space in the centre. "Some of those who reside in the city have tents of their own, with parlour, and bedroom, and kitchen, so that they extemporise a home, and at the time of my visit there were families who had been dwelling in tents for a fortnight, in anticipation of the camp-meeting services." There are large boarding tents for casual visitors, and a camp police to preserve order. The worshippers are called to the service by the sound of a silver trumpet, and the entire organisation reminded Mr. Punshon of the compliment paid by Dr. Chalmers to the Rev. G. Thompson, that "he had never seen a man set about the work of saving souls in such a business-like way." Mr. Punshon had here an opportunity of discoursing to 4,000 people. A camp-meeting afterwards held in Ontario, Canada, however, seems to have pleased him better. "There was less preparation, and more nature. And as I gazed on that mass of upturned faces, three thousand of them at the least, with the silvery moonlight glancing through the bright leaves overhead, and the ruddy camp fires throwing radiance upon features on which strong souls had cast their lines of joy or trouble, I thought I had rarely seen a spectacle sublimer, and it was to me an opportunity awful and yet inspiring to preach in that cathedral of God's own architecture 'all the words of this life.'" On the whole, Mr. Punshon's impression seems to have been that the effects of such meetings were beneficial.

OPEN, BUT NOT LOOSE, TRUSTS.

THERE is not much difference of feeling now on the question of chapel trusts in the case of our older and fully established congregations. The conviction is tolerably unanimous that on every ground alike of principle and expediency it is better to leave them perfectly open, free from all doctrinal tests or conditions. The conservative feeling in such congregations is sufficiently strong to put any fear of rash and sudden changes out of the question, while for gradual, thoughtful modification of views ample scope is left.

But a somewhat different state of things requires our consideration in the case of entirely new congregations. Our little mission congregations, at first mostly in very humble lodgings, if they do what they are established to do, gradually require better accommodation, and come before our body in appeals for help in building permanent chapels. And the question arises, how should these new trusts be constituted? No one likes to advocate their being established on close doctrinal conditions. It is felt that it is but just that we should leave our new chapels as open to gradual change, as our forefathers left their new chapels. And yet there is a natural desire to have some security that the property will be put to something like the use for which it is given; not that there shall be no change, but that whatever changes do take place shall be those of gradually developed thought among the permanent body of old-attached worshippers, not those of sudden impulse or party contention. Now the fact is that our mission churches lack those old religious associations, those traditional religious sympathies which more than any formal provisions guarded our old congregations from sudden caprices of change, and secured the gradual and steady progress which has marked their history for the past hundred and fifty years. The associations by which a revered past imposes, not restraint, but caution on the present, have yet to be formed by generations of united religious life in the case of recently established congregations. Their newly gathered members are, to a large extent, people whose attachment to free Christianity is of quite recent date, and who have no particular ties either to each other or to the community of churches into which they have entered and to which they look for sympathy and support. It is quite right that they should look to our other churches for help, but at the same time it is not less right that in affording it, some provision should be made that the churches so founded shall continue in the groove of thoughtful, steady-going freedom; that no admiration for a new minister, no sudden influx of new members, no narrow majority in opposing congregational parties, shall be able to appropriate the property to very different uses from those originally contemplated.

While, however, strongly pleading for the necessity of this, we say emphatically that it must not be done by doctrinal contrivances in the trust, but by care in the appointment of trustees, and in the provisions for their renewal, and by securing that the trustees shall be trustees in more than mere name, and shall have some real controlling power in the use and disposition of the property. The trustees should in good part be chosen from among the staunchest representative men in our older neighbouring churches, and united with these should be a few of those resident members of the new congregation who have been among its earliest and most reliable workers. This is, we think, the plan generally pursued. But this is not all. The body of trustees thus appointed must have some real hold on the use and disposal of the property. It is nonsense to ask responsible men from a neighbouring town to be trustees of a new chapel, as men in whom those who have subscribed for its erection will feel confidence, and then to say to them, "you will have no voice whatever in the management of the chapel, nor in the use to which it, or any funds accruing to it, shall be devoted. All power of this kind will be in the hands of a committee elected by the congregation themselves from year to year." Yet this is what is actually done in some cases. Several instances of the kind have recently come under our notice. In one, a leading member of one of our principal congregations, who had been requested thus to act on the trust of a new chapel, asked to be informed of the provisions of the deed, and on finding that they were of the kind we have stated, at once wrote declining to be appointed; and the following passage from the letter in which his reasons are given is worth quoting:—

I am sorry to find it is not a trust I can accept, as it seems that anyone acting under it as trustee would merely take the responsibility of the actions of others, for the trustees are to hold the property on such trusts, permit erections on the land, let the property, mortgage, exchange, and absolutely dispose of the property, in such manner, as the majority of the Congregational Committee for the time being may direct,—all rents, moneys, &c., to be at the disposal of this ever-changing committee. When the trustees are reduced to four (or even two, if need be), the committee nominate others; and it is expressly declared that this committee of nine to twelve shall "manage the affairs of the trust and moneys thereof."

We commend this matter to the attention of our readers. We heartily advocate congregational self-government, but that is in no way incompatible with a certain ultimate control over the property of a congregation being in some body of rather more permanent character than an annually-elected committee. By all means let us hold by open trusts, but such trusts as we have mentioned are for all practical purposes exactly equivalent to no trusts at all.

LITERARIA.

Mr. Deutsch, whose article in the Quarterly on the Talmud a little time ago excited so much attention, has started for a journey in Palestine and Egypt, connected with his studies for a work on the same subject, in which he has made considerable progress, and which will be looked for with great interest.

Nearly 3,000 copies of Sir J. Coleridge's "Life of Keble" were sold in the course of a fortnight after its publication.

"Village Sermons on the Baptismal Service," by Mr. Keble, which he entrusted for publication to his friend Dr. Pusey, are likewise in their third thousand. Of course they take high ground regarding the efficacy of baptismal grace. The editor apologizes somewhat for their "simplicity;" and as an instance of this it may be mentioned that we have as an illustration of the providence of God over infants the rareness with which even careless nurse-girls let babies fall. Perhaps the venerable author was not aware that, according to a common saying, he might have found another equally pertinent illustration of divine care in the way in which drunken persons, as well as children, are believed to be saved from injury.

In "The Age of the Martyrs," J. D. Jenkins, B.D., has spoiled a good subject, to which we should like to see full justice done. Unless he has had access to sources of information from which others have been debarred, he must certainly have drawn not a little of that which he supplies from his own fancy. Among a variety of similar matters we should like, for instance, to know where he learnt that the "Mother of our Lord God," as he styles Mary, "received the Blessed Sacrament from the hands of the beloved disciple;" or that in Ephesus she "carried on the womanly tenderness which she had worked in the homes of the Holy City," and that in consequence "there were those who went on from grace to grace," and, as "she prayed, deepened in the likeness of her Son;" or that she lived exactly fourteen years after his ascension," and that then "her body, unspotted and unstained, was saved from corruption, and taken into her glory in heaven." Such are the kind of books with which High Church clergymen are trying to Catholicize the weak and uninstructed among Protestants.

We have another attempt in the same direction in the re-publication of a work (printed in 1635), entitled "The Female Glory; or the Life and Death of our Blessed Lady the Holy Virgin Mary, God's own Immaculate Mother," edited by the Rev. Orby Shipley. As a taste of the kind of things which Mr. Shipley and his friends think worth reprinting, may be taken the following short passage about the Virgin's journey to the mountains to visit Saint Elizabeth: "Here is a rare spectacle; Humility climbing, a thing as contrary to the nature of it as it is to things ponderous of themselves to lie. And, to say the truth, whither should she (whose worth exalted her above all things else) go, but to places as eminent in situation as she in sweetness of disposition? Whither should this Eagle fly, but to the summit of the World? Sure I am, she could not soar above the pitch of her own Value." We are favoured with an account of the joy which was felt at her birth, not only by beasts, birds, and Tritons, but also by trees, flowers, minerals, the air, &c., and other like absurdities. And some "Anglican Priest" has been at the pains of prefixing to this farrago an "Essay on the Cultus of the Blessed Virgin Mary," in which even the last development of the mediæval doctrine is set forth, and the Immaculate Conception as now held at Rome defended. The argument used is that Christ's sinlessness involves that of his mother, at least prior to his birth. If she had actually sinned, to cleanse from this would have required a special miracle; "in a word," as the writer puts it, "a stronger application of the merits of Christ to remove the sinfulness of the act of sin, as well as the pollution engendered by the habit of sin, than the infusion of such a habit of grace as would be sufficient to preserve from sin." Is it not marvellous that men should go on wasting their strength upon idle questions like these, when there is so much sin and misery on every side of them crying out for Christian help and relief?

WORK AND PRAYER.

'Tis easier to work than be idle
When God wakes the soul into life,
And only by praying and working
Can victory come of the strife.
'Tis easier to pray when you're working
Than to pray when you're forced to be still,
For work lends to prayer of its vigour,
While sloth robs the soul of its will.
Prayer moulds shapeless souls into beauty,
But leaves them still prone to decay:
Work kindles the fire of devotion
And turns into marble the clay.
Prayer searches the heart's dim recesses,
And brings hidden gems into sight;
Work cleanses all stain from their lustre,
And crowns the pure spirit with light.
Work, wedded to prayer, is the pathway
The noblest and truest have trod;
Prayer, strengthened by work, lends the pinions
That carry us home to our God.

H. W. H.

VOLTAIRE'S DEATH-BED.

MR. SCHUYLER, United States' Consul at Moscow, has discovered among its archives a despatch to the Empress Catharine II., from the Russian ambassador at Paris, dated 17th (28) June, 1778. In this despatch is a letter written by a friend of the ambassador, giving authentic details of the death of Voltaire, in whom the Empress was known to take great interest, and likewise of the disposal of his remains.

It appears that exhausted by a debate at the Académie, in which he had taken an active and eloquent part, Voltaire, on returning home, was smitten by excruciating internal pain, which he sought to alleviate by large doses of opium. Growing worse, Tronchin was sent for, and the doctor, not being acquainted with what Voltaire had taken, ordered that laudanum should be administered. The remedy was fatal to the philosopher. While he was dying, the Duchess of Nivernois and Madame de Gisors, her daughter, extracted a promise from the Curé of St. Sulpice that after Voltaire's death the Curé would publicly refuse to bury him. This refusal would be illegal, as Voltaire, when indisposed two months previously, and at the request of his family, had made a formal confession to the Abbé Gautier, and had been reconciled to the Church by the Curé of St. Sulpice, the parish in which Voltaire resided. The Curé and Abbé visited Voltaire in his last moments. The dying man put his arm around the Curé, assuring him of his respect for him. "Sir," said the Curé, "do you believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ?"—"I beg that you will let me die in peace!" replied Voltaire. The Curé turned away, and intimated to the friends present that he abandoned the dying philosopher.

Three or four hours later in the night Voltaire breathed his last, and then his friends and relatives understood that when a dying man was "abandoned" by his priest, he could not be buried in consecrated ground, and might be cast out of any grave, wheresoever dug for him. Voltaire's body was at once embalmed. The heart was given to the Marquis de Villette, who placed it in his private residence. Voltaire's nephew, the Abbé Mignot, contrived to smuggle the body itself out of Paris. It was decked in the dressing-gown and nightcap of the defunct, and laid at length in a carriage, so that it might pass for an invalid being transported to the country. A servant sat in the carriage with it. The corpse was thus conveyed to the Abbey of Cellières, belonging to the Abbé Mignot, who, with another nephew of Voltaire, M. d'Ornoy, and some friends, were on the spot, which is a few miles from Nogent-sur-Seine. Into a grave, eight feet deep, the uncoffined body was let down. Quick-lime, two feet deep, was cast upon it, and in a few hours the body was entirely consumed. Thus the end was gained of burying Voltaire in consecrated ground, and preventing the possibility of the body being cast out of the grave. The prior of the abbey had a funeral service celebrated in honour of the deceased in the abbey where he was interred, and similar services were celebrated in neighbouring churches. The diocesan Bishop of Troyes published his anger at this step; but the prior remarked that he could not legally refuse the rites of sepulture to the body of a man who had duly confessed so shortly before his death. It was reported that the Bishop might have prevented what he only thought fit to censure.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XVIII.

CRY "HARROW!"

THERE was a scene the other day in the Scotch Church at St. Helier's, Jersey, which would have been interesting to an antiquary. It seems that a considerable party were opposed to the induction of a new minister, who was approved by the majority of the congregation, and as soon as the ceremony had taken place, a Mr. Clark, one of the trustees, who sided with the minority, left his seat, and, entering one of the aisles and kneeling down, in the hearing and sight of the congregation, raised what is known in Jersey judicature as the Clameur de Haro. This is a form which dates as far back as the time of Rollo, a Norman leader in the ninth century. It is used on occasions of encroachment or invasion of property of any kind, and requires instant cessation on the part of the aggressor, under penalty of a heavy fine. The aggrieved party, kneeling, cries out, as did Mr. Clark on this occasion, "Haro, Haro, à mon aide, mon prince! On m'a fait tort!" The effect upon the congregation may be imagined. Mr. Clark and his friends left the church, with the intention, it was said, of at once instituting the usual legal proceedings which follow the raising of the clameur.

ACTING GRACE.

At Clement's Inn, grace after dinner is not said, but acted. Four loaves, closely adhering together, typical of the four Gospels, are held up by the occupant of the chair, who raises them three times in allusion to the Blessed Trinity, and then hands them to the butler, who hurries with them out of the hall with an alacrity which is emblematic of the freedom with which the Bread of Life is given to the world. This acted grace, it is almost needless to add, is of great antiquity, and clearly had a religious origin.

MONKISH QUESTIONS.

The Liberal Christian assures us that a book of theological discussions by some of the old monks has lately been discovered, in which these are some of the questions: "What was the shape of the wings of the Archangel Gabriel? Did Pilate use soap when he washed his hands? How much wine did they drink at the marriage in Cana? Are there any angels with baritone voices? Could Christ have changed himself into a devil or into a pumpkin?" It is just possible that some of our theological questions may seem quite as absurd to our descendants.

CANDID DEALING.

In a correspondence respecting alleged intimidation at the Perthshire election, published in the Scotch papers, there appears the following letter to the Episcopal clergyman of Strathguy:

"Lady Menzies to Mr. Temple.

"Farleyer, Aberfeldy, Dec. 1, 1868.

"Dear Mr. Temple,—Do you not think you might give up the afternoon service for some weeks? It is so dark and dreary, and as your sermon is only about a quarter of an hour long, and last Sunday I really could not follow it or make sense—perhaps from the rustling of your paper—it seems scarce worth going out so late when one could read the service at home. If you think of giving it up please let me know, as we might then come down next Sunday morning. Tell Mrs. Temple I hope to call on her soon, and I am, truly yours,

"A. B. MENZIES."

As the Pall Mall remarks, "candid friendship could hardly go further. But if every member of a congregation had the friendly candour of Lady Menzies, what an ecclesiastical convulsion would follow! The compromise, too, of coming to church 'next Sunday morning,' if the clergyman will only give up the dark and dreary afternoon, is charming in its natural simplicity."

THE POWER OF GENTLENESS.

At a ragged-school meeting in Sheffield, the other day, the Earl of Shaftesbury said ladies would be surprised what effect they could produce if they would undertake to teach young men of the ragged and forlorn class. They would be treated with affection and with reverence. In one of the worst parts of London there was an institution which he visited. In one room he found about thirty-five men listening to the teachings of the daughter of a small shopkeeper in the neighbourhood. She was one of the prettiest women he ever saw in his life. He noticed that there was no one present but the young woman with those rough men, and said to the superintendent, "Are you not afraid to leave my dear little friend alone with all those men?" He replied, "I am." "Then why don't you go to her?" "You mistake my fear. I am not afraid of their doing her any harm. They love her so much that they would lick the ground on which she walks; but I am afraid some person may step in, and, not being under authority, or not knowing the manners of the place, may say something impertinent to her, and if he did he would not leave the place alive."

A FRIEND'S ADVICE.

An elderly gentleman, accustomed to "indulge," entered the room of a certain tavern, where sat a grave Friend by the fire. Lifting a pair of green spectacles upon his forehead, rubbing his inflamed eyes, and calling for hot brandy and water, he complained to the Friend that "his eyes were getting weaker, and that even spectacles didn't seem to do them any good." "I'll tell thee, friend," replied the Quaker, "what I think. If there was to wear thy spectacles over thy mouth for a few months, thy eyes would get well again."

"SORROW AND SIGHING SHALL FLEE AWAY."

BY SARAH WILLIAMS.

Sorrow and sighing, sorrow and sighing,
How can it happen that these should pass
Out of a world where the flowers lie dying,
Out of a world where all flesh is grass?
Sorrow and sighing, sorrow and sighing,
Dear as the autumn, and fair as the rain,
Sorrow and sighing, sorrow and sighing,
Will they then cease, and our souls grow dull?
Sluggishly somnolent, torpidly lying,
Lapped in the calm of a deep sea lull?
Sorrow and sighing, sorrow and sighing,
Should we not long for the thundering main
Sorrow and sighing, sorrow and sighing,
All to be done, and our tears gone dry;
Never a thought o'er the boundary flying,
Never a grasp as the clouds swing by,
Sorrow and sighing, sorrow and sighing
All faded out, nothing left to restrain.
Sorrow and sighing, sorrow and sighing,
What would our days be cut off from these?
If, at the fairy mart, we were life buying,
Should we not choose them, past things that please?
Sorrow and sighing, sorrow and sighing,
Take what you will, only leave us our pain.

THE LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION.

THE thirty-second annual meeting was held on Monday, 8th inst., at the Mission-house, Beaufort-street, PHILIP H. HOLY, Esq., in the chair. Amongst those present were the Revs. Charles Beard, B.A.; John Brunner, Alex. Gordon, M.A.; John Shannon, C. B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc.; and Chas. Wicksteed, B.A.; and Messrs. Thomas Avison, F.S.A.; Swinton Boulton, C. T. Bowring, T. Chapman, H. J. Cook, J. T. Ellerbeck, H. W. Gair, Thomas Gair, R. C. Hall, Charles Holland, J.P.; G. Holt, Henry Jevons, W. J. Lamport, J.P.; Benson Rathbone, R. R. Rathbone, Robert Trimble, C. P. Melly, &c., &c.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, said the more immediate object of their meeting that night, he imagined, was to express their sympathy with and their perfect confidence in their missionaries. It was not for him to say much on this point, but during the past year certain things had been brought under his notice rather more than they would if he had not been president, and it occurred to him to mention that there were some things which he himself thought might possibly be improved. First of all, the only use made of their large mission room was that once a fortnight, in the winter months, a penny reading was held there, and that every Sunday morning there was a service for the school, and every Sunday evening a service, attended by fifty or sixty adults, and perhaps twenty children. The building had been in existence some fifteen years, and he did not say it in a spirit of fault-finding—he did not think they had any reason to be proud of their attempt to make a congregation there. At all events, he did not think the use of the room as a girls' school would in any way injure it as a place of worship. With regard to the reports which were brought before them every year, it seemed to him—and he said this also without the least spirit of fault-finding—that the report of 1869, with a few words altered, would do for the report of 1868 or 1867; and he thought this required some alteration. He made no complaint against the missionaries. He thought the fault rested with the committee. He thought that they had no right to ask the missionaries for these reports, and that in doing so they were not doing them justice, for the main part of the work of the missionaries was not such as could be reported upon. He thought it would be just as well for the missionaries that they should not be called upon to report at any rate once a year, but that they should report only once in two or three years, and that when they thought it necessary to give a report they should then be authorised to give a much shorter one—(hear, hear.) The dealing of soul with soul was not work which could be expressed in a report. Again, he should like Mr. Shannon to give them his views about the working of the District Provident Society. The amount collected there was the largest amount collected by any centre in the town, and he believed it took up nearly one-third of the time of the missionaries. This was a very serious matter, and he had a feeling in his own mind that the work was perfectly suitable for any of the visitors—any of the laity—but that it was not suitable for the ministers, whose work should be entirely spiritual. He also thought that the "Poors' purse" was not exactly satisfactory. The giving of money or money's value in an institution of that kind had a tendency—and he did not see how they could help it—to bring people about them rather for the sake of what they could get. The natural outlet for one's own feeling at the sight of distress was of course to give relief, but he had doubts whether it was not doing harm. Perhaps Mr. Shannon might be able to clear up the matter.

The Rev. Mr. Gordon then read a letter from Rev. J. H. Thom, explaining the cause of his absence, in which the following interesting passages occur:—

"March 6, 1869.

"I especially lament not to be able to move the resolution you and the committee have been good enough to send me, for I think I may say that I recollect no reports in which the great religious convictions and methods on which the mission rests have been more distinctly laid down, and I think it highly to the honour of our ministers that, conversant as they are with all kinds of misery capable of an immediate, though a superficial relief, they look only to deep spiritual remedies, and have so little faith in the power of money and of alms."

"Mr. Shannon raises the important question of how far the children of the indigent might be brought to school by having the fees paid for them. This opens two inquiries—to what extent children are now uneducated because of the poverty of their parents in cases where there is any real desire to have them at school; and how far the payment of the fees by others would secure regularity of attendance on the part of the children educated gratuitously; and how far it might relax the efforts of those parents who now pay them at a strain, but who would not make the strain if they saw grounds to hope that some society would relieve them of the effort. There is an endeavour at present in progress to get a society organised in Liverpool for the purpose of paying for the education of children whose parents cannot afford the school-fees, and it is very important that the plan should be discussed in all its bearings; and that the success, or failure, of other societies with a similar object, as of the one in Manchester, should be ascertained. For myself, I attach no permanent importance to the patching, or tinkering, of our voluntary systems of education; but some years may elapse before a really national education can be provided and applied, by direct or indirect persuasives, and in those years something perhaps might be done, without too much accompanying evil in the operation, towards the education of neglected children whose parents fail to meet the simplest responsibilities of the relations they have assumed."

The Rev. CHARLES WICKSTEED moved the first resolution, offering to the missionaries, Mr. Shannon and Mr. Jones, the cordial approbation and warm sympathy of the meeting. He gave them the most cordial tribute of respect, and he wished them every blessing from God Almighty upon their labours, and every encouragement from their fellow-citizens, their fellow-Christians, their fellow-creatures. He remembered once being present, with his old friend, Dr. Hamilton, at a meeting in Yorkshire of that description, at which were assembled a number of what were called town missionaries. The question at that time was rather new—it had become almost effete, he hoped, by this time—What was Apostolic Succession? The present Dean of Chichester, then Vicar of Leeds, Dr. Hook, was very great on the subject; but Dr. Hamilton, in his rough and witty way, solved the question, as he thought, very satisfactorily, for he said: "There is a question raised in our community—Who are the true successors of the Apostles?" and, pointing to the men who were labouring amongst the poor and amongst the cottages and cellars of the district, added, "These are the true successors of the Apostles." (Applause.) Now, he quite agreed with Dr. Hamilton, and he believed that in the ministers to the poor in this town they had true successors to the Apostles. (Hear, hear.) For himself, he felt almost a sense of shame at times at the position of an ordinary Christian minister in our large towns. He did not think it quite ideal to be the minister of a genteel religious club; he should prefer to be the minister of a congregation where rich and poor met together, knowing that God was the maker of them all—(applause)—and therefore it was that, though under the special and curious conditions of society, they were in a certain way driven to these necessities, he did not particularly like them, and he was the more grateful for the supplementary aid which was given by institutions of this kind. With regard to the smallness of the attendance at the evening service in the Mission-house, Mr. Shannon attributed it partly to the meeting which took place simultaneously in Mill-street, under the auspices of Mr. Jones. And he thought they should bear this in mind—when he (Mr. Wicksteed) first began to preach in Liverpool there was only one evening congregation in the body with which he was more immediately connected, and now on the immediate banks of the Mersey there were eight, six on the Liverpool side, and two on the other side; and he thought when they multiplied one congregation by eight they had no reason to despair. He was not at all sorry or surprised to find from Mr. Jones's account that the amusements to which he had so wisely and sedulously devoted himself were not at present attended with the same excitement as at the beginning, because, as he said, there were so many more of the same kind about him. That was a proof of the success of his efforts to establish these kinds of amusement. He was glad to perceive that amongst other humanities fostered by the mission was window-gardening. Bacon said that the taste for gardening was the purest of all human tastes. He hoped, therefore, that Mr. White, Mr. Avison's gardener, would be encouraged in the interest he had taken in this very useful department of the mission. He thought that perhaps the most important part of the reports of the missionaries, and the account they gave of their labours, was involved in that basis question—the employment of the poor. He noticed that Mr. Shannon remarked, and that Mr. Jones also remarked, upon the pauperism arising not only from intemperance, but from want of employment. But the other question was a most serious one, and he begged to call attention to these remarks of Mr. Shannon:—"The pauperism of Liverpool, and of most large towns, is rising to gigantic dimensions; the labour market in most departments appears to be over-stocked, and it is becoming a serious problem to provide productive fields of industry for those who are able and willing to work." But perhaps the most extraordinary passage that was ever printed in any report was found on another page; and he characterised it in this way on this ground—that persons going about amongst the poor and sensibly affected by their wants, sorrows, and difficulties, were almost perpetually driven to administer relief immediately and impulsively. Mr. Jones says:

"I am not complaining of the want of charity in any quarter. What I most deplore is the necessity for its exercise. Indeed, almsgiving, in all sorts of ways, appears to me to be increasing from year to year, demoralising and pauperising the people in the most effectual manner. But no amount of material assistance to that it is possible to give would be found adequate to meet the wants of the poor in this great town. Do what you will, pauperism will keep far in advance of your most extensive efforts. It has long been a settled conviction with me, that in proportion as you extend your charities will you increase pauperism. When once the fences of self-respect and self-reliance are broken down, they are seldom again set up. A man who has lived upon charity, for ever so short a time, is to some extent disqualified for seeking employment; and where the fact of his having been in receipt of charity happens to be known, it renders employment more difficult to be obtained by him. Nor does this extended almsgiving injure only the receiver; in many cases it is quite as bad for the giver. It has a tendency to demoralise ministers, missionaries, and others who are the media of its distribution. It renders them the real beggars. Instead of setting in motion the regularly constituted machinery for supplying local relief, they supersede it by their incessant appeals to the benevolent public. You can scarcely take up a daily paper without your eye being caught by some absurd advertisement or whining letter from one of these gentlemen beggars-in-chief on behalf of pauperdom."

He thought this was one of the noblest sentences ever penned in any report to a charitable society. Finally, he might say that the only way of meeting this great difficulty was first of all by liberating industry. He did think we had a chance of the sources of trade and industry being greatly amplified, and of the expenses of this country being greatly diminished, by an administration which had Mr. Gladstone at its head, Mr. Bright high in the ministry, which had in it his old Yorkshire friends W. E. Foster, and James Stansfeld, and which was supported by such men as Rathbone and Melly. He thought they might leave them to deal with the political part of this matter, and as to the other, he hoped there was now a tendency in the public mind towards relieving the pauperism of this country by a system of emigration. He did not mean sending away from us the bone, muscle, sinew, energy and enterprise of the country. That would go of itself to some extent, and they could not help it; but the mass of middle-class talent and power, the subordinate element of society, which was now becoming pauperised amongst us, he thought might with advantage be helped out of this country; and for these strong reasons—that a very moderate industry and skill which was not in request, excepting in seasons of great demand in this country, was in request in the colonies.

Mr. CHARLES MELLY seconded the resolution. However, as certain portions of Mr. Jones' report had been referred to by Mr. Wicksteed, he would ask to read one sentence, which he might say was the text of Mr. Shannon's report. It was that "the Domestic Mission proceeds on the principle that the poor are not to be raised from their own condition by machinery alone, nor even by the operation of the best contrived laws, but by the operation of spirit with spirit, by the presence of a friendly voice, and a helping hand." Every year did he (Mr. Melly) feel more strongly that material help went really no way. It filled a momentary gap, but it did very little permanent good. But if spirit could be brought into contact with spirit then some good would arise. He felt that, properly, the duty of all of them was to go into the courts and tender sympathy from their own spirits to the spirits of the poor. They did not do this. They might perhaps say they could not. They asked Mr. Shannon and Mr. Jones to do it for them, and he really believed those two gentlemen did it as well as one man could do a thing for another. But it would certainly be better if they did it themselves. Day by day, at the meetings of the Central Relief Committee, he and all the members felt that they were doing very little good. They felt last year, when they spent £9,000, the money coming in so plentifully that it was almost forced upon them, that in many cases they had done harm. With regard to drink, Mr. Melly thought Mr. Jones was far below the mark when he spoke of two-thirds of the distress as arising from that cause. He (Mr. Melly) should be glad if he could in any way assist what Mr. Jones so strongly advised—the early closing of public-houses. When all other shops were closed at ten o'clock, why should public-houses remain open to ruin the whole town? (Applause.) Having reminded the meeting of the arrangements of the Central Relief Society, by which meat soup was sold at one penny per quart, and sago soup at one halfpenny, Mr. Melly stated that those who paid for their soup at the kitchens were more worthy of relief than those who asked the nearest clergyman or Scripture-reader for relief, and obtained tickets from them. He looked with great fear on the action of the innumerable "poor's purses" throughout Liverpool. The really kind thing to do was to find employment for the young. (Hear, hear.) There were many difficulties in the way of societies finding employment for older men, but the societies which helped girls into places where they had hard work to do, and boys into employment as messengers and shoeblacks, were doing far more real good than societies which merely distributed loaves and fishes. (Applause.)

The resolution was carried unanimously. The Rev. JOHN SHANNON, Mr. Jones being unfortunately absent through illness, said, for himself, and he was sure he could also say for Mr. Jones, that they had always received kindness and consideration from the friends and supporters of the Mission. He had always found it easier to satisfy the claims of the committee than to satisfy the demands of his own conscience. He often wished he had more physical strength, more tact and discrimination, and more moral insight, to grapple with the various evils he daily witnessed. He was often disappointed and disheartened in his expectations of individuals, particularly those who had been long habituated to a reckless, thoughtless life. For that reason he often thought that the hopes of the future must centre in the young. It was on that ground that he had, during his labours, given some attention to the subject of neglected children. He had not seen the printed rules of the Manchester Education Aid Society, but he understood that its principles were pretty much the same as those which he had suggested in his report, namely, that the schools which were now in operation were to be utilised, and that town missionaries, Scripture readers, and all those who were now engaged in similar work were to seek out for neglected children and recommend them; that when the parent or parents, or guardians (if the child were an orphan), were very destitute, the Education Aid Society was to pay the school fees; but where the case was not one of such extreme destitution, half the fees were to be paid by the society, and that the parents or guardians might choose the school, whether national, or British, or Roman Catholic, to which they would wish their children to go. He sincerely commended this subject to the consideration and attention of the friends and supporters of the society—those who might be able to lend a helping hand to this good work. With respect to the collection for the Provident Society, to which their president had alluded, he would say that the collection did not seriously interfere with his duties. (Hear, hear.) A great portion of the money was brought to the mission house on Monday mornings and Monday evenings; and he would also say with gratitude that he was very industriously assisted in that collection by three ladies and one gentleman, and he had received the offer of the services of another gentleman that evening. (Applause.) This led him to say what he had stated on former occasions, that they could very easily employ—in fact they would be thankful to enlist the services of additional labourers in almost every institution which centred there.

The CHAIRMAN expressed the regret which they must all feel in consequence of the illness of Mr. Jones, which had been induced by the contaminated atmosphere in which he had to work.

Mr. T. AVISON remarked that the committee connected with the Corporation schools were now turning their serious attention to the provision of accommodation in the existing schools for the children of the poor. (Applause.)

The Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON read the secretary's report, which showed that the income of the year had but very slightly exceeded the expenditure.

Mr. W. J. LAMPORT read the treasurer's statement, and urged upon the members the importance of a moderate addition to the annual subscription list.

The Rev. C. BEARD moved—"That the report from the committee be received, and the treasurer's accounts, as now read, having been audited, be paid." He thought the ragged schools connected with that place were among the most useful and most satisfactory parts of the mission. (Hear.) They had passed through some difficulty that year. They had had a great bribery institution set up over the way. Every means had been tried to draw away children from these schools by the promoters of the institution to which he had referred. They had given the children dinners and clothes, but the result was that the schools were just as full as ever, and there were just as many applicants for admission as ever there were. (Applause.) He thought no stronger testimony could be borne than was borne by that fact to the kind and character of the education given in the Mission schools. (Hear, hear.)

In the next place, he wanted to say a single word about the reports of the missionaries. He had, to some extent, but not to the whole extent, the same feeling as the chairman had expressed. The very essence of the value of their reports was that they should only say something when they had got something to say, and not at greater length than the absolute necessity of the case required. Therefore, if at any time they should feel inclined to abstain from making a report, he should be quite willing to put up with the omission on condition that they should try in these reports, as they did from time to time, to make a really valuable contribution to our knowledge of the great social questions which pressed upon us all. He was not quite sure that he agreed with the chairman about the District Provident Society. It must be for the missionaries themselves to decide how far they occupied too much of their time with merely secular relations to the poor. But he was sure Mr. Shannon would agree with him that it gave their missionaries a natural access to the houses of poor. With regard to the education question, he had had some experience of the Manchester Education Aid Society, and he would tell them what was its effect in Manchester. Manchester had always been a centre of educational schemes, which six or seven years ago were dropped by mutual consent. The religious difficulty was altogether an insuperable obstacle in the way. Mr. Brotherton, a member of the Swedenborgian Church, and a man of the most catholic and wise benevolence—to which, indeed he felt a victim not many years after—conceived a plan by which, as he thought, education might be promoted, and the religious difficulty entirely evaded. His idea was that they might form a society consisting of persons of all denominations, who should subscribe a sum of money to be applied to the purposes of education; that they should then send out, not, as Mr. Shannon said, missionaries or scripture readers, but their own paid visitors to investigate the reasons why children in poor districts did not attend any school; that where they found the wages of that family did not amount to more than 2s. per head per week, that family should be considered a fit object of their assistance; and that the poverty of the parents having been ascertained by the strictest official investigation, they should receive a check which would enable them to send their children to any school which they may choose in the district where there was room. That was the way in which the religious difficulty was got over. This work had been carried on for some considerable time, and there was no doubt it had succeeded in sending to school a very large number of children who otherwise would not have been sent. It had succeeded in doing a very large amount of good, he believed at a cost of very little harm; but one of the most important things it had done was to prove its own untrustworthiness as a complete remedy for the evil which it was designed to contend against; because by actual experience of four or five years the startling fact had been arrived at, that a very large number of the children who did not go to school would not go to school even when they were paid for. A most remarkable fact to any one who knew, as he did, something of the public feeling in Manchester on this subject for the last 25 years, was that the logical force of the facts demonstrated by the Education Society had been such that it had actually swept away the religious difficulty out of men's minds, and they would find at the present moment in that city High Churchmen and Low Churchmen, Independents and Methodists, men of every class uniting in favour of a compulsory and a secular education as the only means of getting over the difficulty. (Applause.) He only wished now to say a single word on the subject of Mr. Jones's Mission in Mill-street. He did not know what the general character of Mr. Jones's work was, but one Wednesday evening Mr. Jones asked him to go and preach for him there, and he thought that no service which he had conducted in Liverpool had touched him and moved him so much as that. The service was held in a poor room over a stable, with no ornament about it at all. There was an harmonium at one end and there were benches down it; and the people came in straight from their work—the poorest of the poor, with no go-to-meeting clothes on, but ragged as they stood, and they listened with open eyes and open ears, and for once in his life he felt as if he were preaching the Gospel, really good news to those who wanted good news and were willing to hear good news. He never, certainly under any circumstances, came so fully into contact with the fundamental religious wants of human nature as he did in that room. He did not compare it with the services in this room, he did not compare it with anything; but he did say that they should hesitate long before they closed up such a means of usefulness. (Applause.) He did not quite agree with Mr. Gordon that they ought not to allow a missionary to live down there. He did not think that they ought to allow the prudence of others to put a bridle on the neck of Christian heroism and self-devotion. If a man was willing to devote himself for Christ's sake to the poor, let them not stop him; but he thought they ought to recollect that Mr. Jones had borne the heat and burden of the day for seventeen or eighteen years and was getting an old man—at all events, becoming advanced in life—and if it were possible for them now to permit him to pass whatever years were left to him—and whatever years were left to him would be years of hard work for the cause he had undertaken—(hear, hear)—if they could permit him to pass them in a somewhat purer atmosphere, and could permit him to have a few hours to himself, free from the perpetual calls of the Mission, they would do no more than they ought for one who had done effectual service in the work they approved. (Applause.)

Mr. TRIMBLE seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. CHARLES HOLLAND, in moving the Committee for the ensuing year, said he thought with Mr. Thom that they must look to higher and larger agencies really to meet the evils which they were there to contend against. He, like some of the speakers who had preceded him, had his hopes from the reformed Parliament. He quite agreed with his friend Mr. Beard, and he was very glad to hear his friend Colonel Trimble give his assent to the propositions of Mr. Beard, that in no other way could the educational wants of the country be met than by a resort to compulsory measures, and he was happy to think that public opinion was now gradually and surely settling down in that direction. He was very happy to see that action had already been taken in the right direction on this question. He alluded to the movement which Mr. Rathbone had, in conjunction with Dr. Taylor, of the College, taken in hand for attempting to sweep a portion at least of the twenty-five thousand children who were now wandering about the streets of Liverpool neglected into the schools, which it was said were able to take in some seven thousand or eight thousand of them. The experiment was worth trying, and he trusted that it would be tried and prove successful, at all events in mitigating the evil to a certain extent.

Mr. SWINTON BOULT, in seconding the motion, said he could not agree in all that had fallen from Mr. Holland. He was no advocate for compulsory education or for State aid to education. He asked those who were, to pursue their inquiries a little further than merely to count the number of children who were absent from school, and to ascertain exactly what became of those who had been sent to school and educated at the expense of the State. He had heard a good deal that night about pauperism and the necessity for education, as if the one were the corrective of the other. But he had heard out of doors that there was more absolute want amongst a class of the community who were educated, and against whom an undue degree of competition was brought to bear, by a forcing process in education consequent upon State aid—he meant the class of merchants' clerks. He believed that there was no class in the community at that timesuffering more severely—not from poverty exactly—but from privation of a very serious character than that class. His fear was that they were working in a vicious circle. They were directing their attention to the lower classes of society, and they were taxing the lower middle class—those who were just able perhaps to educate their own children—in order to give excessive education to the classes beneath them, and to bring them up to compete with their own children. At all events, he thought the question was not quite so simple as public opinion seemed to determine, nor was he quite clear that it was a subject which could be fully discussed there that evening. He had great pleasure in seconding the motion.

After a few further remarks from Mr. P. H. RATHBONE and Mr. C. T. BOWRING, the proceedings closed.

INTELLIGENCE

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—Mr. Thos. Leyland, one of the students of the Home Missionary Board, who retired from that institution in January last, has received and accepted an invitation from the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Missionary Association to become one of its missionary ministers.

"CLERICAL DENUNCIATIONS OF UNITARIANISM."—On Tuesday evening last, at the new Unitarian Chapel, the first of a series of five lectures was given in reply to recent denunciations of Unitarianism by certain clergymen. It was announced that at the termination of the lecture the subject of the evening would be open to free discussion, and those clergymen who denounced Unitarianism were invited to attend and refute its errors. On Tuesday, however, there was no discussion. Alfred Balston, Esq., was the lecturer, and the following was the thesis: "That the Bible is the book which contains Divine inspiration, and is therefore of supreme authority, so that the mass books, rubrics, creeds, and articles of human invention are of no authority when they conflict with its teachings." Previously to the lecture there was a short religious service.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, the 14th inst., at the close of the morning service a meeting of the congregation was held, Mr. J. Hay presiding, to receive the report of a deputation which had been appointed to wait upon the minister of the church, Rev. H. W. Crosskey, respecting an invitation he had received from Birmingham. Mr. W. Teacher and Mr. James Smithells, on behalf of the deputation, reported what had taken place at their interview with Mr. Crosskey, after which the secretary read a letter from Mr. Crosskey, placing his resignation in the hands of the congregation, and stating the reasons which had led him reluctantly to adopt this conclusion. Mr. William Milwraith then moved the following resolution, which was seconded by Mr. A. L. Knox, and unanimously adopted, viz., "Resolved, that in accepting the resignation of Mr. Crosskey, the members of the congregation desire to record their high appreciation of his zeal, fidelity, and ability, and their admiration of the upright and conscientious manner in which he has conducted himself in all the relations of life during the sixteen years he has been their minister; and, although deeply regretting his loss, they trust that in his new sphere of duty he may succeed in gathering around him as a congregation friends as sincerely attached to him as those from whom he is about to part, and that the blessing of God, whose fatherly character he has so frequently and so beautifully described in this place, may continue to rest upon him and those that are near and dear to him." On the motion of Mr. Rankin, seconded by Mr. Virtue, the Committee of Management was instructed to adopt such measures as they might consider best for securing a successor to Mr. Crosskey, it being understood that their recommendation be submitted to and approved by the congregation at a meeting specially called for that purpose. On the same evening the seventh annual business meeting of the Sunday school was held. The Rev. Mr. Crosskey presided. From the annual report, the school appears to be in a prosperous condition—200 scholars on the roll, an increase of 40 since last annual report. The classes are 21 in number, and the attendance has upon the whole been satisfactory. The treasurers showed the income of the school to be £31.19s.10d. The expenditure £16.14s.9d., leaving a balance in hand of £15.5s.1.

HINDLEY.—On Monday evening last, a congregational tea party was held in the schoolroom to welcome the Rev. A. Rushton as the future minister of the congregation. Mr. David Shaw, of Park Lane, presided, and there were present friends from Bolton and other neighbouring congregations. Addresses were delivered by the chairman, Revs. M. C. Frankland, G. Fox, G. Ride, and A. Rushton.

LEEDS: RESIGNATION OF REV. T. HINCKS.—We deeply regret to announce that the Rev. Thomas Hincks, B.A., has been compelled by reason of declining health to resign the pulpit of Mill Hill Chapel, where he has faithfully ministered for upwards of thirteen years. Notwithstanding the year's absence granted him by his congregation, Mr. Hincks feels unable for the present to continue his ministerial labours, and the step he has been obliged to take is a source of the deepest regret both to himself and his people.

LEEDS.—On Sunday afternoon last, Mr. John Scott, as superintendent, presented Mr. W. H. Sands, on behalf of the teachers in the Mill Hill Sunday Schools, with a frame containing photographic views of the Old Mill Hill Chapel and the present, and a portrait of the Rev. Thomas Hincks, B.A. Mr. Sands has been connected with the schools, as scholar and teacher, for upwards of fifteen years, and his leaving Leeds for Northampton was the occasion for this expression of esteem.

LONDON: DR. WILLIAM'S LIBRARY.—The Rev. P. W. Clayden, the recently chosen minister of the Free Christian Church, Kentish Town, was on Tuesday last elected a trustee of Dr. Williams's Library, succeeding to Rev. James Martineau who lately resigned.

MANCHESTER: ROCHDALE ROAD MISSION.—On Sunday last, the annual school sermons were preached—that in the afternoon by the Rev. S. A.

Steinthal, and that in the evening by the Rev. William Gaskell, M.A. The congregations were good on both occasions, and the collections amounted to £13.0s.13d. On Monday evening, the annual congregational tea meeting was held; about 120 persons present. Eddowes Bowman, Esq., M.A., presided. A very interesting report was read by Mr. James Dore, the secretary, after which the Rev. B. Walker, the present minister, delivered a short and appropriate address. Mr. D. Thompson then presented to Mr. Dore a neatly-engrossed address for the services he had rendered to the institution during the past year. Addresses were then delivered by the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, W. H. Herford, B.A., and H. Williamson; Messrs. Dore, Benson, Jones, and Challoner, and the chairman.

MOSSLEY.—On Saturday evening last, March 13, the members of the Mutual Improvement Society in connection with the above school held their annual tea-party; the Rev. Daniel Berry presiding. Addresses were delivered by John Heys, of Manchester, Jonathan N. Lawton, of Heyrod, and by members of the society. The society is in good condition, numbering thirty-one members, showing an increase of fourteen over the previous year.

PAISLEY.—The congregation here held their annual soiree in the chapel on the evening of last Friday, the Rev. H. W. Crosskey in the chair. With music and song and a few brief speeches the evening was passed in a very agreeable manner. There were about 70 present.

TODMORREN.—On the evening of Sunday last, the Rev. L. Taplin closed the course of lectures which have been delivered during the winter months with great success. At the end of his address he made the gratifying announcement that the new church built by the Messrs. Fielden, which forms so great an ornament to the town and neighbourhood, will be opened for public worship on Wednesday the 7th of April. We hope soon to announce full particulars as to the opening services.

WARRENPOINT, IRELAND.—The Rev. John Jennings, B.A., who has preached at Frenchay for upwards of four years, was installed here on the 7th inst. as minister of the Narrowwater Remonstrant Congregation, by the Armagh Presbytery. The Rev. F. McCammon preached the sermon, from Heb. vi. 1. The Rev. W. Crozier, M.A., put the questions to the society, and the minister, Mr. Jennings, gave a statement of his belief and of his purposes in entering on the ministry there. The Rev. Samuel Ferguson offered up the installation prayer. The congregation then gave their newly-appointed minister the right hand of fellowship; after which the Rev. W. Crozier gave a charge to the pastor and his people. The Presbytery afterwards dined together.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. C.—We have already noticed the pamphlet in question, and have not room at present for any further article on the subject.

S. P.—Too late, this week.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The thirty-ninth anniversary of the Brahmo-Somaj was celebrated in Calcutta last month. The members consist of about two thousand youths, who are all educated in English colleges, and belong to the higher castes. They had a procession for the consecration of the New Temple, whose objects were described by Keshub Chunder Seng in the following words:

"The One true God alone, the One without a second, shall be worshipped in this house. No created object, neither man nor any other being shall be adored or worshipped in this hall. Any books, relics, or symbols which any man, number of men, or nation may have observed with such unbecoming reverence as has degraded, or may degrade, into superstition, shall be treated here only with that amount of consideration which they may deserve. No sculpture or painting for the remembrance of any person or persons shall be here preserved. All men, without distinction of caste, shall be welcomed in this building. No prayer or worship offered to man, or through the agency of any individual, shall be here allowed."

According to a correspondent of the Tablet, himself a Russian, there are at least 200 sects in Russia, and they increase every year. The Stavovtzi alone, who cordially hate the national Church, number more than sixteen millions. Of the seventy millions counted as spiritual and temporal subjects of the Czar, there are certainly two-thirds who reject his creed and deny his pontificate.

The Moniteur Universel publishes a rumour that the real Louis XVII. has just died in the Trappist monastery at Belfontaine. Many years ago, so runs the story, two men arrived one night at the monastery, one of whom handed a small box to the Superior, with the request that it should not be opened till the death of his companion, who desired to spend the rest of his days as a "religious" in that asylum, and also wished his name to be concealed till after his death. This person bore the well-known features of the Bourbon family, and it is said that documents have been found in the box referred to which prove decidedly that he was the son of Louis XVI. Of course, if this account is true, we shall shortly hear further details concerning so remarkable a fact.

Mr. Macrorie has at last been turned into a bishop under the hands of Dr. Gray. Not, however, without considerable opposition. At the Cape a protest was presented to the Metropolitan against the consecration, signed by 129 persons, and another from Natal, signed by over 1,260. The new prelate, who is to be styled Bishop of Maritzburg, left Capetown for Natal on February 2nd, and we may now look for squabbles between him and his brother bishop, "whom the Church," as Dr. Gray tells us, "has deposed from his office for grievous heresy," but whose "teachings," according to the Natal protest, "have never yet been brought to an issue according to the laws and usage of the Church of England."

An application, directed by the Charity Commissioners, has been made to the Court of Chancery to try the rights of rival claimants to an endowment of upwards of £700 per annum, appropriated to Seventh-day Baptists at Naton, near Tewkesbury. In 1595, Dr. Bound published a work that became the banner of the Puritan party, in which he maintained that Christians ought to rest on the Lord's Day as much as the Jews did on the Mosaic Sabbath. But in 1628, the Rev. Theophilus Bradbourne went further, and contended that this obligation attached to the seventh day, and not to the first. For this he was brought before the High Commission, and yielded himself a convert to the formidable persuasions of Laud and his associates in that English Inquisition. But his views were taken up by others, principally Baptists. Many of the separatists, who had been clergymen of the Establishment, adopted them; and from the time of James I. to that of Charles II., the controversy occupied both the pulpit and the press. The title of one of the works on the subject is "Saturday no Sabbath; or, the seventh day Sabbath proved to be of no force to the believing Gentiles in the times of the Gospel, by the law of nature, Moses, Christ. Being an account of several publique disputations held at Stonechapel-by-Paul, London, between Dr. Chamberlain, Mr. Tillam, and Mr. Coppinger, of the one party, and Jer. Ives of the other. In which the arguments and answers on both sides are impartially recommended to publique view. By Jer.

Ives, 1659." A treatise of John Bunyan's, published in 1685, seems to have given an effectual check to the spread of the opinions of the Sabbath-keepers, and henceforth it subsisted only in the organizations which had been previously formed, and in their successors in diminishing descent. The tenet, however, is still rife in the United States, where it has numerous adherents, who support two newspapers, and give other signs of life.

The Guardian, while conceding the principle of Mr. Hadfield's Burials Regulation Bill, takes exception to it on the ground of some omissions in it. It would have been better if, instead of providing specially for those who are not members of the Church of England, it had distinctly asserted the right of all Englishmen not only to bury their dead in the parish churchyard but to call in what minister they please to officiate at the grave. The Guardian asks "if the churchyard is to be equally available for ministrations and ceremonies of all manner of religionists, which body of them is to keep the churchyard in order?" And we think it is only fair that all sects, who claim a right to interment in the parish burial-grounds, should contribute, in some way or other, to the expense of preserving them in a proper state, and making them more beautiful than they now often are.

The Record says that Lady Herbert of Lea is canvassing in person among the City merchants, at their counting-houses, for subscriptions in aid of a Roman Catholic college for "Missionaries of the Sacred Heart," and suggests that she has had this duty imposed upon her as a penance. But, as the Guardian remarks, no one who has read her books could ever suppose that she found this work anything but a labour of love.

A meeting was held at Sion College last week, the Rev. J. H. Coward, the president, in the chair, when an able paper was read by Mr. Henry Clark, of Liverpool, in which he advocated free and open seats in churches on religious, legal, economical, and historical grounds, and predicted that if a more elastic system be not adopted, by which the masses of the people could be attracted, the Church of England will be considered to have failed in her mission, and cease to exist as a State Establishment. An interesting discussion followed, in which various laymen and clergymen took part.

The statistics of the United Presbyterian Church for the year 1868, just published, afford a striking proof of what voluntarism can do, even when it has none of the mighty and few of the wealthy in its ranks. It appears that the total sum of £265,561 was raised by the various congregations, £205,815 being for such purposes as stipend, church and manse building, debt liquidation, and other strictly congregational purposes, and £15,746 for missionary and benevolent purposes. A comparison with the total income for 1858, shows that £100,000 a year more is now raised than was the case ten years ago. The total congregational income for the ten years from 1858 has amounted to £2,314,793 including a sum of £128,818, received by the Synod's treasurer from individual members of the Church, but not credited to the congregations. The United Presbyterian Church differs from the other Presbyterian denominations in Scotland, in upholding the abstract principle that it is wrong, in any circumstances, to connect the Church with the State, all alliances of this kind being, in its opinion, unscriptural.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The correspondent of the Guardian gives the substance of a Papal letter to the Archbishop of Paris, which, though dated 1865, has only just seen the light, and which is what may be called, in vulgar language, a tremendous wiggling. The origin of the letter seems to have been certain official visitations which the Archbishop insisted upon making in the monastic establishments within his diocese, and which, as usual, claimed to be independent of episcopal jurisdiction, and to recognise only the Roman authorities. The acts of the Archbishop were "reported" to Rome, and led to a communication from thence, to which he had evidently returned a sharp answer. It is to this reply that the Papal "objurgation" is addressed. After accusing the Archbishop of maintaining, among other similar things, that the Pope has no right to interfere in a diocese unless its religious affairs are in such disorder as absolutely to require it, and that this intervention, except in such circumstances, is a violation of the divine right of every bishop to be sole judge within his own diocese, and converts it into a missionary district, the letter expresses the "astonishment, affliction, and agony" of the Papal mind at such sentiments, which "never could have been believed" had they not come from the Archbishop himself. He is also accused of favouring errors which he ought to "reject with horror;" of violating one of the Canons of the Fourth Council of Lateran; of having been present at the funeral of Marshal Magnan, Grand Master of the Freemasons, although he knew that this sect were condemned by the Roman Pontiffs, and were "reversers of all authority of the Catholic Church and of civil society, and capable, if possible, of driving God himself out of heaven;" and, lastly, of having sanctioned "the erroneous and pernicious opinion that the acts of the Holy See are not binding unless their publication be sanctioned by the civil power." The Archbishop can hardly look for a cordial welcome to the Ecumenical, even if he receives an invitation, except he mends his ways.

A correspondent of the Liberal Christian, writing from Berlin, where he thinks some plan of co-operation might be devised between a small community called the "Free-Fellowship" and the American Unitarian Association, says:

"It is a mistake to speak of the Germans as Rationalists, or even Liberals. The masses are as indifferent to these tendencies as they are to the dominant form of Orthodoxy. Nor does Roman Catholicism gain ground. The people seem to have done with Christianity, and will doubtless remain so until it is presented to them in some new phase of beauty and power. The established churches—Lutheran Evangelical—are poorly attended, and usually by the humblest classes. The Dom, however, is packed every Sunday. When Schleiermacher preached here he explained how three classes came to hear him. 'Students, maidens, and officers,' said he. 'The students, on my account perhaps, the maidens on account of the students, and the officers for the maidens.' Students, officers, and maidens still attend, but many others are attracted, first, by the famous male choir of boys and men, which chants in grand and solemn movement; secondly, by the royal family, some member of which is generally present. The King, indeed, patronises the Church and the clergy. Probably he entertains a more sincere regard for its ordinances than does Napoleon for those of Catholicism, yet with both it is the policy of political wisdom to support a church. In the minds of my countrymen here there exists some uncertainty as to the ecclesiastical position of the King. One has been heard to pray that his Majesty might be turned from his errors to a knowledge of Christian truth, and this in close connection with a petition for the 'heaven everywhere.' Meanwhile a second thanked heaven for this defender of the faith. It is unfortunate for the progress of Liberal religion that the Church is so yoked with the State. Luther is made the turning-point of a political as well as religious reform. A political significance is attached to his life, which I think the Monk of Wittenberg would hardly acknowledge. From this unnatural union it follows that all attempts at religious emancipation are made to bear a blame and suspicion which does not justly belong to them."

The Times' Berlin correspondent gives a similar description of the state of religion in Prussia. He says:

"There are plenty of orthodox individuals—nay, even some orthodox districts—to be found in Prussia; but the vast majority of the Protestant middle classes, and even a large portion of the lower strata of society, are estranged from the religion of their ancestors, and take no interest in the church or the religious lessons thrust upon the schools by church and government combined. Were Germany destined to see the notions current among her educated classes accepted by church and school, this would involve an intellectual revolution of an audacity and comprehensiveness never before witnessed in the world. It would be a leap from the sunny heights of faith into the dark abyss of scepticism. It would be the exchange of settled convictions on things of the other world for mere conjecture. It would be the resolve to order this world by the light of reason alone, and renounce all apprehension of the next. . . . In a tightly-governed country like this, who can wonder that the Government should attempt to stem the tide the course of which it disapproves, and the ultimate issue of which it fears? For the present, however, its exertions are as vain as they are easily accounted for. Amid the deafening din of politics, the latitudinarian stream flows silently on, threatening some day to inundate its banks, and change the face of the land more effectually than could be done by any merely political revolution."

"A Member of a Cathedral" gives, in the Guardian, a sad account of the bishopless state of the South and West of England. He says:—

"At present there is not a single acting bishop in the great sees of Winchester, Exeter, Salisbury, Bath and Wells, and Chichester—nowhere, in fact, with the exception of Canterbury, in the whole of England south of London. In the largest of these dioceses this has been the case for many years; in others it will probably long continue to be so; and it must be superfluous for a Churchman to say that it both has done and is doing great injury. Spite of all his ability, valetudinarian habits and the age of the Bishop of Exeter have brought the diocese into a state most unhappy in itself, and which it will require years of energy and devotion to correct. Churchmen have too long agreed, from amiable motives, to be silent on this point; but the magnitude of the evil has now become too great to be overlooked; and not only are the Dissenting journals loud on the subject, but unless something can be done it will probably attract the attention of Parliament, and can hardly fail to be a ground of attack upon the Church."

On Lord Redesdale's talk about "confiscation" and "sacrilege" in connection with the Irish Church Bill, the Pall Mall observes:—

"Confiscation means the appropriation of private property to public purposes. But what is property? It is simply a general name for the sum total of legal rights which a given person enjoys over given property. The endowments of a parish are subject only to one set of rights, the rights of the incumbent, and his rights are confined to his own lifetime. Give to every living man a full equivalent for the rights which he now possesses, and what property is left to be confiscated? Who loses any rights at all by an enactment that after the death of the present rector of a parish no more rectors shall be appointed? By the supposition the existing rector and patron, if there is one, are compensated, and no one else has any rights at all. The laity no doubt lose the advantage of a public institution which is no longer kept up, but this is not a proprietary right. If it were recognised as such, no reforms could ever be made at all, for all involve some degree of inconvenience. As to sacrilege, it is merely an ugly name which anybody can apply to anything he does not like, and which strictly means a particular kind of larceny foolishly distinguished from other offences from which it does not substantially differ."

We are glad to find that the most influential portion of the press is decidedly against Sir Roundell Palmer's proposed test. We gave the opinion of the Times last week. The Saturday Review favours Dr. Pusey's idea of a mixed university with denominational colleges, by which the principle of definite religious teaching would be secured without the reservation of any exceptional privilege to the Established Church. The Economist thinks that such a contract as Sir Roundell proposes, not to teach anything opposed to certain ill-defined dogmas, cannot ensure that which he aims at—a religious attitude of mind, since this is sometimes found very marked in negative thinkers, while it is wanting in highly orthodox ones. And the Spectator says, clergymen of the Church of England do freely question, and ought to question, the divine authority of very much in the Bible; but Sir Roundell's test would make them scruple to do so. Lay members of that Church do freely question, and ought to question, many of her doctrinal claims; but Sir Roundell's test would make them scruple to do so. In a word, if it kept out fewer men, it would impose far more reserve on those whom it admitted.

To Mr. Disraeli's question, why, if the principle of the Irish Church Bill is admitted, the property of St. Thomas's might not be distributed among the various London hospitals, the Pall Mall says a plain answer would be "that the endowments of the Irish Church are strictly national property, of which the Imperial Parliament is trustee for the benefit, not of any sect, but of the Irish people at large; whereas St. Thomas's Hospital is a private institution, of which Parliament is not in any special sense the trustee." But passing over this distinction, our contemporary asks whether the property even of St. Thomas's Hospital might not be rightfully applied to different purposes, under some conceivable set of circumstances. It says:

"No one wishes to interfere with it, because it is doing great good, and the money is on the whole far better spent than most funds of similar value. Suppose, however, to bring the case a little nearer to that of the Irish Church, that England had been conquered some centuries ago by a race which devoutly believed in homœopathy; imagine further that the richer classes in London were the descendants of this race, and preserved their medical creed, whilst the poorer classes altogether rejected globules, and held as a primary article of faith that Hahnemann was confined in some everlasting dispensary undergoing an eternal process of bleeding, blistering, and drenching as a punishment for his atrocious heresy. Under such circumstances, the hospital might probably have been seized by the conquerors and devoted to homœopathic doctors; it would not be able to fill its beds, and the endowment would be wasted in maintaining a number of useless doctors administering potions to a few rich people who could afford to pay for them themselves. If by a return to more liberal principles the conquering race should propose to divide the endowments amongst homœopaths and orthodox practitioners alike, or, seeing that this would lead to innumerable jealousies, should bestow them upon those purposes on which doctors of all faiths are agreed, there would, of course, be a terrible outcry about confiscation, sacrilege, and robbery, for medical orthodoxy is nearly as severe as theological. But as the change would be manifestly for the good of the nation at large, we might certainly invite them to give a little more precision to their assertions. They would, as we infer from the parallel case, argue that the homœopathic people had in some way inherited the rights of the orthodox doctors, and that the rights were as indefeasible as those of private property. We will omit the little difficulty of proving that we really respect the will of the founder by applying his endowments in support of principles radically opposed to his own, and proceed to the fundamental question of the validity of the claim in any case. Supposing, that is, for the sake of argument, that we are really respecting the intentions of the original founder (a concession which is by no means applicable to the case of the Irish Church) we must still ask whether those intentions ought to be respected and, if so, how far. . . . It is obvious at first sight, that endowments are only useful under certain close restrictions. It is the most preposterous claim that ever was put forward that a gentleman who died in the fifteenth or the tenth century should be able to legislate for the nineteenth century. Would any reasonable man wish to determine at the present day what is to be the application of a certain fund in the year 2469 A.D.? Or, if he expected that his directions would be observed with superstitious accuracy, would that be any inducement to him, as a reasonable man, to leave directions accordingly? If so he must be singularly ignorant of the results, of the practical results, of the benevolence of our ancestors."

In the debate on the disturbances in China, Lord Grey was considered by the anti-missionary press to have "gone into the very heart of the question," when he put the case hypothetically:

"Suppose some Chinese missionaries were to preach Confucianism in Manchester, Birmingham, or any other of our towns, and they were to be maltreated by the people whose religious susceptibilities were offended, what would we say if a squadron of Chinese iron-clads appeared in British waters to demand satisfaction?"

On which the Methodist Times, taking the case thus put, observes:

"If it appeared that the Chinese missionaries violated no law which expressly excluded the propaganda they were prosecuting—for none such law existed—and if such treaties did, however, exist, as seemed at least to tolerate that sort of thing, and the missionaries in all other respects behaved themselves in a peaceable manner, their preaching Confucianism excepted, the British municipal law would protect them against such maltreatment, and if it didn't, through official connivance, what justification could we allege, and what would be the ground of our protest against the demand for satisfaction? But the case omits a most important element. His lordship forgets that the interests of the Christian propaganda are identified with the practice and belief of thousands of Chinese citizens who have become true Christians, and they may, and doubtless do, wish for the continuance of missionary labour in their midst. Some of our Manchester or Birmingham men might really desire to hear what the Confucian apostles had to say for themselves, and to expose the gratification of that desire to mob-violence would be to fail in securing for the men who cherished it the exercise of a right which certainly does not transcend the object of the civil law or the functions of its magistracy."

Referring to some remarks of the Times and the Pall Mall on the same subject, the English Independent says:—

"It is unfortunate for these flippant writers that the exigencies of the case should have required them to apply their defamation particularly to missionaries in China. Who introduced us to the knowledge of the Chinese language? To whom are these critics indebted for their knowledge of 'the singular fabric of Chinese civilisation'? Did they ever hear of Morrison, Milne, Medhurst, Legge, and Lockhart? Who, according to the late Mr. Cooke, the writer of the interesting letters in the Times on China a few years back, has more acquaintance with the habits of the Chinese and their modes of thought than any man he met—who but the Rev. Joseph Edkins, at this moment representing the London Missionary Society at Peking?"

The English correspondent of the Nation, N.Y., in remarking on the Saurin case and the secession of the Marquis of Bute to the Church of Rome, says:

"Convents have become so common in England within the last few years that their management is a matter of some importance. We are growing accustomed to the sight of Sisters of Mercy and priests perambulating the streets of London; and it seems to be rather the policy of Catholics to make a display of their numbers and growing importance. How far their importance really increases would be a difficult question. * * * There is certainly a tendency on the part of the aristocratic and fashionable classes to drift Rome-wards, if not actually across the boundary—militating, of course, the large number who drift the opposite way. Protestantism may be true or false, but it is a religion for tradesmen, whereas Catholicism, false or true, is a gentlemanlike religion. That I take to be the opinion of the Butites, including in that name the large number of people who indulge more or less in Butolatry. There are, as I need not say, many reasons of much greater potency which may swell the ranks of Catholicism; but the supposed vulgarity of Protestantism, especially in its Dissenting forms, is one minor cause, which falls in with the general demand for a religion more satisfying in an æsthetic point of view than that to which we are accustomed. Meanwhile the intellectual part of the country alienates itself more decidedly from all traditional forms."

Bitterly as the Church News is opposed to Mr. Gladstone's scheme, it yet admits that its effect on the spiritual health of the decrepit Church of Ireland may be beneficial. It says:

"If under such a system it cannot rise from its ruins, it must be because it is hopelessly enfeebled and all its spiritual strength eaten or rusted away. If for the future it should not have the best, holiest, most energetic men for its bishops, it will be its own fault. If sloth and ill discipline and heresy and disregard of all ecclesiastical order should prevail, it will be its own fault. If its sees should not be multiplied, its missions at home and abroad not active and apostolic in character, it will be its own fault. If its synods should be infrequent or cowardly or imbecile, it will be its own fault. If its services should be cold and stiff and unelastic, unattractive or ill adapted to the people, again we say it will be its own fault. A great opportunity is now placed before it of showing what it really is. The crisis is inevitable now, whether it be for good or bad, for weal or for woe. Let it spend no time in vain lamentations, but resolutely buckle on its armour for a noble Christian warfare in the name of the Lord of Hosts. This we know, that, whether rightly or wrongly influenced, many in England would thankfully change their ecclesiastical prospects for those now opening before the sister Church of Ireland."

REMARKS ON THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM.

THE Pall Mall thus sums up the most interesting part of Dr. Ball's speech, which is regarded as the ablest defence of the Irish Church that has been produced by the debate on Mr. Gladstone's bill:

"What you, the ministry, are attacking is not the Established Church in particular, but the principle of religious endowments in general. The Regium Donum and the Maynooth grant, at all events, were not intended to favour the Established Church. They were meant to promote religious instruction amongst Presbyterians and Roman Catholics. What you are establishing is the voluntary system pure and simple; but that system exists nowhere in Europe, and where it does exist, whether in its integrity as in the United States, or in a qualified form as in some of the English colonies, its results are by no means satisfactory. It is condemned by all authority, and in particular by Burke and the other writers who have followed in his footsteps. It fails to provide universality of instruction, because each denomination looks only to the interests of its own members. It fails to supply permanence of instruction, because in periods of coldness and depression its supporters flag. It injures the quality of the instruction given, because it makes the teacher dependent on those whom he teaches. It is peculiarly unsuitable for Ireland, because its principal advantage, the fact that it stimulates religious fervour, is in itself an objection to it in a country in which religious fervour is already far too abundant. Ireland, moreover, suffers from absenteeism, which the voluntary system would aggravate."

Our contemporary then proceeds to examine this argument, and says:

"The first great objection to it is that it neither proves nor tends to prove that the existing Church Establishment is a good or that it is not a bad thing. It may be proved triumphantly that a watch is a very convenient possession, but if your watch will not go, it is a mere incumbrance, and unless you can get one which will go, you will find it convenient to go without a watch. Church Establishments may be excellent things, but it does not follow that wise men would tolerate, say, a Mahometan or Roman Catholic Church Establishment in England or Scotland. It would be as sensible to live with a wife who was unchaste in her conduct and intolerable in her temper out of respect to the institution of marriage. It is better to go barefoot than to wear tight boots.

"Apart, however, from this, which answers the whole of Dr. Ball's argument, the particular assertions of which it is composed appear to us to be open to much criticism. The voluntary system, says Dr. Ball, is condemned by all manner of philosophers, and in particular by the 'great and commanding intellect of Edmund Burke.' Till very lately none of the Scribes or Pharisees except Mr. Bright believed in it, and it is practised in no part of the world except America. Dr. Ball is obviously enough one of those persons who like big names and sounding compliments to persons of orthodox reputation. He is just the person to quote Burke and Mackintosh with appropriate adjectives affixed to their names. One might fancy him recommending a young man to 'form his style' upon this or that standard author; but with every respect for him that is not the way to discover how the world is going. There are very many subjects, and this, we think, is one of them, upon which the talk is one way and the facts are the other. Every one knows the passage in Burke about the Church of England 'raising her mitred head amongst princes;' and every one also knows, or, if he opens his eyes and looks about him, may know, that Burke was never more wrong than in that very passage, and that is saying a great deal. At least, if he was right in his later ecclesiastical views, the whole course of legislation and of thought throughout Europe and America for the last two generations has been wrong. There are no movements to which a wise man ought to pay greater attention or respect than those which proceed from the tacit unexpressed convictions of the great mass of mankind in the face of the denunciations of eloquent exceptions. It is quite true that Burke and some other writers of inferior ability did exhaust the resources of language in reviling the voluntary system, in denouncing the growth of democracy, in singing the praises of crowns, mitres, chivalry, or other institutions which were, or which they believed to be, connected with them. It is no less true that the general current of thought and action all over Europe has set steadily in the opposite direction for nearly eighty years, and is gathering power every day. It is true that a purely voluntary system exists nowhere in Europe; but look at the steps which have been made in that direction since the beginning of the French Revolution. Look at Italy, Spain, France, and Austria. Is it not obvious to every one that the ideal towards which they are tending, for good or for evil, is that of a free Church in a free State? In America, where the tendencies of the age have had full swing, a pure voluntary system is the result. In the English colonies, where the institutions of the mother country still exercise some influence, the system is slightly—very slightly qualified. In England, as every one can see, we are moving with rapid steps in the same direction, though as yet the consummation is probably distant. In the face of facts like these, is it not better to try to understand why people are flying in the face of Edmund Burke than to look into the works of that 'great and commanding' man (who did a good deal more in the way of commanding than in the way of being obeyed), for eloquent denunciations of their audacity? If the voluntary system is so bad a thing, and if its defects have been so clearly proved, why is the course of events unmistakably tending in that direction? The question, we believe, admits of a very plain answer. It is that mankind are ceasing to believe in theological systems generally, and that for that reason they refuse to give pre-eminent public authority and dignity to the exponents of any particular system. Cloak it how you will, this is the real truth, and no amount of eloquent evasions or denunciations will alter it.

"The arguments in favour of State recognition in some form or other of the truth of religion, if we assume the truth of any particular religious system to be altogether indisputable, are overwhelming. If, for instance, you had a nation composed of perfectly sincere Roman Catholics, who believed in the truth of the Roman Catholic creed with as little doubt as a mathematician feels with regard to the subject of his science, the necessary and logical result would be that the clergy would be recognised as the sole authorised expounders of religious and moral truth, and that the State would act towards them under all circumstances upon that assumption. It is, of course, impossible to say what precise results would follow from such a conviction in particular cases. In some instances a perfectly Catholic nation might think it best to tolerate, in others to punish heresy. They might give different degrees of outward power, dignity, wealth, and influence to the clergy, according to circumstances, but so long as they continued to be of the same mind as to religious belief they would recognise the Roman Catholic creed as the truth, and their clergy as the exponents of the truth whenever circumstances might call for such recognition. Such a state of things would no doubt have many great and obvious advantages. The imagination can hardly conceive a more splendid position than that of a clergy which did fully represent the unanimous convictions of a great nation as to religious faith, and which was consistently treated by the nation upon that footing. Even Burke's language about 'mitred heads' would hardly look like an exaggeration under such circumstances, though it does look rather absurd when we apply it to Tomline raising his mitred head amongst princes to look out for a new mitre. Looking, however, at things as they are, it is obvious that such a notion as this is a mere dream, and cannot be expected in any assignable time to be anything else. The fact with which we have to deal is wide-spread and increasing religious disagreement. People differ widely, passionately, and irreconcilably upon the subject, and they are gradually getting to see that they must agree to differ, and must transact their common affairs upon some other than a theological basis. This is the real source of the vitality of the voluntary system. It is this which has prevented the establishment of any new established Church in any considerable European nation for a great length of time, and which has made all the younger nations of the world adopt more or less fully the voluntary system. We are very far from being blind to the objections which may be made to it. It is quite true, as Dr. Ball says, that it lacks universality and permanency, and that it does not breed so good a class of clergy as a system of endowments. But to these and fifty other objections it is enough to reply, in general, that the voluntary system is founded upon and recognises the great fact that mankind are not agreed upon religious subjects; that the differences between them are bona fide differences, and that they ought not to be made the ground of any political distinctions.

"We do not mean to say that we advocate the voluntary system, especially in regard to this country. Where you have an Established Church which suits the peculiar circumstances of the country, which excites no animosity, inflicts no grievance, sentimental or otherwise, upon any living creature, and is recommended by great practical utility, it would be foolish to pull it down; but the fact that the Church of England is an exceptional institution to be defended on the score of the exceptional circumstances of the country in which it exists, is one which it is impossible to deny, and foolish to try to conceal. No one would think of setting it up if it did not exist. No one can affect to say that circumstances may not arise which would make its destruction necessary. Be this as it may, it must stand or fall on its own merits, which may be discussed when the occasion arises. In dealing with the Irish branch of the Church, those who say you are asserting the voluntary principle are fully answered by the reply, in common cases the voluntary principle ought to be adopted, because the whole course of European and American thought and feeling is setting in that direction."

ENGLISH GIRLS IN FOREIGN CONVENTS.

THE Paris correspondent of the Post wishes to remind the public in England of the number of English young ladies who become Roman Catholics abroad, and then later enter occasionally a convent, and are lost to their parents and the world. These young ladies, he says, have almost invariably a little fortune, which becomes the property of the convent on their taking the veil. The financial part of the business is all arranged before a sister becomes a pensioner for life. I will narrate one of the many instances of an English young lady becoming a nun on the Continent; or rather how two sisters, born and educated as Protestants, caused so much grief to friends at home. The daughters are sent to a school, a sort of retreat, where the young ladies of Italy are prepared for the world by an education which is almost exclusively religious, and where useful mundane knowledge is ignored. The mother does not visit the girls often, but sends them all they want. Two years pass over when mamma, who is now in Paris, hears from Augusta that she has become a Roman Catholic. Anne is called to Paris immediately, but is so inexplicably unhappy with her mother; looks ill and weeps, and has fits, and prays to the Virgin Mary. Well, it comes out that she wishes to become a Roman Catholic too. Mamma says, "No!" The girl runs away from the maternal home and cannot be traced. As time rolls on Augusta informs her mother that she has decided on retiring from the world, and has already gone through the probationary steps. Augusta is now, observe, of age, and is mistress of £8,000. All that the mother has heard of the daughter since is by a letter which reaches her periodically on the saint's day of her name from the pretty little nun (she was pretty, at all events, but not bright-minded), saying she is very happy, has never repented, and prays eternally for her family. The other young lady turns up later in America, where she has become a nun also. Now, here is the curious part of it. The superior of the convent in America applies to the mother for money for a dowry, as this young lady, on coming of age, contrary to expectations, has no claim on the father's will. Anne had been born after the will was executed, and the father had not made any provision for the youngest girl. This was not pleasant to the finance minister of the little quondam where Anne had been taken in, as £8,000 was expected on her coming of age. No one knows to this day how she got from Paris to the United States. Up to the time I lost sight of Mrs. X—she had not paid a farthing, and declared she did not intend to do so. What may be the life of these girls—how they may be treated—will never be known to the outer world. The letters they write to the mother are evidently dictated. I believe most English Ministers Plenipotentiary at foreign courts in Catholic countries have stories to tell about British subjects in foreign convents.

PROGRESS IN PARLIAMENT.

THE debate which has taken place on the second reading of Mr. GLADSTONE'S Irish Church scheme has been significant alike in its course and in its conclusion. More satisfactory even than the unexpectedly large majority of 118 by which it was carried, has been the manifest and almost conscious weakness of the defence. The tone of the Opposition was set by Mr. DISRAELI, in a speech as insidiously dishonouring to religion as anything which can be conceived. His chief argument practically resolved itself into this—that Established Churches hold with the powers that be, while in voluntary religious societies there is always an element which, in times of political disquiet, intensifies and aggravates the discontent. This he exemplified by the position which has always been occupied by Irish Catholicism in relation to Irish disaffection. We already find it bad enough, he argued, to have one non-established and discontented Church. Disestablish the Irish Church and take away Regium Donum from the Presbyterians, and you will have three discontented churches instead of one. This, with a little sham philosophy and false historical analogy, formed the staple of a case the weakness of which probably no one felt more keenly than himself! We should be sorry to impute the same want of earnestness and reality to the general speeches of the defenders of the Irish Church. Sir ROUNDELL PALMER, especially, infused into that side of the debate an element of high-minded and disinterested conviction which could not be without its effect in warming up Mr. DISRAELI'S followers into a feeling of their being the champions of justice and religion such as their leader's tone was little calculated to inspire. On the whole, however, we have reason to be proud of the contrast presented by the great speeches on the side of the measure. Mr. BRIGHT'S speech was one of the noblest that he ever delivered, and lifted the whole question out the mud of party contention and expediency into the region of lofty political morality. The debates and the division upon it may be fairly said to have carried the question a long stage nearer to its settlement. About that settlement there probably has never been much doubt within the walls of Parliament. The members on both sides of the House know too well how these things go to have any real faith in fighting against a majority of above a hundred; and when it was once seen that Mr. GLADSTONE had solved the problem in a manner which took away the last hope of his party being weakened, as it has so often been, by division, the whole thing became merely a question of time. But outside the House, among Conservative associations and clerical coteries, and especially among the Irish Episcopalians and Orangemen, a very different feeling has prevailed. They have worked themselves into a species of fanatical conviction that Disestablishment could never really happen. Without any distinct conception of what it was they expected, they have persuaded themselves that, in some way or other, so-monstrous a scheme must be defeated, and looked to the head of their party for the unveiling of some strategic mystery which should, at the least, involve the question in such difficulty and confusion as would make any interference with the status quo impossible. Upon this state of mind a majority of 118 on the second reading will make a distinct impression. There is something tangible and unmistakable about it. It brings Disestablishment down out of the clouds of vague possibility to the level of distinctly approaching facts.

We have great hope that this majority will have an effect upon the fate of some of the other measures for religious liberty and equality which are now before the House. Chief amongst these is of course the University Tests Bill. This will be carried this year in the Commons by such a majority as the Upper House has never faced before in their summary rejections of it. We cannot but hope that, even if no very new lights of argument may have dawned upon their minds, they may begin to feel the effect of that conviction which is gradually coming to pervade English society that theological exclusiveness of any kind in our national universities is something quite behind the age, and can be no longer tolerated. Even Sir ROUNDELL PALMER'S proposal to modify the measure will in reality tend to strengthen it. The force of his frank admissions of there being nothing to be feared from the abolition of the present tests will not be really weakened by his proposal of a new and milder test of his own. He would require every professor to sign a declaration that in discharge of his office he "will never endeavour directly or indirectly to teach or inculcate any opinion opposed to the divine authority of the Holy Scriptures or to the doctrines and discipline of the Church of England as by law established." There is not, however, the least likelihood of his amendment being adopted. Such a compromise would not have been accepted by the last Parliament, still less will it satisfy the present one. But its serious proposal helps to mark the stage at which we have arrived. When it comes to fining down theological securities to such tenuity as this, the whole case may almost as well be given up.

THE TRANSYLVANIAN UNITARIANS.

THE Rev. C. H. A. Dall gives an interesting sketch of our Transylvanian churches in the last number of the Monthly Journal of the American Unitarian Association:

"On my leaving a pleasant party of Americans on the Danube, and striking off to take my chance among utter strangers, I felt a slight misgiving. Not wholly unaccustomed, however, to walk by faith, I was strengthened by seeing in the guide-book that Transylvania held 'some of the most intelligent agricultural population in Europe.' And in spite of the protest of an Orthodox brother, that I could not hope to find other than 'an exceedingly corrupted form of Christianity,' I resolved to go and see; staying long enough to explore a field as yet unvisited by any representative of the American Unitarian Association. Never was faith more amply, bountifully, overwhelmingly rewarded, with good measure, pressed down, shaken together and running over. The view of the city as you descend to it, almost spirally, from the surrounding crests of the Carpathian Mountains, is superb. It has not much to boast in the way of architecture, except a few elegant church spires; the finest of which are Roman Catholic. After an hour of cleansing and café au lait, at a good hotel, the master of the house generously volunteered to guide the stranger to his friends. My guide took me at once to the college. At its door stood half a dozen bright-looking boys, who eagerly volunteered to take me to Professor Benczedi's room, across the street. They almost fought with each other for the privilege of rendering a stranger this free service. The professor greeted me cordially in English, and presently took me to the parlour of Dr. John Kriza, poet and bishop, and resident principal of an institution which stands at the head of the one hundred or more schools, and three gymnasia (academies), of the Transylvanian Unitarians. The bishop reads English, but speaks only German, beside his native Hungarian; which, you know, is not kindred to the German, but rather to the stranger speech of the Lapps and the Finns. The tall, black-eyed bishop smiled as he grasped my hand, and said he'd long known me through my work. He had much to ask about the Hindoos, after introducing me to his lady wife, and their daughter of ten years. Two of the professors happened in, and were seen at once to be highly cultured gentlemen. One of them, Professor Simen, from that hour became my best of friends, as brother, helper, and interpreter. He insisted that, as long as I could, I should occupy one of his three rooms. The salary of a professor is only £40 a year, and I dreaded encroaching; but he would not take no for an answer. Over he went to the hotel with Professor Benczedi and three of the collegians and all I had was soon brought and bestowed in one of his own sunny rooms, wherein I was to rest, taking all meals unless otherwise engaged, with the good bishop and Mrs. Kriza. I was engaged out to meals more than half the time, among people as refined and intelligent as are found in our own Cambridge or Boston; as brilliant in conversation, as tasteful in art, as accomplished in song and instrumental music, as high in moral tone, and as earnest as ourselves for true reform and pure religion.

"... Sunday, May 10, my fourth day in Clausenburg, I attended service in the somewhat too plain and homely church,—the only one, I believe, which Catholic bigotry has left to the Unitarians in Clausenburg.

"This bigotry, however, is rather governmental (Austrian) than personal; and it is good to find that the 'four established' forms of Christianity—Calvinist, Lutheran, Catholic, and Unitarian—have not walked and worked together in Hungary for three hundred years, with their own Government, Queen, and Court at one time Unitarian, without training these sects to mutual respect and a kindly regard for one another. ... After a very simply delivered and attentively heard discourse from Professor Simen,—the men having their own seats and the women theirs,—a good part of the congregation adjourned to the College Hall to hear from their American visitor about the hearts and homes of their Unitarian friends west of the Atlantic, and something of the cause and its prospects in other parts of the world. Professors Simen and Benczedi were both active as mediators in this social and public conversation. On the day following, by the generous arrangements of friends, I was off on wheels, with Professor Benczedi, to visit as many as possible of the Unitarian schools within a circuit of thirty or forty miles.

"Of the internal arrangements of the gymnasia and outlying country schools, I hardly dare to speak, everything being so sadly stricken and cramped for want of money. I saw a few decent school-rooms, especially those for girls. Some of the Unitarian churches in the country districts are without floors. They have not the means to cover the bare earth with boards, under the feet of the worshippers, nor afford a stove to soften the rigors of a winter longer and colder than that of England. Ought one, then, to be surprised to enter such a school-house as that at Toroczko? Here the school numbered eighty-four boys. Of these, twenty-nine or thirty were present. The discrepancy between the roll-book and the attendance was accounted for by 'fever and ague.' One boy lay burning with fever in one of the fifteen sleeping bunks or berths, which lined the four low walls of about the least-convenient school-room that I ever entered. I can think of nothing like it except the forecastle of a coal-lighter or coasting brig. For the accommodation of 'ninety boys,' here was a room eighteen feet by fifteen, whose ceiling you could nearly touch with your hand. No wonder the boys had fever! The door was only opened for air for my special convenience. Eight or ten boys I found were studying Latin. One hoped to be a minister of the gospel, and another an officer in the army. The New Testament was not memorised in this school; but the Catechism seemed to be much used. It was nowise deistic in its tenets, but rather orthodox. It clearly taught that Jesus was the only Mediator between God and men.

"I have spoken of the struggling schools and churches (about one hundred and twelve churches, as many schools, and fifty thousand Unitarians in all) of our Transylvanian household of faith. Let me say no more, except that the whole people has been fused into one, by nineteen years of Austrian oppression, including wholesale robbery and massacre,—as when General Bem drove out the Austrians in 1848, and held his own for a good long year; and Austria let loose two hundred thousand Wallachs, like blood-hounds upon them, who burned and sacked and murdered, right and left. The Szecklers and the Modjors (usually written Magyars) are no longer the haughty aristocrats they once were. The lofty idealism of the now despairing and impracticable Kossuth has well nigh democratised the whole mass of Hungarians, so that they are now about as republican as ourselves. I repeat that our Transylvanian brethren are rich, both in intelligence and faith. Sorely pressed and peeled by foreign domination for a score of years, a better day has dawned. Their constitution has been restored to them by Austria since her defeat at Sadowa, and Hungary has once more a parliament of her own. For some years past our Unitarian brethren in Great Britain have had constantly in charge one or two students from Transylvania. And it is good to know that our Boston Association of Unitarian Ministers, in one of their recent meetings at Dr. Gannett's, voted unanimously their willingness to extend a like welcome, and right hand of fellowship."

LITERARIA.

It is stated that Baron Tauchnitz has already sold five editions of 5,000 copies each of his edition of the New Testament, which we briefly described and recommended a fortnight ago.

Dr. Cureton, well known for his services to students of Syriac, a short time before his death discovered in the library of the British Museum three Syriac manuscripts—one of the date of A.D. 474, one of the date of 512, and the third undated, but certainly to be referred to the early part of the sixth century—which contain the oldest Christian homilies known—sermons composed by Aphraates, a father of the Syrian church who flourished in the first half of the fourth century, a few years before Ephraim Syrus, hitherto the earliest homilist. Dr. W. Wright will edit the work, which will be in two volumes; the first will give the Syriac text, and the second a translation. It will form an interesting addition to this class of literature.

The Church News, which was started by Dr. F. G. Lee, as the organ of the Disraelite Ritualists, does not appear to have made itself valued in proportion to its virulence. At a sale the other day, the copyright of it, together with fifty sets of the back numbers, was knocked down at £30. The copyright, and blocks of Dr. Lee's edition of the Directorium Anglicanum, together with an impression of the book, fetched £47. A great number of copies of the Altar Service-books edited by him, were sold at various prices. One set, splendidly bound in antique morocco, fetched £4; but thirty sets of the small-paper edition went for 4s.1 though the auctioneer suggested that, by omitting the preface, the work might be made available for use by men of any party.

Two editions of Mr. Beecher's "Life of Jesus, the Christ," are to be published in May. One will be an octavo of 800 pages, with four maps and a head of Christ, engraved from Leonardo Da Vinci's "Last Supper"; the other will be royal octavo with maps, twenty large full-page wood engravings, and from fifty to seventy-five smaller cuts printed in the text.

No series of public events ever produced in so short a time such a voluminous literature as the German war of 1866. As early as July 1, 1867, a catalogue, issued at Prague, contained the titles of fifteen hundred works, comprising poems, romances, pamphlets, addresses, sermons, essays, diaries, orations, histories, biographies, strategic treatises, maps, charts, photographic and lithographic collections, etc., each designed to illustrate some particular phase of the subject. Within less than a year after the armistice of Nicholsburg, there appeared sixteen biographies of King William and fifteen of Count Bismarck, besides several elaborate sketches of less prominent soldiers and diplomats, 135 histories of Prussia, 129 of Italy, 74 of Austria, 41 of France, 23 of Schleswig-Holstein, 18 of Venice, 15 of South Germany, of Holland the same number, of Luxembourg 12, of Hungary, Frankfurt, Denmark, and the German Confederacy 9 each, of Mecklenburg 7, and from one to five of such minor states and municipalities as Wurtemberg, Hesse-Cassel, Nassau, Hamburg, Belgium, Tyrol, Switzerland, Hesse-Darmstadt, Lübeck, and Coburg; and in addition to these books of biography and history, about forty volumes of military maps, topographical charts, and engravings, all of which are elicited by the war, and designed to elucidate it. Since the publication of the above-mentioned catalogue, the German press has been pouring forth works of this class in a steady, though diminished stream, so that their number at present probably exceeds three thousand.

Judging by the publishers' lists, the readers of religious works in this country must be very numerous. For instance, "The Pathway of Safety," a book of "council to the awakened," is now, although it is but a few years old, in its hundred and fifty-sixth thousand. This is certainly a good many to sell of any book, and there are few that can in this respect compare with "The Pathway of Safety." But the "Home Beyond, or a Happy Old Age" comes respectably near it, for it has reached its seventy-sixth thousand; and "The Early Communicant" even beats it; for that work—to be sure it is only a shilling volume—is in its hundred and sixty-second thousand. Behind these, but still far ahead of ninety-nine in a hundred of the best books that have a merely literary value, comes "Read your Heart and not your Garments," in its tenth thousand; "Noontide at Sychar," in its seventh thousand; "The Shadow and the Substance," in its ninth thousand; "The Life of the late Rev. Doctor Marsh," in its sixth thousand; and the Rev. Mr. Moody Stewart's "Life and Letters of Elizabeth, the last Duchess of Gordon," in its eighth thousand.

Mr. Dickinson, of Farringdon-street, is publishing the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's sermons in monthly parts. He has also brought out, under the title of "The Foreign Protestant Pulpit," translations of a number of sermons by some of the most eminent preachers of France, Germany, Holland, and Switzerland.

EARLY METHODISM IN SHEFFIELD.

In a speech at Sheffield the other day, the Rev. J. Hargreaves gave some striking facts showing what a contrast there was between the state of Methodism now and that in which it formerly was. In that very town, he said, and not far from that very spot, the great man to whom, not only Methodism, but the whole church of Christ was greatly indebted, Charles Wesley, the writer of those inimitable hymns with which they were blessed, stood and preached, and he had declared that of all the riotous mobs that ever he had met with in the country—and he had met with some rough ones in the "black country"—Sheffield beat them all. Why, upon the occasion on which he preached an officer rushed up to him, after he had prayed that the Lord would have mercy on some of the sinners around him and save them from the snares of their master, the devil, drew his sword and said, "You have been calling the King, my master, the devil," and he pointed his sword at Mr. Wesley's breast. Wesley threw open his waistcoat and said, with a smile, "I fear God and honour the King," and the poor coward shrunk away, unable to injure the man so much despised. But that very night the mob of Sheffield tore down the Methodist chapel that had only a short time before been reared. It must have been one of the earliest chapels, for it was pulled down in 1743, and the first Methodist chapel was not built till 1739. In the morning, said Mr. Wesley, the chapel was found to be totally destroyed, not one stone remaining on another. The Wesleyans tried to get help, but there was no magistrate in Sheffield who would do his duty, and no help could be obtained. They sent to Rotherham, and they got no help from that quarter. They then appealed to the Judge at York, and he ordered that, as the magistrates at Sheffield had not done their duty and protected the Methodists, they must pay the cost of rebuilding the chapel. So that good came out of evil, for Mr. Wesley said they got a better chapel than they had before.

UNITARIAN CHAPELS AND UNITARIAN MINISTERS.

(COMMUNICATED.)

For some years past there has been amongst us an increasing disposition to spend money on building handsome chapels, and on improving and adorning the celebration of public worship. A generation ago we had hardly one religious edifice with any pretensions to architectural beauty. The best that could be said for our best chapels was that they were convenient and comfortable. The service was of a simple character, with little attempt at attractiveness of ceremonial or of musical accompaniments. Now, on the contrary, there are comparatively few of our large congregations that have not handsome chapels; some of the more recently-erected buildings are equal, if not superior, to any of the religious edifices of their respective towns, and even small and country congregations are constantly putting forth efforts to obtain "houses of prayer" of an attractive appearance.

Not a word can be said against this tendency. That the architecture of a chapel, the form of service, the music, and all other accessories should be as good as they can be made, that the imagination, as well as the reason, should be appealed to in religion, is acknowledged to be most desirable; that there are men amongst us ready to spend their hundreds and thousands on the accomplishment of these objects, is a cheering proof of their value for the religion they profess. But as often as the acknowledged evil of the smallness of the salaries of our ministers is pressed upon our notice, the question suggests itself, as deserving careful attention, "Is there as much zeal displayed in regard to the spiritual head of each congregation as is shown for the material church and the musical parts of the service?"

It is evident that there may reasonably be expected to be some proportion between the sum of money which a congregation can raise for building a handsome chapel and the annual sum they can raise (if they choose) for the support of a minister. Yet the fact is that, in very many instances, there is a lavish expenditure on a building, there are successive improvements in the shape now of a new organ, now of an additional painted window, now of some new ornament to the interior or exterior—and all the time the salary of the minister continues the same. The expenditure on material improvements is not deprecated—long may it continue—this ought our people to do, but not to leave the other undone. In some instances, however, any proposal to improve the minister's position is met with the objection, "We have spent a great deal on building or improvements, therefore we cannot raise a larger annual sum." The opposite ought to be the conclusion. A people that can spend freely to gratify their taste or their pride as to the chapel, have the power, if only they have the will, to make the income sufficient for the wants of their minister. It may safely be affirmed that his salary should in every case be at least ten per cent on the cost of his chapel. The man who can give £100 to a building fund can subscribe £10 a year, and so on in proportion of all others. Were this rule observed, we should not find a minister officiating in a miniature cathedral with a curate's income.

So much has been said in various forms about ministers' salaries, that many persons declare themselves tired of the subject. It is no uncommon thing for men to be tired of being reminded of their duty, when they have no mind to perform it. As long, however, as the present evil continues to exist, it is sure to be talked about. We have many wealthy congregations, but few large ministerial salaries. It is easy to count on the fingers those of £400 a year, and not more than two or three can be found above that sum. Very many ministers struggle on with £100 a year, a sum not worth more than £50 was a generation ago. In some cases even this is not regularly paid. What can we say, when the quarterly £25, which is the whole income of an educated man, expected to maintain a respectable appearance, is a month or two months beyond the appointed time in reaching him, and this simply through the negligence or carelessness of a chapel official? What must we think of congregations containing men of wealth, and yet content to raise only some £50 or £60 a year for their ministers? Can we wonder that under such circumstances there is an increasing dearth of ministers?

In reply to such appeals it is sometimes urged that "ministers ought not to be mercenary," and that "men who are really fit to be ministers will not be deterred by small salaries." The answer is that without being mercenary, a minister must feel the want of money, and must be disheartened when he sees that his congregation care little for his comfort—do not even care to do him justice. If all his congregation were poor men, and actually raised for him all they really could, he would cheerfully struggle on, content with the income, though small. But when there are members of his flock who show themselves ready to spend most lavishly on their own pleasures, who step at no expenditure on their chapel even, but at the same time never take in hand to increase his income, he must feel as though his services are not rightly valued.

There is only one remedy for this state of things. Funds to increase small incomes by grants to needy ministers, or to provide for their widows, however well meant, are only patching up the rent,—are as a fact made an excuse to the consciences of congregations which are sadly deficient in their duty. If the feelings of the laity can be aroused, if each man amongst us can be got to consider whether he is doing his part worthily, then the necessary steps will be taken. Whenever there is found in a congregation one energetic member to take up the matter and agitate it among his brethren, the desired result is pretty sure to follow. Of one thing we may be certain—that all the handsome chapels, new organs, and elaborate decorations, fine music, &c., will never promote religious life where the pulpit is not worthily filled, and that a minister cannot accomplish the important task allotted to him if he is depressed by poverty, disheartened by the apparent indifference of his congregation to his personal interests, or placed in a social position below what he knows to be his due.

It is a misfortune that on this subject it is necessary to deal with generalities, or the case might be much strengthened by citing special cases. A few such would be found in which congregations have taken a wise and right course and set a noble example, and a very great number could be pointed out in which, as long as the minister is content to go on, the people will let him, without ever considering whether they do him justice. Very few indeed are the instances in which a congregation actually does all that lies in its power in regard to the salary of its minister. Let this state of things go on a little longer and its natural result will be seen; the religionists who have refused to exert themselves to maintain and exalt the status of their ministers will reap as they have sown.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The American Presbyterian carries its mercy rather too far. It recommends that culprits condemned to be hung should first have chloroform administered to them, since it is the purpose of punishment to remove the offender out of the way, and not to cause pain. It also suggests that it be introduced into schools when boys are to be flogged.

The Rev. W. H. Milburn, the blind preacher, tells this story of Henry Ward Beecher's absent-mindedness:

"Rev. Mr. —, a Unitarian minister of Brooklyn, told me that one Sunday, having finished his own sermon, he dropped into Plymouth Church before the close of the exercises there. In reading the concluding hymn, Mr. Beecher, in a most original and Beechery vein, commented upon every line of it. My friend was struck with the remarks, and also with the oddity of their being made at all. The very next day he met Mr. Beecher on a ferry-boat, and told him how much impressed he had been with his comments upon the hymn. Mr. Beecher expressed the utmost surprise, and utterly denied that he had added one word to the text of the hymn itself. It was clear that the whole matter—and his comments occupied at least ten minutes—had entirely passed from his mind."

Dr. J. P. Thompson says that Mr. Beecher's forgetfulness is oblivion of minor things through the pre-occupation of the mind in something more important. He relates that Mr. Beecher, having prepared several letters for the mail, went to the post-office and called for the letters in his box, which at once engaged his attention. Returning home, he took off his hat, and out dropped the unmailed letters. To punish his forgetfulness, he turned back again to the post-office, walked up to the window and demanded his letters. The astonished clerk replied: "Why, Mr. Beecher, you were here five minutes ago, and I gave you your letters; there is nothing in your box." "What a forgetful fool I am!" exclaimed Mr. Beecher, and returned to his house, again to cover his shoulders with letters showering from his hat. This time he gathered them into his hand, and holding them before his eyes, marched back to the post-office, and succeeded in depositing them in the mail.

We take the following short but comprehensive prayer from the Liberal Christian.

"Great Source of all that's good and pure,
Heal thou my heart, my mind assure.
O may I seek Thy love to find,
Oh, may I love all humankind.
Thy Holy Spirit on me pour,
And when I faint grant Thou the more.
Thou who art Truth, Oh, make me true;
Thou who art Life, my life renew;
Thou who hast given all to me
Help me to give my all to Thee."

Dr. James Freeman Clarke has begun a series of articles in the Atlantic, designed to show, by comparing it with other religions of the world, that Christianity is fitted and destined to be the universal religion. We give a short abstract of the first article, in which the question at issue is well stated, and the way likewise in which it is to be answered. The real question, he says, between Christianity and unbelievers is not whether our religion is or is not supernatural; not whether Christ's miracles were or were not violations of law; nor whether the New Testament, as it stands, is the work of inspired men. The main question at the back of all these, is different, and not dependent on the views we happen to take of the universality of law. It is this. Is Christianity, as taught by Jesus, intended by God to be the religion of the human race? Is it only one among natural religions? Is it to be superseded in its turn by others, or is it the one religion which is to unite all mankind? The evidential controversy is thus shifted from a merely speculative ground to a basis of fact. The old apologists tried to show that Christianity was a necessity by disparaging all other religions. Judaism and Christianity were revealed, every faith besides was invented. The former were wholly true, the latter wholly false, and tended to make men sensual, cruel, and degraded. They were superstitions of the worst sort, having their origin in ignorance and wilful fraud. These views, which were generally entertained in the last century, and even in the first part of this, naturally produced a reaction, and heathenism has now its renaissance. The Vedas are talked about as though they were superior to the Old Testament, and Confucius is thought a little better than Paul or John. What is wanted now is a candid comparison of ethnic, or race religions with Christianity. It is only within a few years that we have had the means for such comparison. Dr. Clarke believes that this will prove that most of the religions of the world are religions of races, while Christianity is the only Catholic religion. None of the former has really made converts to any extent outside of original race lines, whereas Christianity has made converts among all races. Then these ethnic religions are one-sided, each containing a truth of its own, but each defective, wanting some corresponding truth; Christianity alone is complete on every side. Brahminism, for instance, is complete on the spiritual side, but totally blank on the material side; it has spirituality but no morality; God, but nothing else. Buddhism has man, but no God; earth with no heaven but vacancy; exemplary virtues, but no spirituality. The religion of China is all retrospect, no prospect; all veneration for ancestors, but no hope for posterity; all routine and drill, but no spontaneity; all morality, but no spirituality, and no God; all worldly order and comfort, but no heaven; so it inspires no progress, gives nothing for men to live for, and the nation has stood still for three thousand years, and its people commit suicide on the least provocation. The religion of Persia is a battle between good and evil, and, like all conflicts, fights itself out at last, and falls from sheer exhaustion. The religion of Egypt was a deification of the vital force, the Divine principle in nature; and that of Greece was a glorification of the fair humanities—God as manifested in man. Christianity is the catholic, the universal religion, because it takes up all these elements, and represents in one grand, harmonious whole all these separate strands of truth. And, finally, while all these ethnic religions are self-limited and all come to an end or degenerate, Christianity alone is capable of progress, development and unlimited adaptations. But this, of course, pre-supposes that Christianity is not a system, but a life, not a creed or a form, but a spirit.

The design has been formed in Philadelphia to bring the remains of William Penn from England to Pennsylvania, and to erect a splendid monument over them.

A Jewish writer in the Cincinnati Israelite argues in favour of making Sunday the day of rest, in conformity with the custom of other religions. He declares himself to be the "selected spokesman of a respectable and highly intelligent party" in his Church.

Dr. Ellis, with whom some of our readers must have become acquainted on his visit to this country a number of years ago, has felt himself obliged, to the regret of his congregation, to resign the charge of the Harvard Church, in Charlestown, Massachusetts, to which he has ministered with great acceptance and success for twenty-nine years.

The Nation says:

"Few Catholics in this country (the United States), whether rich or poor, are Republicans, and few 'advanced' Protestants are ever Democrats. In the case of the Auburn troubles between Bishop McQuaid and the refractory congregation, we see what is not now seen for the first time in the history of Irish Catholicism: the certain degree of liberalism, of practical political protestantism, which has been acquired by the men who turned Father Kavanagh out of the Church and 'persuaded the Bishop to retire,' after informing him that they were determined to have a priest of their own choosing, and 'to submit no longer to the one-man power,' is assuredly making bad Catholics of them."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

TOO MANY BOOKS.

I WOULD that we were only readers now,
And wrote no more, or in rare heats of soul
Sweated out thoughts when the o'erburdened brow
Was powerless to control.

Then would all future books be small and few,
And, freed of dross, the soul's refined gold;
So should we have a chance to read the new,
Yet not forego the old.

But as it is, Lord help us in this flood
Of daily papers, books, and magazines!
We scramble blind as reptiles in the mud,
And know not what it means.

Is it the myriad spawn of vagrant tides,
Whose growth would overwhelm both sea and shore,

Yet, after necessary loss, provides Sufficient and no more?

Is it the broadcast sowing of the seeds,
And from the stones, the thorns, and fertile soil,
Only enough to serve the world's great needs
Rewards the sower's toil?

Is it all needed for the varied mind?
Gives not the teeming press a book too much—
Not one but in its dense neglect shall find
Some needful heart to touch?

Ah, who can say that e'en this blade of grass
No mission has—superfluous as it looks?
Then wherefore feel oppressed and cry, alas!
There are too many books?

R. LEIGHTON.

SHARP CONTRASTS IN EGYPT.

THE visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to the Nile valley leads the Guardian into the following train of reflections: The aspect of every-day life is itself sufficient to attract the attention of the Western traveller. For he has come into the Eastern world and everything is new to him, while the pleasure of its novelty is all the more enhanced if he remembers that it still reflects the unchanged image of the most remote antiquity. The brown, half-naked fellows working on the bank, the files of women shrouded in dark-blue cloaks, bearing their water-jars on their heads and their infants astride on their hips, the solemn processions of laden camels, the creaking water-wheels emptying their buckets with slow labour into the little water-courses that irrigate the fields, are but reproductions of the pictures painted in the tombs which line the valley thousands of years ago, and present to the gaze of the modern traveller the same scenes which were presented to Moses or Joseph or Abraham. But if the face of nature and the life of the peasant are unaltered, there are other sights to be seen on the banks of the Nile which tell of vast revolutions in kings and kingdoms, in philosophies and religions. Fallen statues, buried obelisks, and ruined halls, strange in their figures and gigantic in their proportions, recall an ancient grandeur and a vanished civilisation very different from that which the present ruler of Egypt is striving to impose upon his reluctant subjects. These, even in their ruins, are the glory and attraction of the country, and draw to it travellers and students from all lands; and these, of course, the Prince and Princess of Wales saw with a perfection and a facility which does not fall to the lot of other sight-seers.

The passage up the Nile is in some respects a passage down the stream of history. When the Royal party visited the pyramids of Djizeh, they beheld the memorials of the earliest dynasties in the obscurest depths of Egyptology. When they landed at Denderah or Edfou they saw for the most part buildings which only recalled the rule of foreign conquerors, of Grecian Ptolemies or Roman Cæsars. But when they spent three well-employed days amid the mighty remains of Thebes, they contemplated works which belonged to an intervening period, in which Egypt reached its highest point of power and magnificence. Long after the time of the first Pyramid-builders, but long before the conquests of Cambyyses and Alexander, a powerful dynasty fixed its seat in Thebes, the No-Amon, situate among the "rivers" of the Hebrew prophet, the city known to Homer as the City of a Hundred Gates, or rather Temple Porches. Chief among this dynasty was Rameses II., whose fame, under his Greek name of Sesostris, overshadows all early history as his enormous granite statue originally overshadowed all his city. His city is deserted, his palaces fallen, his columns broken, his very statue scooped out to make Egyptian millstones; but the sands of the desert have at once hidden and preserved the wonderful fragments, and Luxor and Karnak and the Valleys of the Tombs of the kings and priests who dwelt there still maintain an irrefragable testimony to the greatness of the race who reared and ornamented and occupied them. These columned halls had doubtless witnessed many a splendid ceremonial in the days of their conquering Pharaohs: they ministered to a very different spectacle under very different auspices when they were lit up the other day by the most brilliant agent which modern science has yet discovered for the benefit of a Prince and Princess of a Northern island, whose very existence was unsuspected by their former lords. Never was the contrast of ancient and modern civilization brought out more sharply. The land which formed the first cradle of art and science was visited by the royal representatives of the race which claims a place in the vanguard of the latest progress. Three thousand years separated the life of the one from the life of the other. The old dominion and civilisation had perished utterly, and one altogether new and strange had come in its place. A Western world had arisen as the Eastern fell, and shaped to itself a new life out of the materials furnished by that which went before it. And now, after so long an interval, the two were brought face to face. The changes wrought by the lapse of centuries were sensibly exhibited when the ruined columns of Karnak were illuminated by magnesium wire. They were perhaps even more intimately, if less strikingly, displayed when the prayers of the Church of England were read by the Prince of Wales two days before upon the waters of the Nile. How vast the interval which separates the infancy of the world from its maturity, how long the chain which connects the worship of the Pharaohs with our modern Western Christianity!

AN OLD PREACHER.

IN an interesting article on preachers and preaching, Blackwood gives us a curious account of Father André, familiarly called "Le Petit," who was a friar of the order of Reformed Augustines that preached during many Advents and Lents before Louis XIII. and XIV. He was a jester by nature, and used his talent in a fashion which is certainly startling to the sober taste of a modern congregation. But if the opinion of those critics who were nearly his contemporaries is to be trusted, he was much more than a mere jester. "He did not always make those laugh who listened to him (says Gueret); he spoke truths which sent bishops back to their dioceses and made many a coquette blush. He had the art of biting while he smiled." Far from priding himself upon the laugh which he sometimes raised when in the pulpit, he punished himself for such indulgence of his natural humour by corporal "discipline," and his private life was in all respects that of a devout and austere Churchman. A writer, who speaks of having been often present at his sermons, declares that he himself had never heard the preacher indulge in any of those buffooneries with which he was commonly credited; and it is very possible that many current anecdotes of his eccentricities have as little foundation in fact as some which are told of a well-known modern preacher. Some of the best attested show that the Little Father's jests must often have been carefully-planted home-thrusts to his auditors. Preaching on the casting out of the devil which was dumb—"Know you, brethren, what a dumb devil is? I will tell you; it is a lawyer at the feet of his confessor. In court, these gentlemen chatter like pies; but at the confessional, devil a word can one draw out of them—damonium mutum—a dumb devil indeed." Preaching before M. De Péréfixe, Archbishop of Paris, he saw the prelate asleep; he called out loudly to the Suisse on duty, "Shut the doors! the shepherd is asleep; the sheep will get out. To whom am I to preach the word of God?" The Archbishop was very soon awake, and remained so to the end of the sermon. André had no liking for the Jesuits. He was requested on one occasion by them to deliver the usual panegyric on their founder. He complied, and in the course of his oration introduced an imaginary dialogue, in which St. Ignatius asked of Heaven a locality for the operations of his new order. "But, where to place you? The deserts have been assigned to St. Benedict and St. Bruno; St. Bernard occupies the valleys, St. Francis the country towns. Where are you to be quartered?" "Ah! master (replied the saint), put us only in some place where there is something to get—in the large towns, for example—and trust us to do the rest." Nor does André seem to have had a very high opinion of the monastic orders in general. From the pulpit of a monastery which had lately been struck with lightning, he returned thanks to heaven, which always "took such care of its own." "Do we need further proof (said he) than what has just happened to this pious house in which I am preaching? The lightning fell on the library, and consumed it, without hurting a single monk. Had it unhappily struck the refectory, what numbers would have been killed! Mon Dieu! what would have been the desolation?"

PILFERING A SERMON.

THE enterprise of newspaper reporters at Washington has always been famous. The following story was told lately in the "Correspondents' Club," which has been formed in that city:—At the funeral of the late General Baker, which was held in the White House, the correspondent of a New York journal, unable to get a ticket of admission, got down through a coal-hole, and after groping his way reached at last the East Room, directly in the rear of the officiating clergyman. While the clergyman was engaged in prayer, the reporter observed a roll of paper in his hat. To seize it and fly was the work of a moment. When the clergyman turned to find his sermon he found it not. He attempted to deliver his remarks from memory, but made a wretched failure of it, much to the astonishment of the dignitaries who were present. The next morning he had the satisfaction of reading his discourse in the New York Herald.

INTELLIGENCE

BOLTON.—We understand that at a private meeting of a few members of the Bank-street congregation, lately held at the house of one of their number, it was resolved immediately to purchase the old property which stands in front of the chapel, so as to open it to public view. A sum more than sufficient for the purpose was subscribed by the gentlemen present; and the fact that the premises had been already bought was made known at a soirée of the congregation, held on Thursday, the 4th inst. At the soirée,—which was presided over by Mr. Joseph Crook, formerly M.P. for the borough—a small committee was appointed to select a site for the erection of new day and Sunday schools, and report to a meeting of the congregation.

Several speeches were made in favour of the project of building schools, and the Rev. Jeffery Worthington urged the congregation vigorously to carry forward the movement which had now been so successfully inaugurated.—We believe that the dilapidated property in front of the chapel has been bought for £1,100, and that it adjoins the building not long ago purchased by the late Mr. Alderman Heywood at a cost of £500.

CHATHAM.—The Chatham News of the 20th inst. has the following, relative to the death of T. W. Wood, Esq., an old and respected member of the congregation:—We regret to have to announce the death of Mr. Thomas William Wood, a well-known townsman, who had long taken a considerable part in local affairs. Mr. Wood had been ailing for a considerable period, having attained a ripe age. He died, suddenly, on Saturday last, at his residence in Luton-road, at the age of seventy-one. He was for many years a member of the Chatham Board of Health and of the Medway Board of Guardians, from which posts he retired at a comparatively recent period. His remains were interred in the burial-ground attached to Hamond Hill Chapel. The pastor of the chapel, the Rev. A. Lunn, read the funeral service. The whole ceremony was most impressive.

MANCHESTER: LOWER MOSLEY-STREET SCHOOLS. On Monday evening last, the thirty-third annual meeting of these schools was held in one of the schoolrooms, when the Rev. James Drummond, B.A., presided. Dr. Marcus read the annual report. In 1868 the number of scholars in the boys' school was 419, and the attendance 83.6 per cent.; in 1867 the numbers were 415, and 83 per cent. Of 323 pupils present at the examination in November last, 97.8 per cent. passed. The attendance out of 177 girls in 1868 had been 76.5 per cent., against 78 per cent. out of 160 in 1867. At the examination 98 per cent. out of 104 present passed. In the infants' school, out of 280 on the books the average attendance had been 77.1, and at the examination 96.3 passed out of 137 present; against 299 and 73.5 per cent. in 1867. In the Sunday schools there were on the books in 1867 543 boys and girls, and in 1868, 532. The average attendance in 1868 was—morning 254, afternoon 413; in 1867 the attendance was 256 and 432. The number of boys over 16 was 159, of girls 60. The report briefly noticed the various connected institutions, and was unanimously adopted. A letter was read from Mr. Richard Aspden, resigning the trusteeship of the schools. Considerable regret was expressed at this intimation, and a resolution was passed requesting him to reconsider his decision. The committee and officers were then appointed.

PERTH.—"Inquirer," having attended a number of lectures delivered in this town by the Rev. H. Williamson, on Unitarian Christianity, writes to the Dundee Advertiser to ask whether it will be necessary to discontinue them for want of a public hall. After mentioning that the use of several rooms had been refused, he says:—"Seeing that more than half the time at these lectures is occupied in hearing and answering objections to the views advanced by the lecturer, it seems to me that the people here have resolved that the most effectual means to prevent the spread of Unitarianism will be to shut our halls against it." He trusts that such is not the case, and that an opportunity will yet be afforded of meeting Mr. Williamson, and reasoning the matter out with him.

THE OPEN-CHURCH SYSTEM.

To the Editors.—I have carefully read Mr. Brooke Herford's papers in the Herald, advocating the free-seat system and voluntary contributions. I visited Mr. Herford's chapel some few months since, and I own to being rather disappointed to find that the offertory money was collected from the congregation. I had imagined previously that there would be a provision made near the doors, in going in or coming out, for people to voluntarily contribute their offerings. There is to my mind in all cases just a little pressure exercised upon the individual if you send the collecting boxes or bags round from pew to pew, which is entirely obviated by allowing the congregation to contribute as they pass from the chapel. It may be said that this plan would not pay—perhaps it would not,—of that I cannot positively speak; but if it failed, it would certainly prove that the present system is not quite voluntary.

At present the jingle of money, the six or seven gentlemen each with their scarlet bags, the deposition of said bags upon the steps of the dais, and the keeping watch and ward each over his particular bag until the conclusion of the service, has a tendency to divert the mind from the final prayer and things sacred generally.

Wishing to offend no one, and fully appreciating the advantages of the free-seat system, I have offered these few remarks, being impelled by a deeply-rooted horror of the perambulatory mode of making collections.—Remaining, sir, respectfully yours,
J. H. JACKSON.

Stockton-on-Tees, March, 1869.

[The box-at-the-door plan fails, not because it leaves the giving to people's free-will, but because it leaves it to their memory. As a fact, more people can see whether anything is given when the box is put up or held at the door than when the Offertory bag is passed from hand to hand. The Offertory succeeds not because it compels any one to give, but because it keeps fairly before alike our own people and strangers the idea which we have deliberately adopted, that giving should be a part of religious service, distinctly provided for with the rest of the worship. The question whether at any particular church the collecting of the Offertory is carried out as quietly as is desirable, is one which obviously cannot be discussed here. But surely the very plan to which our correspondent objects—the collectors (as soon as they have laid their bags on the steps in front of the communion table) sitting down together in the communion seat, certainly not with any idea of keeping "watch and word,"—is a step in the direction of the quietness he desires, obviating their having to return to their several places, some of them in the furthest parts of the chapel. Whether the Offertory has any necessary tendency to interfere with devotion must be judged, not by the impression of a casual visit—a Quaker visitor would say just the same of a hymn or anthem—but by the general spirit of the worship, as felt by those who have adopted it.—B. H.]

SIMULTANEOUS COLLECTIONS.

To the Editors.—Will you give me space to explain to such of your readers as may be interested in the matter how it is that no advertisement appears in your columns announcing simultaneous sermons on behalf of the East Cheshire Christian Union for Missionary Purposes, as is the case in regard to other similar associations. The fact is that the day chosen for such sermons happens this year to be Easter Sunday, a day on which in East Cheshire, if not in other parts of the country, the congregations are very small; and as our funds are not super-abundant, and we are asking increased subscriptions from the various churches, we really could not afford to have our sermons on Sunday next. In our case, therefore, each congregation will choose that Sunday in the next two months which may be most convenient to it.

If I remember right, Easter Sunday fell on the fourth Sunday in March in 1864; and I should like to submit to the committees of other Missionary Associations whether it would not be advisable to go back to the Sunday previously chosen for the simultaneous collections, viz., the second in March, since on that day the present inconvenience would not occur.—Yours truly, ALFRED PAYNE.

Wilmslow, March 23, 1869.

AN APPEAL FOR THE IRISH CHURCH.

To the Editors.—About a quarter of a century ago the Unitarians were in expectation of being deprived of a large number of their chapels on the plea that they had been originally founded by orthodox Presbyterians and ought never to have been devoted to Unitarian uses. The state of the law at that time would have favoured this injustice; but happily the legislature in those days did not approve of robbing the religion of a minority, and an act was passed to preserve our rights in our own places of worship.

Will Unitarians now lend their support to the Government in confiscating the endowments granted to the Irish Church before 1660—or even before the Reformation—on no other plea than that that Church once held a different theology from what it does now, and that its religion is that of a minority?—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,
JAMES GAEDNER.

78, Delancey-street, London, N.W.,
22nd March, 1869.

[The "confiscation" took place when the religious property of the Irish people was apportioned to a small reformed minority. Unitarians gladly help to rectify this great injustice.—Eds. U. H.]

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Miss Carpenter has been dangerously ill of inflammation of the lungs in India, but we are happy to say that telegrams have been received stating that she is better, and we trust that she will still be spared to continue her truly benevolent and Christian work.

"A Christian church" is to be erected at Nazareth. The estimated cost is £2,000, and £1,820 has been received.

A new Protestant church has been opened at Madrid, and the service is exceedingly well attended.

It is stated that the Jesuits are making great efforts in favour of the Republican party in Spain, as they believe their success would lead eventually to the restoration of the old rejected dynasty. Of course, in their view, the troubles which would first have to be gone through are nothing in comparison with the interests of their Church.

The Prussian journals state that a Protestant jubilee is to be held next autumn at Berlin, to form a counterpoise to the Council to assemble at Rome. A preparatory meeting is to take place at Worms after Whitsuntide.

In a letter on "Religion and the Church in Prussia," the Berlin correspondent of the Times says a hymn recently forced by the Minister of Ecclesiastical and Educational Affairs upon the Protestant congregations runs thus:

"Almighty God, I am content to remain the dog I am. I am a dog, a despicable dog. I am conscious of revelling in sin, and there is no infamy in which I do not indulge. My anger and quarrelling are like a dog's. My envy and hatred are like a dog's. My abuse and snappishness are like a dog's. My robbing and devouring are like a dog's. Nay, when I come to reflect upon it, I cannot but own that in very many things I have behaved worse than the dogs themselves."

And this specimen of its contents is by no means the worst that might be cited. There are some, in fact, too gross to be reprinted. It was only when some of the congregations so treated by the minister threatened to give up church-going altogether that the book was withdrawn in their case. Others, more indifferent to what they are made to sing, continue to assert their canine propensities in the sacred edifice. The same writer tells us that dogmatism is increasing in the Church and scepticism in the closet.

Professor Ewald who, as we mentioned a short time ago, was prosecuted by the Prussian government for treason and acquitted, having been charged with the same offence before a higher tribunal, has again, we are glad to say, been acquitted.

Pope Pius IX. invites all "Christian mothers and daughters of Mary" to form a league against the doing up of chignons, and the arranging of tresses several times a day, which occupies the time that should be devoted to religious duties, pious works, and family affairs.

Breach-loaders seem a favourite present to the Pope. Cardinal Mathieu, Archbishop of Besançon, has just brought a considerable addition to those which his Holiness had had given him before.

The Marquis de Banneville and Cardinal Antonelli have been discussing the question of the prerogatives to be ceded to the representatives of Catholic sovereigns at the Council. The conferences have not yet resulted in any decision, but Cardinal Antonelli asserts the principle that ecclesiastical representatives of royalty shall be allowed to take part in the debates, but that this privilege shall not attach to lay representatives, and he pertinently demanded of the Marquis whether, as the debates are to be carried on in Latin, he knew any laymen who were qualified for the task.

Baron Lionel de Rothschild laid the foundation-stone the other day of a synagogue at the West-end of London, which is to cost £24,000. In his speech on the occasion he spoke of "the greatly increasing numbers" of the Jews there, and boasted of the intellectual, social, commercial, and political position of his race; but he expressed a hope that these engagements would not withdraw them from "the duties of their holy religion." Although this was not distinctly stated, we gather from the proceedings that he and his co-religionists still look for a Messiah to come.

Mr. Lowder, the incumbent of St. Peter (St. George's-in-the-East), who, at the meeting of the English Church Union, declared that he should disregard the injunctions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, consumed about three hours of the afternoon of Good Friday in perambulating the parish at the head of a procession, consisting of choristers, clergy, and others, and preceded by a gentleman, who held on high a gold cross veiled. At the corner of Worcester-street Mr. Lowder addressed the people, and said they were going through the painful stages and stations of the way of the Cross. Of the first he had spoken in the courtyard before they started. The second was when Christ received his Cross and when he was condemned to death. On this he delivered an impassioned address, in which he showed how every disciple of Christ received his cross in the world. The procession then re-formed, the choristers and sympathisers with the movement singing the hymn, "Jesus, refuge of the weary." At the next halt, Mr. Lowder said the third station was that in which Christ fell under the weight of the Cross. On this he preached with great fervour, showing how men were continually falling through sin and temptation. Then another movement was made, the hymn "Oh, come and mourn with me awhile," being sung. In Tench-street, Mr. Lowder said the fourth station was when Christ was met by his mother as he was coming out of Jerusalem. On this he founded an energetic appeal to mothers, of whom there were at least a hundred before him with babies in their arms. Near Wapping Church, he delivered an address on the fifth station, in which the Cross was laid upon Simon of Cyrene. Christ had fallen down under its weight, and his cruel persecutors, rather than lose the sight of his death, made a poor countryman bear it. The influence of the Cross penetrated his heart, and on this Mr. Lowder founded his instruction. The next halt he likewise made the fifth station, as that on which the women, coming out from the crowd, and seeing the sad face of Jesus and his exhausted state, gave him a cloth to wipe his face. It had been said that the impression of his face was made upon that cloth. (We wonder he didn't inform them that it was to be seen in Rome.) At the sixth station, he spoke of Jesus falling a second time; at the eighth, of the women weeping for him; at the ninth, of his falling a third time; at the tenth, of his being stripped of his garments; at the eleventh, of his being nailed to the cross; at the twelfth, of his death upon it; and at the thirteenth, of his being taken down from it. The hymn "Rock of Ages, cleft for me," was then sung. And in the churchyard to which the procession returned, Mr. Lowder spoke on Christ being taken to the grave as the fourteenth stage; and he then concluded the extraordinary proceedings by pronouncing the benediction.

In an article on the "Sermon Trade," the Guardian makes the following announcement:

"For our own part, we have determined not to lend our advertising columns to a system which we are unable to defend; we will at least practise—at a loss to ourselves—what we preach. A new periodical, devoted to the homiletical traffic, is announced in a 'private' circular, of which copies have been sent to us. The only wish we can in conscience bestow on it is a cordial wish that it may not succeed."

Miss Saurin has filed a bill in Chancery against the whole of the nuns in the Hull Convent, with the view of compelling a distribution of its property. This, unless it should be absorbed in the expenses of the suit, would probably put her in possession of the £300 which she paid into the Dublin Convent, and which was awarded to her in the recent trial.

A large committee has been formed for the purpose of endowing a bishopric in Madagascar, and for providing additional clergy in that island.

It appears that there are still living a few persons who can remember having seen and heard the founder of Methodism. One such person died a few days since in Manchester. She was the widow of the Rev. Jonathan Crowther, one of Mr. Wesley's preachers, and was in her ninety-sixth year, having retained her position as a class-leader till past ninety. Mrs. Crowther received her first ticket of membership from Mr. Wesley himself in the year 1790.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Duke of Argyll, in his speech on laying the foundation stone of a new Presbyterian church in the Camden-road, last week, remarked with pleasure, the rapid multiplication of churches of all denominations in London. He rejoiced in the fact, for though he was a Presbyterian, he did not believe in the Divine right of any one form of Church Government. There was, however, one fact observed in all London congregations, alike of the Established and Dissenting Churches, which could not be too much deplored, namely, the total absence of the working classes properly so called.

This was a most deplorable fact in the congregational statistics of London, and a striking contrast to the state of matters north of the Tweed. If there was one peculiarity of Scotland more remarkable than another it was the universal attendance of the working classes in the parish churches.

Under the heading "Fearful Teaching by a Bishop" the Church News reports that at a confirmation at St. Nicholas, Durham, last week, the Bishop (Baring), addressing the newly-confirmed, warned them against the doctrine that "Christ himself was really, though invisibly, present in the bread and wine. If you fancy in taking the bread into your hands you are taking Christ's Body, and in taking the cup in your hands you are taking His Blood, then you are lowering awfully all sense of what is true, and you will be clinging to form when you need most your soul's strength." There were 500 children present, among them children from St. Oswald's, Dr. Dyke's parish. The Bishop made no allusion to the Sacrament just received, save to say that in it they had come to "confirm" their own vows. To this report the Church News appends the Psalmist's words, "How long, O Lord, how long!"

According to the Morning Advertiser, the Rev. C. C. Layard, incumbent of Sudbury, in the parish of Harrow, has stated publicly to his congregation that the Duke of Genoa is about to be admitted to Harrow School, and that, being a Roman Catholic, he is to be excused chapel. Mr. Layard is fearful lest this step, while it will deprive the inhabitants of Harrow and its suburbs of their legal rights, and ruin their property, "may endanger the faith of our Protestant youth and future legislators," and he suggests that the inhabitants should make a representation to the Public Schools Commissioners on the subject.

In the debate on the Irish Church Bill, the Chancellor of the Exchequer thus expressed himself:

"I cannot, I think, state my case in fewer or better words than those of Swift, which have to my mind at this moment peculiar force: 'If God be the sole Lord of conscience, why should the rights of conscience be subject to human judgment?' The time has come, I hope, when we shall give up not only the idea of persecution, but the language of toleration; when we shall come to admit that one man's faith is not a thing to be tolerated by another, but to be respected; when we shall not impose penalties or confer bounties on any particular sect; when we shall obliterate from the statute-book, as well as from our minds, any notion of social or other inferiority attaching to a man's religious belief. Let it be free to every man to choose his own creed and to walk in it. There is no doubt, notwithstanding what has been said by the right hon. gentleman the member for Bucks, that a man may obtain such certainty as may be a guide to him through his life and a comfort to him at the hour of his death; but let us at once give up the notion that we can establish any objective certainty in religion, such as the State would be justified in enforcing by penalty or otherwise."

Of Mr. Disraeli's speech in the same debate the Guardian says:

"It wanted from beginning to end the force of strong conviction and earnest feeling, and, wanting this, failed to cope with the real question at issue. Here is a change proposed, vast in the sweep and elevation of the interests with which it deals, certain to be injurious in some of its consequences and to produce a wide-spread sense of hardship, and making a great, trying, but by no means impossible demand on the members of the religious body which it would disestablish—on the depth and vigour of their religious faith and sentiment, on their judgment, and capacity for organisation. There are strong reasons against such a change; there are strong reasons in its favour: if the latter preponderate, the scheme itself is certainly coherent, fair we think in the main, and in its application of the principle of religious liberty courageous and consistent. A leader of a great party, who undertakes to resist such a proposal, should grapple with it face to face and with a strong hand; and this is not done by sententious but superficial oratory on the value of Church Establishments (which under some circumstances no one disputes, under others no one would uphold), by criticisms of detail, or by attempts to represent the difficulties of voluntary organisation as greater than they really are and the measure as an invasion (which it is not) of the principle of private property. The tone of the speech was not that of a man engaged in a real struggle."

The Pall Mall thinks—

"It is worthy of notice that Mr. Walpole and the Dean of Westminster—both staunch supporters of establishments—defend their common thesis on contradictory grounds. The Royal supremacy, says Mr. Walpole, is the only guarantee for theological exclusiveness—it keeps out Ritualism and Rationalism, The Royal supremacy, says the Dean of Westminster, is the only guarantee for theological comprehension; without it neither Ritualism nor Rationalism would be able to hold their ground in the Church of England. We may leave the two advocates to determine which theory is the true one."

In a letter to the Times, "An American in London" disposes, in a very satisfactory manner, of Dr. Ball's attempt to show the failure of the voluntary system by a reference to America. He says:

"I do not say that my countrymen are as religious as they ought to be, nor that the voluntary system has been found in our experience to be without defects; I say that my countrymen are a religious people, and that the voluntary system has been successful among us, whatever may be its merits for the rest of the world. Our institutions and our laws have their moral basis, like yours, in the Christian religion, and I do not doubt that our church accommodation and our support of the teachers of religion will compare favourably with church accommodation and support anywhere in the world."

He then confirms this statement by the number and magnificence of the churches which his countrymen have built, by the salaries paid to ministers compared with those which are given here, and by the growing numbers and influence of all the great denominations of the United States. As an instance of the efficiency of the voluntary system, he thus refers to a congregation with which he himself is connected:

"It was organised twenty years ago, and though embracing a good many people in the more favoured conditions of life, has never been distinguished for wealth. It has built a church which has cost about 80,000 dollars, and a chapel as a sort of mission-station in a destitute neighbourhood, besides contributing the chief sums for building two others. It pays the pastor, a young man of thirty years, 5,000 dollars per year, and supports a missionary assistant. When its late pastor was laid aside by ill-health, it gave him 25,000 dollars for the comfort of his declining years. It has endowed a university professorship, which bears its name. It has been a large contributor to foreign missions, to missions in our great West, to local city missions, to Bible and tract and education societies, and to every form of charity which helps the poor, the sick, the widow, and the fatherless. It was never so prosperous as now, and it is not singular among American churches."

"One behind the Scenes" sends the following story to the Rock; but of course none save Rockites or Recordites would think for a moment of believing it:

"Six weeks ago I made the acquaintance of a lady to whom the secret was revealed by Dr. Pusey's college chum, a Jesuit priest. Twenty years ago she was residing for some time in Austria; the house she occupied was the property of a community of nuns, to whom it was given by the Emperor; the Jesuit was the director of the convent, to whom she paid the rent of the house every month. He thus became a constant visitor; he was a clever, agreeable man, and a good musician; he believed the lady to be a Roman Catholic, and, anxious for the conversion of England, he informed her that his Society were doing a glorious work there; that some of their members had got into Oxford, and one of their cleverest men was the leading man there, and had been educated in the same college he was in Rome. The lady asked his name; he said 'Pusey.' Some days after he asked her where she went to mass, as he had never observed her. She said, 'But I am a Protestant;' upon which he became deadly white, and said, 'Oh, what a revelation I have made!'"

In the address which Mr. Froude delivered upon his installation as Rector of St. Andrew's University, after pleading for the good old method of teaching boys to "read their Bibles, fear God, and be ashamed to do wrong," he referred to the bad effects of some of our present methods of instruction. He said:

"We have false weights, false measures, cheating, and shoddy every where. Yet the clergy have seen all this grow up in absolute indifference; and the great question which is at this moment agitating the Church of England is the colour of the ecclesiastical petticoats. Many hundred sermons have I heard in England, many a dissertation on the mysteries of the faith, on the Divine mission of the clergy, on apostolical succession, on bishops, and justification, and the theory of good works, and verbal inspiration, and the efficacy of the sacraments; but never during these thirty wonderful years—never one that I can recollect on common honesty or those primitive commandments—Thou shalt not lie, and thou shalt not steal."

And he concluded with these weighty counsels:

"To any one who holds what are called the 'advanced views' on serious subjects I recommend a patient reticence, and the reflection that, after all, he may possibly be wrong. I tell you who take up with plausibilities not to trust your weight too far upon them, and not to condemn others for having misgivings which at the bottom of your own minds, if you look so deep, you will find that you share yourselves with them. You who believe that you have hold of newer and wider truths show it, as you may and must show it, unless you are misled by your own dreams, in leading wider, simpler, and nobler lives. Assert your own freedom if you will, but assert it modestly and quietly, respecting others as you wish to be respected yourselves. Only, and especially, I would say this: be honest with yourselves, whatever the temptation; say nothing to others that you do not think, and play no tricks with your own minds. Of all the evil spirits abroad at this hour in the world humbug is the most dangerous."

Wesley, in his Journal, makes a remark on the treatment of Roman Catholics which some of his followers might profitably ponder at present:

"Nor is it any wonder that those who are born Papists generally live and die such when the Protestants can find no better ways to convert them than penal laws and acts of Parliament. The chief perplexities which Ireland has occasioned to the empire are to be traced to this neglect; and the dangers which have often sprung up to the State from that quarter have been, and continue to be, its appropriate punishment."

In his sermon at Moorfields on Sunday, Archbishop Manning referred at great length to the doctrine of the Real Presence, in which, he said, all within the pale of the holy Catholic and Roman Church implicitly believed. And their frequent communion gave them a consciousness of that presence; while others without the unity of the Church were still in the twilight of doubt and unbelief. Christ's presence on the altar was real, substantial, and personal. But why should the members of the Catholic Church find it difficult to believe in the Real Presence who had their Lord upon their altars, while a certain class without believed the same doctrines, and had Him not? These persons robed themselves in the vestments which the priests of the Church are robed in when they approach Him; they sang the same hymns as those used in the Catholic Church; they offered Him fragrance and all the homage of their hearts; but still they had Him not. He (the Archbishop) loved these people for the love they had for the shadow of our Lord. He would do anything to reconcile them, but would not depart from the truth to meet their views.

The Pall Mall says:

"It is to be hoped the Irish Church has not many friends like Sir Joseph Napier. At a Church defence meeting in Dublin the other day he said the measure of Mr. Gladstone 'bristled with iniquity.' 'He began with the property of the Church—so they did at the French Revolution.' They would soon raise a cry for the abbey lands and for the confiscated lands. The Church was the question of the priests, the land would be the question of the people. Let them ring their cry throughout the land in a great national peal, and tell their rulers their mind. He would call things by their right names, and say this conduct was gross and perfidious in Great Britain. 'But more; the Irish people were the victims of a political game, the victims of a set of political brigands.' The statement made during the debate that the Church Commission Report recommended that benefices should be suppressed where there were not more than forty Protestants, he characterised as utterly and scandalously untrue. The bishop was to have a rector and staff of curates to attend to these parishes after amalgamation. Before he would sign a report removing the light of the Gospel from dark places, he would burn his right arm to the stump. The hypocrisy of the Church Bill disgusted him. 'It had all the recklessness of the robber and the meanness of the thief.' If they were to perish, they would perish. If it were the will of God they should be a suffering Church, let it be so. But let them have one heart in their resistance. 'Before God and men let them record their solemn protestation against the wrong and the enormity of the measure, which seemed to be devised by those who neither feared God nor regarded men.'"

The Times admits many excuses for the gentlemen who indulge in extravagances such as Mr. Lowder's Good Friday procession. In most cases their motives are not only beyond exception, but worthy of praise. Mr. Lowder has the reputation of an earnest and energetic clergyman, and is said to have won his way, against many prejudices, into the respect of a very rough population. It is easy to understand that their very excellences betray such men in an East-end parish into offences against good taste and judgment. The circumstances they have to deal with are enough to drive them to despair. They are surrounded by a population on which their labour, learning, talents, piety seem almost thrown away. They are every day addressing people who hear without understanding and see without perceiving—people who just exist, and can do no more. Since they will not hear, they must be shouted at, and chanted at, and gesticulated at; and since they will not perceive, they must be startled into attention by processions and emblems, lights and banners, colours and odours. These are pleas which have been put forward for the Ritualist innovations, and their influence has been very extensive. Anything to create a sensation among people who seem insensate! Other parties have made a similar attempt by other means. Out-of-door preaching and preaching in theatres are expedients prompted by a like motive. Thoughtful persons, then, may abstain from speaking harshly of such proceedings as Mr. Lowder's, but they will none the less view them with regret and reprobation. There is something, indeed, to a sober mind almost revolting in this particular exhibition. There could not be a more extraordinary contrast than between the patience, the dignity, the reticence of the Gospels and the noisy parade of this Good Friday procession, with its sentimental exaggeration of physical sufferings. The reader who is content with his Bible will look in vain for Mr. Lowder's fourteen "stages," or, rather, stage situations; and it is something more than lamentable to hear of an English clergyman reproducing, for Good Friday instruction, the superstitious legend of the sacred handkerchief on which the Saviour's features were impressed.

In his recent speech, Dr. Ball quoted history to show that Mr. Gladstone was unjust in recognising no private endowments prior to 1660. It would have shown more judgment to have allowed the veil to remain undisturbed behind which lie the proceedings of Strafford who, by dint of bullying and tyrannizing, as his letters to Laud shew, made the two Churches of England and Ireland one. An extract from a petition presented to the Long Parliament, from the Irish Presbyterians, is instructive as to the kind of means that were employed. After enumerating the oppressions and cruelties which they had endured under Strafford's Government, it states that the bishops had taken possession of the best lands in every county, pretending that they were Church lands, "so that there is scarce a gentleman of any worth whom they have not bereaved of some part of his inheritance, few daring to oppose their unjust demands; and if they did, there is none able to maintain their titles against their power and oppression. By these ways have they ruined and undone many families, destroyed and cast away thousands of souls; and moreover in their own persons been a scandal to the Gospel, and a stumbling-block even unto the common enemy, by their swearing, cursing, Sabbath-breaking, &c."

SUNDAYS AND MONDAYS.

In a smart article with this heading, the Pall Mall, after describing the mutual estrangement which has come about between the clergy and the laity, considers that it hangs on the simple question of Sundays and Mondays. It says: "Every first day of the week brings about a sort of collision of life. It is the one day on which the parson rises earlier than usual, the one day on which his flock get an additional snooze. While the vicar is busy in his Sunday school, or giving a last touch to the peroration of his discourse, we common laymen are yawning and dawdling away the hour before church. It is only the inexorable cry of a spouse, at once punctual and devout, that whisks us away from the garden walk in time for the 'dearly beloved.' But that 'dearly beloved' is the great event of the parson's life. He is the hero of the occasion. Hundreds of people are looking at him, listening to him, rising when he rises, kneeling when he kneels. He is in the full tide of spiritual ecstasy while we are groaning over the hardness of the seats, fumbling for the hymn book, grumbling over the fifty verses of the second lesson. He passes from head to head of his discourse, by turns passionate, pathetic, persuasive, and through all this passion, pathos, persuasion, let us confess it, we are timing him. The one question in our minds, as he leans frenzied over the pulpit, is whether in his frenzy he will exceed the twenty minutes we allot him. The sermon itself, so sacred a thing in the parsonage, just hinted at and whispered over in a sort of solemn mystery, how ruthlessly we discuss it as we lounge home again, what mince-meat we make of its metaphors, what 'stuff' we pronounce its rhetoric! All that world, in fact, of seriousness, of exertion, of schools, of services, which makes up the parson's Sunday jostles oddly with the relaxation, the chat, the loiter of our own. The pet bit of Tennyson that mingles with the sunshine on the lawn, the favourite sonata that flings its light and brilliancy over the evening, the friends that drop idly in for the idlest and most luxurious of chats, the leisure, the refinement, the peaceful indolence of the twelve golden hours, are strange to the parson who flings himself down tired and breathless at the close of his 'work-day.' He is fretful, impatient, vexed at the imperturbable 'worldliness' of his hearers, physically tired out with the day's vexations, the incessant talk, the strained voice, the enthusiasm, the excitement. He is too tired to eat, and he rushes to bed too excited too sleep, and he rises with a 'parson's headache,' listless, pettish, 'Mondayish.'

As we meet him on Monday morning, fresh and vigorous with our own rest and refreshment, we wonder at the pale, nervous, unmanly, excitable creature, as he the day before wondered at us, at our calmness, our apathy, our worldliness. But the distinction prolongs itself through the week. Each day brings this difference of Sundays and Mondays to part us from the parson. As we shake hands in the street he is on his way to a meeting; so, we tell him, are we. But ours is a shareholders' meeting, stormy, uproarious, the chairman foaming at the mouth, the reporters in despair. We shout and stamp and foam with the best of them; we take the worth of our reduced dividends out of the outraged board of swindlers in front of us; and then, when all is over, we shake hands with the swindlers and laugh with the chairman over the noise and bluster. The parson is on his way to a clerical meeting. While we are stamping and shouting, he is sipping his tea at the rural deanery, and discussing with neighbouring rectors the missionary reports from Honolulu. Tea once over, the buzz of conversation is hushed. There is a rustling of Greek Testaments and a smart little discussion over the verse at which to begin. The rural dean translates carefully, neutrally, with a general loyalty to the authorised version. The discussion commences with little prefacey skirmishes over the force of enclitics. Safe men trench themselves in the question of tenses, and press heavily on giving due emphasis to the pronoun. The funny parson flavours the aridity of the discussion with a few pleasant quips, hallowed by the parentage of a bishop. The parson suspected of neology shrinks into silence beneath the quiet gaze of the rural dean. The parson suspected of too great a predilection for the world quotes with an air of research the texts to which the margin refers him. The one great object of public anxiety is to keep down the tall gaunt Calvinist in the corner. But the Calvinist will not be kept down. It is his one field-day. He has cleared his church, men avoid him in the street as they fly a pestilence; but once a month he can, and he will, bore a whole rural deanery. There is nothing for it but to turn on him a patristic rector. The fight waxes warm, thickens, spreads. The rural dean whispers peace and moderation in vain. But it is the fight of women and not of men. There is very little noise, no violence, only spiteful things said in the gentlest and quietest manner. It is amazing with what delicacy the advocate of the Fathers insinuates against his opponent the charge of the crassest ignorance, with what pitifulness and courtesy the Calvinist denies his foe the possession of one ray of spiritual light. The combat ends always abruptly, but always with a striking uniformity, as the proper moment arrives for departure. No one in little matters is more methodical than the parson. At precisely the minute before the appointed close the rural dean discovers that the editions of the disputants are different: his patristic friend has a Lachmann, his Calvinistic brother is relying on a Tischendorf. The whole battle collapses when the imperfect of the one takes the place of the aorist of the other—an immense discovery, made month after month, but at which every one grasps with a flutter of relief when it occurs at the exact moment for departure. The little group melts into the night, and the clerical meeting is at an end—a meeting infinitely futile to the world's understanding, but, in the mind of the Church, refreshing, intelligent. It is the question over again of Sundays and Mondays."

LITERARIA.

A New Testament, containing the Japanese and English versions in parallel columns, and edited by the American missionaries, is now in course of publication in Japan.

The fifth volume of Dr. Merle D'Aubigné's "History of the Reformation during the time of Calvin" has appeared, and is marked by the same descriptive power, but also by the somewhat partial view of the actors in the great drama of the sixteenth century, which characterise the preceding volumes.

We are glad to learn that Mr. Lecky, the author of the History of Rationalism, has completed his "History of Morals in Europe," and that it may very soon be looked for.

New editions of Dean Milman's "St. Paul's," and of Dean Stanley's "Westminster Abbey," are being printed; and no doubt some of the inaccuracies which were found in the first edition of the latter will be corrected.

"An Introduction to Scientific Chemistry" (Groom-bridge, Sons), for the use of schools and candidates for university matriculation examinations, has just been published by F. S. Barff, M.A., assistant to Dr. Williamson, Prof. of Chemistry in University College, London. The student who wishes to gain a sound knowledge of scientific chemistry will find in this book nearly all that he requires. M. Barff has solved the problem whether chemistry can be made a true means of mental training. His work, though confined to the matter of the London Matriculation Course, treats with clearness and precision all those knotty points of his subject which are wont to puzzle the young student. The manner of handling this is somewhat new. In the first part, elements and compounds are treated of without symbols, and with definite weights; the atomic theory is explained in the introduction to the second part, and symbols are then used when the learner is capable of understanding and deriving benefit from them. He is also provided with a test of his knowledge in questions appended to each chapter. Full instructions are given for the working out of such questions as require calculation, and the answers furnished. Candidates for the London matriculation will find all the questions given for the last five years, many of which are analysed, and the calculations fully worked out. We understand that this "Introduction" has been already adopted as a text-book in the classes of University College School, and is likely to be so at Eton, Rugby, and other large schools. Furnished with this and Dr. Roscoe's excellent work on the same subject, no student need now have any difficulty in obtaining a satisfactory acquaintance with the leading principles of the interesting branch of science of which they treat.

FRIDAY, APRIL 2, 1869.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION MEETING.

At the meeting at Bury, on Good Friday, there were present, during some part or other of the day, at least 1,000 persons. Supposing only half of these were bona fide Sunday-school teachers, there were brought together not fewer than 500 teachers from some fifty different schools. It will at once be perceived that here was a great opportunity of exercising a wide-spread influence on these very important institutions, of helping the labourers in a very arduous work, and uniting the hearts and sympathies of those who are ordinarily separated in their spheres of labour.

The first thought that arises from the contemplation of this great gathering is one of thankfulness. It must have been good for the teachers to be there. It was cheering to notice the hearty greetings that were exchanged, and to perceive how unity of work bound together the feelings of many who were personally strangers to each other. Mr. Dowson's sermon was worthy of the occasion, and the keynote which it sounded was found vibrating through the succeeding proceedings; while the final prayer, with which the assembly was dismissed, expressed the aspiration to which every heart must have responded. It was very noticeable that throughout the day every reminder of the great need for effort to reach the mass of ignorance and sin in our population which is yet untouched—as in the remarks of the President in the afternoon, and those of some of the speakers in the evening—was received with warmest sympathy. There was evident to the spectator a warmth of philanthropic feeling and an earnestness of purpose among those present which gave good promise for the success of their labours.

At the same time it must be confessed that with this pleasure is united some feeling of disappointment, when, on reviewing the proceedings, it is perceived how much talk to no purpose was the order of the day. How many sentences were uttered which would send back teachers to their work with a renewed spirit of self sacrifice? How many hints were given of practical value? How many influences were brought to bear which would check careless performance of the self-imposed duty, or renew the earnestness of those who were beginning to waver in the task? It would not be just to say such utterances were entirely absent, but it cannot be denied that they were few, compared with the number of speeches made. It would be well if every one who gets up to speak on such an occasion would remember how great a responsibility he undertakes, would be careful not to say a word that can be injurious, and above all, not to waste the time of the meeting by a single useless sentence. Some speakers showed by the disconnected and wearisome talk without any point that they uttered, and others by the length of time they took to express a single idea, that they had not troubled themselves to prepare for speaking. When a meeting only takes place once a year, every minute of it is precious, and those who will not exert themselves to use its minutes to the best advantage, had better be silent.

The exertions of the officers of the Association, and those of the Bury teachers, in preparing for the proceedings, deserve hearty recognition. But it may be respectfully suggested to the committee whether they cannot in future years improve the meeting, as regards its practical results, by a previous printing and circulation of the reports, so as to avoid the necessity of reading them, and by doing away with the formality of speeches at the business meeting from all the Delegates who may be present from other Associations, who would be much more in place, and who would give much more interest to the meeting if they were called up to give their opinion on the subject of conference in the evening. The spirited management of this district association, and its industrious work throughout the year, have made it one of the most important amongst us; the more reason is there that those to whose hands its interests are intrusted should ever be on the watch to carry out its purposes as fully and completely as possible.

With regard to the special subject which was discussed at the evening conference, "Examinations in Sunday schools," we cannot but regard with satisfaction the very decided expression of opinion which the meeting gave against any such scheme. Mr. JESSE PILCHER's moderate and thoughtful opening of the subject did not not blink its difficulties; and even those who argued for it, with one or two exceptions, seemed to feel some hesitation on the matter. We wish that the speech of Mr. GEORGE SMITH, of Lower Mosley-street Schools, probably the best teacher in the room, and the man most able to judge of the probable effects of examinations, had been given at an earlier stage of the meeting. For influencing the general feeling of the great body of teachers present, however, this was unnecessary, as the opinion was unmistakably manifested again and again. And what we rejoice at is that the condemnation of the proposition arose not from any shrinking from trouble, but from a deep consciousness that the movement for examinations is a move altogether in the wrong direction. The feeling evidently was that it ought to be the aim of our Sunday schools to reach the poorest, and that this scheme would infallibly tend to remove them even further from the poorest than they are at present.

THE COLLECTIONS LAST SUNDAY.

WE are sorry to hear from several places, and we fear it is true of others, that the wild wintry weather of last Sunday sadly spoiled the simultaneous collections for our various northern district Missionary Societies. The day was altered from the second Sunday in March to the fourth, in order to lessen the chance of unfavourable weather, but we are afraid it is "out of the frying-pan into the fire," for we have not only bad weather but also the day falling on Easter Sunday, which of itself was enough to throw the arrangement into confusion. This at any rate could not have happened on the original day, and we think on the whole that it may be best for that day to be resumed. It is early, it is true; but no later day can be fixed on that will to anything like the same extent meet the general convenience. Meanwhile we appeal to our readers not to let the Missions suffer for the absences of last Sunday. Let all those who were not present to give their contribution then, hand it over to their minister, who, they may be sure, will be thankful for even the smallest sums, which will enable him to give a better report of the day.

THE UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE anniversary meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will be held on Wednesday of Whitsun week, May 19th, at Unity Church, Islington. The Rev. James Martineau will be the preacher on the occasion, and the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, of Gee Cross, will lead the devotional service. The collation will take place as usual at the Crystal Palace, on the following Thursday, when the chair will be taken by W. J. Lam-yort, Esq., of Liverpool, president of the Association.

W. J. FOX.

ONE intimately acquainted with Mr. Fox sends us the following remarks respecting the article on "South Place, Finsbury," which we published a fortnight ago, and in which reference was made to his earlier opinions that are thought to need a little elucidation:

"With regard to the first paragraph in the article, respecting Mr. Vidler, it was not, I believe, so much on account of his embracing Unitarian opinions that his congregation fell off, as from his identifying himself with the Free-Thinkers, Messrs. Thompson, Coates, Fearon, Teulon, and others, from whom 'Presbyterian stiffness' stood aloof.

"When Mr. Fox accepted the office of minister at Parliament Court Chapel, a large number of Unitarian friends joined the congregation, and both Arian and Unitarian ministers inaugurated his settlement in London by an imposing induction to the church, and a formal 'laying on of hands' by the 'elders.' The venerable Dr. Abraham Rees, presided at the ordination, of which Mr. Fox often spoke.

"It should be borne in mind that Mr. Fox was invited to Parliament Court as Unitarian minister. He had seceded from Orthodoxy at Fareham within twelve months of leaving Homerton College, and the change in his sentiments led to a division amongst the members of the Fareham congregation, and eventually to Mr. Fox's removal. At Chichester he accepted the pulpit as Unitarian, and preached there five years in advocacy of Humanitarian Christianity; and he was invited to London on the strength of his powerful advocacy of those views. Having the choice of congregations both at Liverpool and Birmingham, the Metropolis was selected from its promising, it was thought, a wider field of public usefulness. On coming to London Mr. Fox at once took an active part, at the solicitation of its members, in the management of the 'Unitarian Fund,' and his services were sought whenever the cause needed support by the various operations in the provinces.

"It was owing to Mr. Fox's earnest and popular oratory that such large contributions were made by the Unitarian body for the building of the chapel in South Place, and for ten years it was thronged by the most zealous and enlightened of Unitarian listeners.

"It is not necessary to explain the causes of decline in the congregation from 1834, nor to trace the growth of the preacher's change of opinions on moral and religious subjects, but it is, I think, due to the memory of old friends that these things should be held in remembrance, because it was owing to the co-operation of the Unitarian body that Mr. Fox was enabled to take the high position which he held. From that vantage-ground his great talents and learning received their first recognition, and it is not right to ignore the fact.

"It cannot be doubted that Mr. Fox did much to liberalise the Church. He gave breadth to the Unitarian system of theology—a system which may seem narrow to those who have received his larger views, but which was, nevertheless, the shelter of free thought for a long series of years, and the teachings of that school of thought will advance with the growing culture of the age. Those who are interested in Mr. Fox's early career may perhaps be grateful for these memorial words in connection with his ministry."

Another correspondent, "who heard his recantation sermon," after referring to Mr. Fox's settlement with the Independent, not "Universalist," congregation at Fareham, says:—"He came out from the orthodox ranks under the auspices of the Southern Unitarian Society, by whom he was invited to preach his recantation sermon at Gosport. A room, which would have held about 40 persons, was hired for the purpose, but some of Dr. Bogue's students so frightened the people who had let the room that when the time came for worship, it was locked against him; what was to be done? Many friends had crossed the harbour from Portsmouth, with others in the neighbourhood, desirous to hear him. It was resolved to hold the meeting in the open air, and Mr. Fox, mounted on the top of an empty sugar cask, delivered a most animated discourse to some hundreds of people from the text, 'Buy the truth, and sell it not.' He had no settled congregation until he went to Chichester, and thence he removed to London."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

CHRIST IS RISEN.

"He is not here, He is risen."

YEA! Christ the Lord is risen indeed
To all believing hearts,
And when our stricken spirits bleed
What joy the thought imparts!

At early morn they seek the tomb
Where they had laid their Lord,
They find within but void and gloom—
"Why did ye doubt His word?"

Ye tender souls, how much we owe
To your sweet work that morn;
Thence springs of hope immortal flow,
Thence healing streams are born.

'Twas yours the glorious news to spread,
"The Lord is risen to-day;
Come, doubters, view where once your dead,
Now living, Master lay."

They see, and straight a mist unrolls
From their beclouded mind,
A bliss ecstatic thrills their souls,
They feel they had been blind.

So come, divinest hope, when we
To fear and doubt give way,
Make our benighted souls to see
The kindling of thy ray.

Let "Christ the Lord is risen indeed"
Bring solace to our hearts;
And may it when our spirits bleed
Its peace and joy impart.

May we in faith behold Him here,
Then follow him above,
Transported to His heavenly sphere
To share His Father's love.

BECKET'S SHRINE.

To the extracts which we have previously made from the articles on "Relics Ecclesiastical" in the Cornhill, may be added the following on the famous shrine of Becket, of which Erasmus gives an interesting description, in his "Colloquies," when it was still in its glory. It was at one time wonderfully popular. "Whilst no man brought his gift to the altar of his Saviour in Canterbury Cathedral, throughout a whole year, offerings were made at the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket, in the same place, and during the same period to the amount of nearly a thousand pounds." No wonder, however, he was such a favourite when no less than 263 miracles are ascribed to him; though how many of them were of the character of one that figures in a quaint sermon of Latimer's I am not prepared to say. A gentlewoman of London was met by one of her neighbours in the street, and asked, "Mistress, whither go ye?" "Marry," said she, "I am going to St. Thomas of Acres, to the sermon. I could not sleep all this last night, and I am going now thither. I never failed of a good nap there." In one of the miracles King Henry figures. He had resolved to do penance at Canterbury for his share in Becket's death. Barefoot, and in a woollen shirt and short cloak, he walked from St. Dunstan's Church to the Cathedral, kissed the spot where the archbishop had fallen, and submitted to be scourged by the monks and ecclesiastical dignitaries who were present on the occasion. "Next morning, as he was hearing mass before the tomb, the King of Scotland, his most cruel enemy, was taken prisoner by a small number of men." Cœur de Lion, on returning from Palestine, walked from Sandwich to the shrine, to give thanks for his deliverance; King John paid it a visit after his coronation; and probably none of our kings, from the second Henry to the eighth, failed to make the famous pilgrimage. The legend about the "bad end" to which the murderers came, and the inscription over their supposed tomb at Jerusalem—"Here lie the wretches who martyred blessed Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury"—are altogether apocryphal. Bret died quietly in his own bed; Tracy became Grand Justiciary of Normandy; Fitzurse went to Ireland, where he founded the family of the M'Mahons, of Wexford; whilst Hugh de Morville, lord of Burgh-by-Sands, in Cumberland, was made Chief Justice in Eyre, north of Trent.

EPIGRAM.

In 1776 a correspondent of the Gentleman's Magazine sends the following:

"On hearing the Rev. Mr. A.—n declare from the pulpit that, if it were not for the fear of hell, men would be as wicked as the devils:

"If we admit the fear of future hell
Man's surest impulse to his living well,
It follows, we must own if barely civil,
To Heaven man's surest guide must be—the devil."
"J. R."

HEROES IN COMMON LIFE.

THE English Independent thus tells the tale of a colliery accident with which our readers no doubt are familiar, but the circumstances of which it is good to dwell upon:

"There are heroes underground whose 'short and simple annals' disclose far higher traits than are to be found in the biographies of the generals and monarchs whom the world has elected chiefly to honour. On Tuesday night last week ten men and three boys went down into a coal pit at Brierly-hill. They had just eaten their supper, and got to their work again, when a sudden burst of water from an old working flooded all the pit and cut them off from the shaft; but for the fact that some of the workings were much higher than the shaft bottom they must have been drowned at once. Not till morning was the accident discovered by those on the surface, and to pump out the flood—what a task! For four days the engines clanked, and amidst a breathless crowd of watchers the water was ceaselessly poured out. Not till Saturday afternoon was there any proof that the volume of water was sensibly diminished, and long ere then it was thought the poor fellows must have succumbed to fear, hunger, or foul air. But on Sunday evening shouting from the bottom of the pit was heard, and immediately a party went down at the risk of their own lives to search and save. After some ineffectual attempts a raft was made which was pushed along the surface of the water till the first party of imprisoned miners were reached, and five of them were brought safely to the upper air. Still work the ceaseless pumps, another day passes, and in a further working six more were found alive, and finally on Monday afternoon an elderly man was found in a remote part of the pit standing up to his neck in the water, and, wonderful to say, he too was alive, though he had tasted no food for six days. They all got fresh air by putting their mouths down close to the water and breathing each time a ripple was caused on its surface by the splashing of the barrel used in drawing the water up the shaft. One only of the company was lost. He had grown frantic at the prospect of death in the mine, and had perished in despair. The others went to prayer, and so got the patience which saved them. They were on their knees when they first heard the shout of those who were coming to their rescue. One of them said that after the lapse of thirteen hours they had no candlelight; 'but,' he added, with great emotion, 'the light was not gone out in heaven. I always told Holden to keep up his faith in God.' In the tobacco-box of another he had written: 'Dear wives, we are singing and praying while we are dying. Tell my brothers and sisters to follow God more than I ever did. I wrote this on Wednesday night, about a quarter past six o'clock. Dear parents, prepare to meet me in heaven.' They knew, hour by hour, the time from feeling the fingers of a watch. What nobler story can be told than that of these poor miners, expecting to be entombed in that horrible place, yet praying and calmly waiting the event?"

THE EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN MISSION.—This mission, the annual meeting of which is to be held on the 8th inst., is, as we learn from the report printed for circulation beforehand, in an active and encouraging state. There are hopeful signs at all the stations. The simultaneous collections realised for the society in 1866, £129; 1867, £161; 1868, £165. Mr. John Grundy, its chairman, has suggested a plan for raising a permanent building fund in support of the operations of the mission, and it is hoped such a fund may ultimately be established. A graceful tribute is paid to the memory of the late Mr. Robert Heywood, who was an earnest friend and supporter of the mission, and we quite sympathise with the wish expressed in the report that more such may arise to help on our missionary work.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ON Good Friday, the twenty-fourth annual meeting was held at the Bank-street Chapel, Bury. Shortly after ten o'clock friends from neighbouring towns began to arrive and exchange their cordial greetings, and by the time for service the chapel was nearly filled, and shortly afterwards crowded.

THE SERVICE

was conducted by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., who preached from Prov. xxii. 6, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." Starting from the now generally admitted necessity for a system of national education, he showed that such a system must be compulsory and secular. This would not do away with the necessity for Sunday schools, but would clear the way for them to be devoted to a higher work than at present. Sunday schools must prepare themselves to supply, in conjunction with the home, the religious element in education.

At the close of the service about 600 persons took dinner together in the adjoining schoolroom. Afterwards
